the latter hereby agrees to buy, his entire requirements of soda ash during 1916, and that it overemphasizes the force and significance to be given to another clause of the contract that there were no understandings or agreements relative to this contract or its subject-matter that were not fully expressed herein. It will be noted that the court held in this regard that this latter clause precluded parol evidence relative to the surrounding facts and circumstances and the condition of the parties and the business in which they were engaged at the time of the execution of the contract in order to show that the buyer was a manufacturer and the purpose was to contract with reference to his requirements in his manufacturing business. The general rule, however, is that evidence of this character does not vary or contradict the written terms of the contract, but it merely identifies the quantity of the subject-matter and makes clear what the parties meant by the use of the ambiguous term "requirements," that is to say, the buyer, by the terms of the contract, agrees that his requirement, in his business, of the commodity to which the contract relates shall not be less than the minimum amount or more than the maximum. And the sellers agree to furnish the buyer such quantity of the commodity as he necessarily uses in his manufacturing business to be not less than the minimum or more than the maximum amount stated. This construction gives effect to the entire language of the contract, and is not inconsistent with the provision against other understandings or agreements.

VERA PAYNE
v.
KING F. GRAHAM.

(— Me. —, 107 Atl. 709.)

Statutes — emergency — power to prevent taking effect.

1. A constitutional provision that the facts upon which an emergency bill can be made to take effect immediately shall be set forth in the preamble is a limitation on legislative power; and the court may prevent the immediate taking effect of a statute in which an emergency is declared, unless the facts are so set forth.

Constitutional law — when question considered by courts.

2. Questions of constitutional law should not be passed upon by the court unless strictly necessary to a decision of the cause under consideration.

[See 6 R. C. L. 76.]

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Cumberland County, and petition for a writ of habeas corpus, to secure her release from custody to which she had been committed for violation of an alleged emergency act making more stringent the provisions of a statute for the prevention and punishment of sexual crimes. Sustained. Writ granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John J. Devine and Samuel L. Bates for petitioner.

Messrs. Carroll L. Beedy and Clement F. Robinson for respondent.

Deasy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In May, 1919, Vera Payne was indicted and convicted in the superior court, Cumberland county, for violation of chapter 112 of the Public Laws of 1919, which act, approved March 27, 1919, makes more stringent the provisions of statute for the prevention and punishment of sexual crimes.

She presents her petition for writ of habeas corpus, upon the ground that at the time of her indictment and conviction chapter 112 had not become effective as law.

Section 7 of the act is as follows: "In view of the emergency cited in the preamble this act shall take effect when approved."

But the petitioner says that chapter 112, notwithstanding this legislative pronouncement, is not an emergency act, and that it did not take effect until ninety days after the recess of the legislature, which period expired after her conviction.

The amended Constitution of Maine, article 4, part 3, § 16, is as follows: "No act or joint resolution of the legislature, except such orders or resolutions as pertain solely to facilitating the performance of the business of the legislature, of either branch, or of any committee or officer thereof, or appropriate money therefor or for the payment of salaries fixed by law, shall take effect until ninety days after the recess of the legislature passing it, unless in case of emergency (which with the facts constituting the emergency shall be expressed in the preamble of the act), the legislature shall, by a vote of two thirds of all the members elected to each house, otherwise direct. An emergency bill shall include only such measures as are immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health or safety; and shall not include (1) an infringement of the right of home rule for municipalities, (2) a franchise or a license to a corporation or an individual to extend longer than one year, or (3) provision for the sale or purchase or renting for more than five years of real estate."

The petitioner contends that the act in question is not immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, and that the court should so declare.

But the state maintains that the question presented is one for final legislative determination.

The leading case touching this matter is Kadderly v. Portland, 44 Or. 120, 74 Pac. 710, 75 Pac. 222. The opinion in this case sustains the state's contention. See also to same effect Hanson v. Hodges, 109 Ark. 479, 160 S. W. 392; Oklahoma City v. Shields, 22 Okla. 265, 100 Pac. 559; Re Menefee, 22 Okla. 365, 97 Pac. 1014; Re Senate Resolutions, 54 Colo. 269, 130 Pac. 336; Bennett Trust Co. v. Sengstacken, 58 Or. 333, 113 Pac. 863.

But in the case of State ex rel. Brislawn v. Meath, 84 Wash. 302, 147 Pac. 11, the doctrine of the Oregon court is by a majority opinion denied, and its conclusions rejected. Other cases also hold that the question is one for court review. State ex rel. Richards v. Whisman, 36 S. D. 260, L.R.A.1917B, 1, 154 N. W. 711; Miami County v. Dayton, 92 Ohio St. 215, 110 N. E. 728; Atty. Gen. ex rel. Barbour v. Lindsay, 178 Mich. 542, 145 N. W. 98.

Obviously the test is the extent to which legislative power is limited by the Constitution. Constitutional limitations are subjects of judicial interpretation and effectuation. Questions of public policy, such as the justice, expediency, necessity, or urgency (immediate necessity) of laws, are for final legislative determination. But the control by the legislature of even these questions may be qualified by express constitutional limitation.

The only Maine case touching the subject is Lemaire v. Crockett, 116 Me. 267, 101 Atl. 302. This case is not directly in point, because it involves one of the express limitations of the Constitution. Though it may deem an act which is an "infringement of the right of home rule for municipalities" to be immediately necessary, the legislature is forbidden by the positive mandate of the Constitution to give it immediate effect. Whether a given act is such an infringement is a judicial question. The case of Lemaire v. Crockett does not reach the question concerning which courts differ so radically; i. e., whether the words, "an emergency bill shall include only such measures as are immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health or safety," or other similar language, creates a limitation upon legislative power which the courts have jurisdiction to interpret and give effect to.

We are mindful of the long-established rule that questions of constitutional law should not be passed upon, unless strictly necessary to a decision of the cause under consideration. We therefore defer expressing a final opinion upon the question concerning which, as appears above, courts are at variance, because, for another reason not touched upon in any of the above-cited cases, we hold that chapter 112 did not take immediate effect as an emergency act.

Of the states that have provided for giving emergency acts immediate effect, generally in connection with the initiative and referendum the Constitutions of nearly all provide in effect that emergency legislation shall include only such measures as are immediately necessary for the preservation of the public health, peace, or safety. But our Constitution goes further and requires that the emergency, "with the facts constituting the emergency, shall be expressed in the preamble of the act." The only state Constitutions containing similar language are those of California: art. 4, § 1; Ohio, art. 2, § 1d; North Dakota, art. 2, § 67; Mississippi amendment of 1914 (see Laws 1914, chap. 520); Massachusetts, amendment of 1918. In neither of these is the language precisely like that of the Maine Constitution, but all require that the facts constituting or reasons for, an emergency be expressed or set forth in the preamble or some part of the act. Our investigation does not disclose that either of these states such constitutional provisions have been judicially interpreted. The case of Roanoke v. Elliott, 123 Va. 393, 96 S. E. 821, construes that clause of the Virginia Constitution reading: "The emergency shall be expressed in the body of the bill" (Const. § 53). The Virginia Constitution does not require the facts or reasons to be expressed, and it is held that in the absence of an explicit constitutional mandate the facts need not be set forth.

We think it clear that the above-quoted language of the Maine Constitution creates a limitation upon legislative power, and that without conforming to it no act can be made an emergency act, and as such be given immediate effect.

The preamble of chapter 112, is as follows: "The necessity of health in general, and more stringent measures, to prevent prostitution, and for the preservation of the public health in the emergency measure." The facts, as required by the Constitution, and no facts that are even suggestive of an emergency.

In argument, indeed, facts are presented which give the act an emergent character. In argument it is said that a great World War had been raging; that, while an armistice had been declared, large bodies of troops were still assembled; that for preventing the spread among these troops of sexual disorders, destructive of military efficiency, existing laws were inadequate; and that the Federal authorities had requested the co-operation of the state in meeting these conditions.

But these facts are not, as the Constitution requires, expressed in the preamble. The facts constituting the emergency are expressed in the briefs of counsel, instead of in the preamble of the act. Chapter 112 is therefore not an emergency act as defined by the Constitution. It did not take effect until after the petitioner's indictment and conviction. Her detention is therefore not warranted, and the entry must be: Exceptions sustained.

Writ of habeas corpus to issue.

a stipulated time unless the legislature shall otherwise direct. It seems clear that the legislative declaration is final under such a provision.

The constitutional provision involved in Carpenter v. Montgomery (1845) 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 415, is not set out but is stated by the court to provide that statutes shall not be enforced until they are published in print, unless in cases of emergency. It is held that of the existence of the emergency the legislature must necessarily be the judge, and when the legislature deems it to exist the right to declare a statute in force from and after its passage exists. See Gentile v. State (1868) 29 Ind. 409, infra.

But in order that such determination be given effect it must be expressed in a clear, distinct, and unequivocal provision. Wheeler v. Chubbuck (1855) 16 Ill. 361. A declaration in an act approved in January, "that upon and after a certain day of March, next, it shall not be lawful for any person or persons," etc., is not such a declaration that the act shall take effect before the expiration of sixty days from the end of the time on which the act is passed, as prescribed in a general provision of the Constitution. Ibid. See II. d, infra.

As shown in I., supra, some constitutional provisions authorize the legislature to declare that an act shall go into effect immediately without any restriction. The constitutional provisions under consideration in the present subdivision restrict the acts that may go into effect immediately to certain specified acts. A typical constitutional provision is that the act shall not take effect until a specified number of days after the end of the session at which it is passed, except that the legislature may give immediate effect to acts immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, or safety. Such acts are ordinarily spoken of as emergency acts. Such a provision is restrictive of the legislature's power, and the question arises as to who determines when an act is within the restriction. There are two diametrically opposed theories as to the conclusiveness of the legislative determination of an emergency requiring the immediate going into effect of a law enacted by the legislature. A similar question—on which there is the same difference of theory—arises over the conclusiveness of the legislative determination that an act shall not be subject to referendum. Under some statutes what is termed an emergency is required to free an act from the referendum, but ordinarily all acts are made subject to the referendum except laws necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, and safety. Some constitutional provisions limit the laws which may be put into immediate effect as emergency legislation to laws necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, and safety. The two questions, therefore, are very similar and both are included herein. The purpose of declaring an emergency for the purpose of having the law take immediate effect must be distinguished, however, from the legislative declaration that a proposed law is necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, and safety, for the purpose of freeing it from the referendum.

According to one line of authorities the legislative determination of an emergency is not conclusive; it is held to be within the province of the courts to finally determine the question. Re Hoffman (1909) 155 Cal. 114, 132 Am. St. Rep. 75, 99 Pac. 517, approved in obiter statement in Rigdon v. San Diego (1916) 30 Cal. App. 107, 157 Pac. 513 (obiter that declaration of municipal council is not conclusive). But see Ex parte McDermott (Cal.) infra; PAYNE v. GRAHAM (reported herewith) ante, 516. See discussion of Lemaire v. Crockett (1917) 116 Me. 263, 101 Atl. 302; Strange v. Levy (1919) — Md. —, 107 Atl. 549; Atty. Gen. ex rel. Barbour v. Lindsay (1914) 178 Mich. 524, 145 N. W. 98; Miami County v. Dayton (1915) 92 Ohio St. 215, 110 N. E. 726; State ex rel. Richards v. Whisman (1915) 36 S. D. 260, L.R.A.1917B, 1, 154 N. W. 707, impliedly overruling State ex rel. Lavin v. Bacon (1901) 14 S. D. 394, 85 N. W. 605; State ex rel. Brislawn v. Meath (1915) 84 Wash. 302, 147 Pac. 11; State ex rel. Case v. Howell (1915) 85 Wash. 281, 147 Pac. 1162.

The declaration of the state legislature that an act passed by it provides for the usual and current expenses of the state and shall therefore take effect immediately is not conclusive. McClure v. Nye (1913) 22 Cal. App. 248, 133 Pac. 1145.

Some doubt is thrown upon the rule in California by the decision in Ex parte McDermott (1919) — Cal. —, 183 Pac. 437, where the legislature, in putting into immediate effect an act defining criminal syndicalism, declared that "inasmuch as this act concerns and is necessary to the immediate preservation of the public peace and safety, for the reason that at the present time, large numbers of persons are going from place to place in this state, advocating, teaching, and practising criminal syndicalism, this act shall take effect upon approval by the governor." The court holds this to be a strict compliance with the constitutional requirements of a statement in one section of the act of the facts making it necessary in the judgment of the legislature that a law shall go into immediate effect where the legislature considers that it is necessary "for the immediate preservation of public peace, health, or safety;" and adds: "The court may not say that this conclusion of the legislature was not justified."

See Oklahoma City v. Shields and other Oklahoma cases cited in II. c, infra, with reference to specific exceptions to the power to declare emergency measures.

In State ex rel. Brislawn v. Meath (1915) 84 Wash. 302, 147 Pac. 11, the question was whether the legislature could free the act from a referendum. The constitutional provision relating to emergency legislation was that "no law, except appropriation bills, shall take effect until ninety days after the adjournment of the session at which it was enacted, unless in case of any emergency (which emergency must be expressed in the preamble or in the body of the act) the legislature shall otherwise direct." One constitutional provision relating to the referendum was as follows: "No act, law or bill, subject to referendum, shall take effect until ninety days after the adjournment of the session at which it was enacted." Another provision of the Constitution, in defining the act which was subject to the referendum, was as follows: "The second power reserved by the people is the referendum, and it may be ordered on any act, bill, law or any part thereof passed by the legislature except such laws as may be necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, support of the state government and its existing public institutions." The question in the case was, therefore, really whether the declaration of the legislature, that the act was one for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health or safety, was conclusive, so as to free the act from a referendum.

Doubt will be resolved in favor of the legislative determination. McClure v. Nye (1913) 22 Cal. App. 248, 133 Pac. 1145; State ex rel. Case v. Howell (1915) 85 Wash. 281, 147 Pac. 1162; State ex rel. Case v. Howell (1915) 85 Wash. 294, 147 Pac. 1159, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 1231. The court in McClure v. Nye (Cal.) supra, states that "if it appeared that this determination of the legislature might be a lawful and rational conclusion from facts submitted for the consideration of the legislators, then we would be bound to draw the same inference. But we are not dealing with a question involving a possible conflict of evidence or one permitting a different rational solution. The facts appear upon the face of the enactment, and the only reasonable conclusion is that such an appropriation is not for the 'usual current expenses of the state.' The said legislative declaration has no greater effect and is no more binding upon the court than if the legislature had declared that a certain measure is or is not constitutional. In such contingency that question would still remain for the courts to determine. The question before us is simply one of construction or interpretation of an act of the legislature, and of a provision of the Constitution, and that is a judicial question." It was held in this case that appropriations of money for the completion of a dam and reservoir at a state hospital, for the construction of temporary buildings at a state normal school, for building and furnishing cottages and dormitories at a school of industry, for the construction of a power house, power plant, equipment, tanks, pipe line, and improvements in drainage, water heating and electrical systems, on the premises of the state normal school, for the development and extension of a water system of a state polytechnic school, and an appropriation for the purpose of paying the transportation of certain veterans of the Civil War, to Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the battle of Gettysburg, were not appropriations for the usual and current expenses of the state, and therefore the act making the appropriation did not take effect until the usual time.

According to another line of authorities, the legislative determination of an emergency is conclusive. Biggs v. McBride (1889) 17 Or. 640, 5 L.R.A. 115, 21 Pac. 878; Kadderly v. Portland (1903) 44 Or. 118, 74 Pac. 710, 75 Pac. 222; Day Land & Cattle Co. v. State (1887) 68 Tex. 526, 4 S. W. 865; Orrick v. Ft. Worth (1908) 52 Tex. Civ. App. 308, 114 S. W. 677; Roanoke v. Elliott (1918) 123 Va. 393, 96 S. E. 819 (obiter).

The constitutional provision under which Biggs v. McBride (1889) 17 Or. 640, 5 L.R.A. 115, 21 Pac. 878, was decided was to the effect that "no act shall take effect until ninety days from the end of the session at which the same shall have been passed, except in case of emergency, which emergency shall be declared in the preamble or in the body of the law." This constitutional provision was amended, and at the time of the decision in Kadderly v. Portland (1903) 44 Or. 118, 74 Pac. 710, 75 Pac. 222, excluded from the power of the legislature to declare an emergency all laws except those necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety.

It is stated obiter in Gentile v. State (1868) 29 Ind. 409, that the declaration of an emergency by the legislature is conclusive; and the court cannot review this under a constitutional provision that no act shall take effect until the same shall have been published and circulated in the several counties of this state by authority "except in case of emergency, which emergency shall be declared in the preamble or in the body of the act." See Carpenter v. Montgomery (1845) 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 415, supra.

The legislative determination of whether or not a measure is immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, or safety is conclusive. Oklahoma City v. Shields (1908) 22 Okla. 265, 100 Pac. 559; Re Menefee (1908) 22 Okla. 365, 97 Pac. 1014; Brown v. State (1910) 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 475, 106 Pac. 975.

The legislative determination that an act is one necessary to the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, for the purpose of freeing it from the referendum, is conclusive. Arkansas Tax Commission v. Moore (1912) 103 Ark. 48, 145 S. W. 199; Hanson v. Hodges (1913) 109 Ark. 479, 160 S. W. 392; Re Senate Resolution (1913) 54 Colo. 262, 130 Pac. 333; Van Kleeck v. Ramer (1916) 62 Colo. 4, 156 Pac. 1108, approved in People ex rel. Kiefer v. Ramer (1916) 61 Colo. 422, 158 Pac. 146; Kadderly v. Portland (Or.) supra.

The theory of the supreme court of California in Ex parte McDermott (1919) — Cal. —, 183 Pac. 437, is not clear. See supra, II. b.

After stating that only certain acts can be emergent acts, or acts free from the referendum, the supreme court of Oregon in Kadderly v. Portland (1903) 44 Or. 118, 74 Pac. 710, says: "But the vital question is, What tribunal is to determine whether a law does or does not fall under this classification? Are the judgment and findings of the legislative assembly conclusive, or are they subject to review by the courts? The inquiry is much simplified by bearing in mind that the exception in the constitutional amendment is not confined to such laws as the legislative assembly may legally enact by virtue of the police powers of the state, or to those alone that may affect the public peace, health, or safety. The police power is limited to the imposition of restraints and burdens on persons and property, in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the state. Tiedeman, Pol. Power, § 1. But the language of the constitutional amendment is broader, and includes all laws, of whatsoever kind, necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, whether they impose restraints on persons and property, or come strictly within the police powers, or not. The laws excepted from the operation of the amendment do not depend alone upon their character, but upon the necessity for their enactment in order to accomplish certain purposes. As to such laws, the amendment of 1902 does not in any way abridge or restrict the power of the legislature, which, by the insertion of a proper emergency clause, may unquestionably cause them to go into effect upon approval by the governor. As the legislature may exercise this power when a measure is in fact necessary for the purposes stated, and as the amendment does not declare what shall be deemed laws of the character indicated, who is to decide whether a specific act may or may not be necessary for the purpose? Most unquestionably, those who make the laws are required, in the process of their enactment, to pass upon all questions of expediency and necessity connected therewith, and must therefore determine whether a given law is necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, and safety. . . . The amendment excepts such laws as may be necessary for a certain purpose. The existence of such necessity is therefore a question of fact, and the authority to determine such fact must rest somewhere. The Constitution does not confer it upon any tribunal. It must therefore necessarily reside with that department of the government which is called upon to exercise the power. It is a question of which the legislature alone must be the judge, and when it decides the fact to exist, its action is final."

The supreme court of Colorado says in Van Kleeck v. Ramer (1916) 62 Colo. 4, 156 Pac. 1108: "The argument of counsel for petitioner that the courts are vested with authority to determine whether an act is of the character which excepts it from the referendum, notwithstanding the declaration by the general assembly that it is, is based upon the assumption that unless the courts exercise the power to determine that question, the people can be deprived of the right to refer a law, if the legislature, either intentionally or through mistake, declares falsely or erroneously that a law is necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety. The answer to this proposition is that under the Constitution the general assembly is vested with exclusive power to determine that question, and its decision can no more be questioned or reviewed than the decision of this court in a case over which it has jurisdiction. It will not be presumed that the general assembly will disregard its duty or fail to observe the mandates of the Constitution, or not act honestly. Neither can it be assumed that the courts are better able to determine whether a law is immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, or safety than the legislature. Power may be abused, but that is not a valid reason for one co-ordinate branch of the government to assign for limiting the power and authority of another department. The judicial department is as much bound by constitutional provisions as any other. 'It cannot run a race of opinions upon points of right reason and expediency with the lawmaking power.' The courts do not make Constitutions or change them. They can only construe the provisions of that instrument. So that the only power we can exercise in solving the question presented is to ascertain where the authority to determine, when a law is exempt from the referendum, is lodged. The cases cited by counsel for petitioner from Washington and California, holding that the question of whether a law is necessary for the purposes specified is subject to review by the courts, appear to be grounded upon the assumption that the constitutional provisions, with respect to the initiative and referendum should be construed so as to make effective the power of the referendum. State ex rel. Brislawn v. Meath (1915) 84 Wash. 302, 147 Pac. 11; McClure v. Nye (1913) 22 Cal. App. 248, 133 Pac. 1145. In the Washington case, and also in a Michigan case, cited by counsel (Atty. Gen. ex

rel. Barbour v. Lindsay (1914) 178 Mich. 524, 145 N. W. 98), it was held that the authority of the legislature to make the declaration that an act is necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety is confined to such laws as the legislature may legally enact under the police power of the state. Neither of these reasons furnish the test by which to ascertain whether the courts have authority to determine if a law is of the character which exempts it from the referendum, or inquire whether the declaration of the legislature that it is, is false or erroneous. The only test is, what department of government is authorized, under the Constitution, to determine whether an act is necessary for the purposes specified. This authority, as we have pointed out, is vested in the general assembly, and if that body erroneously or wrongfully exercises that authority, the remedy is with the people. It is not subject to review by the courts or any other authority, except the people. Under the reserved power of the initiative and referendum, after the declaration by the general assembly that a law is necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, when not referred to the people for their judgment, it still remains with them, if they are dissatisfied with it, to cause a measure to be submitted at the next general election for its repeal. If, from experience, it appears necessary to deprive the general assembly of the power to declare a law necessary for purposes specified, the people have the power to initiate an amendment to the Constitution which will take from the general assembly the authority which they have vested in it. But this cannot be accomplished by the courts usurping a power they do not possess."

The determination of the legislature is conclusive even though it should, through mistake or intentionally, declare erroneously that a given law was of the excepted class. Kadderly v. Portland (1903) 44 Or. 118, 74 Pac. 710, The court says: "But, it is argued, what remedy will the people have if the legislature, either intentionally or through mistake, declares falsely or erroneously that a given law is necessary for the purposes stated? The obvious answer is that the power has been vested in that body, and its decision can no more be questioned or reviewed than the decision of the highest court in a case over which it has jurisdiction. Nor should it be supposed that the legislature will disregard its duty, or fail to observe the mandates of the Constitution. The courts have no more right to distrust the legislature than it has to distrust the courts. The Constitution has wisely divided the government into three separate and distinct departments, and has provided that no person charged with official duties under one of these departments shall exercise any of the functions of another, except as in the Constitution expressly provided. Or. Const. art. 3, § 1. It is true that power of any kind may be abused when in unworthy hands. That, however, would not be a sufficient reason for one co-ordinate branch of the government to assign for attempting to limit the power and authority of another department. If either of the departments, in the exercise of the powers vested in it, should exercise them erroneously or wrongfully, the remedy is with the people and must be found, as said by Mr. Justice Strahan in Biggs v. McBride (1889) 17 Or. 640, 5 L.R.A. 115, 21 Pac. 878, in the ballot box. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the findings and declarations of the legislature, that the Act of 1903 for the incorporation of the city of Portland was necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, and safety, are conclusive on the courts, and consequently the charter was not subject to the referendum power, and was in force and effect from and after its approval."

Some of the cases which adhere to this theory that the legislative determination is conclusive as to what laws are immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health or safety have held otherwise as to other limitations upon the right to declare an emergency. For example, the constitutional provision involved in Oklahoma City v. Shields (1908) 22 Okla. 265, 100 Pac. 559, restricts emergency measures by declaring that such measures shall not include the granting of franchises or license to a corporation or individuals for a longer period than one year, nor shall they include provisions for the purchase or sale of real estate, nor the renting or encumbrance of real property for a longer term than one year. In this case the court examines the act involved and determines that it contemplated encumbrances of real property for a longer term than one year, and therefore did not become effective until the regular time after the adjournment of the legislature notwithstanding the declarations of the legislature that it should become effective immediately. That the legislature cannot put into immediate effect as emergency laws, laws which come within some of the specific exceptions, is held also in Re Menefee (1908) 22 Okla. 365, 97 Pac. 1014; Riley v. Carico (1910) 27 Okla. 33, 110 Pac. 738; Gayman v. Mullen (1916) 58 Okla. 477, 161 Pac. 1051.

d. Sufficiency of declaration.

The general question as to the formal sufficiency of the legislative declaration is not considered herein. It may be stated, however, that some constitutional provisions require a certain form of declaration of the emergency. Failure to comply with the required form defeats the purpose of the legislative declaration. Mark v. State (1860) 15 Ind. 98. The legislative declaration in an act that it shall be in force on and after its passage and publication does not render the act operative before the time prescribed, generally, in the Constitution for acts to become operative "except in case of emergency; which emergency shall be declared in the preamble or in the body of the law." The declaration in the act in question is not regarded by the court as complying with this requirement of the Constitution, and therefore the act is not in force until the regular time. Ibid. A declaration in a proposed law, that "it is hereby adjudged and declared that existing conditions are such that this is necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health and safety; therefore an emergency is hereby declared to exist, and this act shall take effect and be in full force and effect, from, and after its approval by the governor," is sufficient to give immediate effect to the law. Bennett Trust Co. v. Sengstacken (1911) 58 Or. 333, 113 Pac. 863. The objection in this case was that the legislative assembly is required to set out in detail the ultimate facts it relies upon as authorizing the declaration of an emergency, in order that the court called upon to construe the act may consider the facts as alleged by the legislative assembly, and determine whether the emergency is a proper conclusion to be drawn from such fact. The court affirms the exclusive power of the legislature to declare that its enactments are necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, and safety, and to declare an emergency requiring the act to go into effect at once, and sustains the legislative declaration as sufficient to make the act take effect at once. In State v. Pacific Exp. Co. (1908) 80 Neb. 823, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 664, 115 N. W. 619, an act which merely provides, "This act shall take effect on and after its passage and approval" is held not to express an emergency under constitutional requirements that no act shall take effect until three calendar months after the adjournment of the session at which it is passed unless in case of emergency, being expressed in the preamble or body of the act. The declaration of the legislature enacting a charter for a city, that there had been a rapid growth in the population in the city, so that the existing charter was wholly insufficient and unsuited for the existing conditions, and there was immediate necessity for enlarged powers for the proper government of the city, "therefore, there is an imperative public necessity and emergency requiring the suspension of the constitutional rule which provides that bill shall be read on three several days. It is, therefore, hereby enacted that said rule shall be and is hereby suspended, and this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage, subject, however, to the result of the election hereinafter provided for,"—is a sufficient declaration of an emergency to authorize the law's immediate effect under a constitutional provision that no law passed by the legislature except a general appropriation act shall take effect or go into force until ninety days after the adjournment of the session at which it was enacted unless otherwise directed in case of an emergency, which must be expressed in the preamble or body of the bill. Orrick v. Ft. Worth (1908) 52 Tex. Civ. App. 308, 114 S. W. 677. The court states that it seems apparent from a consideration of the emergency clause quoted, that not only did the legislature hold that an emergency existed, requiring a suspension of the rules, but also that such emergency required the law to take effect at once; that the facts stated in the emergency clause apply to both phases of the question.

The decision in the reported case (PAYNE v. GRAHAM, ante, 516) is based upon the failure of the declaration of the emergency to contain statement of "the facts constituting the emergency . . . in the preamble of the act," as required by the Constitution.

See Roanoke v. Elliott (1918) 123 Va. 393, 96 S. E. 819, set out in the reported case (PAYNE v. GRAHAM).

RE INTERROGATORIES BY OLIVER H. SHOUP, GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF COLORADO.

(— Colo. —, 181 Pac. 197.)

Statutes — immediate effect — emergency and safety clauses.

1. Upon amendment of a Constitution providing that no act shall become a law until ninety days after passage, except in case of emergency, by a provision that a referendum may be ordered except as to laws necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, and appropriations for support of the government, an act to go into immediate effect must contain both the emergency and safety clauses.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Certain interrogatories have been propounded to this court by the governor, as follows:

1. Does an act of the general assembly which contains the emergency clause, but does not contain the so-called safety clause, go into effect immediately upon the passage and approval thereof?

2. In the absence of the so-called safety clause, is an act of the general assembly subject to the referendum, notwithstanding it contains the emergency declaration that the same shall take effect from and after its passage and approval?

3. When does an act of the general assembly passed with the emergency clause, but without the so-called safety clause, take effect and become operative?

The emergency clause alluded to above is found in § 19, article 5, of the Constitution, as follows: "No act of the general assembly shall take effect until ninety days after its passage, except in case of emergency (which shall be expressed in the act) the general assembly shall, by a vote of two thirds of all the members elected to each house, otherwise direct."

The so-called safety clause is in § 1, article 5, as amended by the adoption of the initiative and referendum, as follows:

"The legislative power of the state shall be vested in the general assembly consisting of a senate and house of representatives, both to be elected by the people, but the people reserve to themselves the power to propose laws and amendments to the Constitution and to enact or reject the same at the polls independent of the general assembly, and also reserve power at their own option to approve or reject at the polls any act, item, section or part of any act of the general assembly.

"The second power hereby reserved is the referendum, and it may be ordered, except as to laws necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health or safety, and appropriations for the support and maintenance of the department of state and state institutions, against any act, section or part of any act of the general assembly, either by a petition signed by 5 per cent of the legal voters or by the general assembly. Referendum petitions shall be addressed to and filed with the secretary of state not more than ninety days after the final adjournment of the session of the general assembly that passed the bill on which the referendum is demanded. The filing of a referendum petition against any item, section or part of any act, shall not delay the remainder of the act from becoming operative. The veto power of the governor shall not extend to the measures initiated by, or referred to the people. All elections on measures referred to the people of the state shall be held at the biennial regular general election, and all such measures shall become the law or a part of the Constitution when approved by a majority of the votes cast thereon, and not otherwise, and shall take effect from and after the date of the official declaration of the vote thereon by proclamation of the governor, but not later than thirty days after the vote has been canvassed. This section shall not be construed to deprive the general assembly of the right to enact any measure."

Before the emergency clause can be incorporated with an act of the legislature a two-thirds vote of both houses is required, and a separate vote is required to be taken upon the incorporation of the clause.

The questions of law raised by the interrogatories are of first impression with us. In People ex rel. Kiefer v. Ramer, 61 Colo. 422, 158 Pac. 146, an effort was made to have this court determine the effect of the passage of an act having the emergency clause without the safety clause attached, but since that question did not then appear to be properly before the court in that case it expressly declined to determine it.

The precise questions involved were, however, determined in Sears v. Multnomah County, 49 Or. 42, 88 Pac. 522, where the initiative and referendum amendment is, as noted in Van Kleeck v. Ramer, 62 Colo. 4, 156 Pac. 1108, practically identical with our own. There it was sought to establish the rule that an act passed with the emergency clause, but without the safety clause, could not be submitted to the voters under the referendum amendment, upon the theory that the two provisions were in this respect identical in effect. In discussing this question the court said: "That an act may take effect under a general emergency clause, and yet be subject to the referendum, is clearly contrary to the intent of the amendment, and would produce disastrous results. The clause in the amendment which reads, 'Any measure referred to the people shall take effect and become the law when it is approved by a majority of the votes cast thereon, and not otherwise,' clearly means that a law upon which the referendum is invoked cannot take effect prior to its approval by the vote; and consequently no act that is subject to the referendum can be made to go into operation for ninety days after the adjournment of the session or its approval by vote."

In concluding that the emergency clause alone is ineffectual as a safety clause that court said: "Therefore we conclude that if the act comes within the amendment of § 1 of article 4 of the Constitution, and the legislature desires to have it take effect upon its approval, it must so declare, and set it forth in the preamble or body of the act, and, as the emergency clause contained in this act does not pretend to bring it within the exception of the amendment of § 1 of article 4, it cannot operate to give it immediate effect, and therefore it became effective ninety days from the approval thereof by the governor, and the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained."

So also in Arkansas Tax Commission v. Moore, 103 Ark. 48, 145 S. W. 199, where the court used the following language: "Under this initiative and referendum amendment only 'laws necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health or safety,' are exempted from the provisions, and no power is reserved by the people to pass directly upon such laws. All other laws are subject to its operation, and ninety days being given by its terms from the final adjournment of the session of the legislature which passed them in which to demand or order the referendum thereon, they cannot take effect or go into operation till the expiration of ninety days after such adjournment, nor thereafter until approved by the people, if the referendum is ordered or invoked."

visions of its Constitution are very similar to ours, a contrary view to the one applied by the Oregon court was originally expressed. State ex rel. Lavin v. Bacon, 14 S. D. 394, 85 N. W. 605. However, that state in a more recent decision modified its views as announced in the Bacon Case, supra, and practically aligned itself with the holdings of the Oregon and Arkansas courts. This latter opinion is reported in State ex rel. Richards v. Whisman, 36 S. D. 260, L.R.A.1917B, 1, 154 N. W. 707. In effect the court receded from its holdings in State ex rel. Lavin v. Bacon, supra, as is plainly indicated by this extract from the later opinion: "Sections 1 and 22 of article 3 should be construed and read together as if forming different parts of but one section. State ex rel. Lavin v. Bacon, supra. The emergency measures mentioned in § 22 must and can only refer to the same emergency measures mentioned in the referendum clause exception contained in § 1. It therefore follows that the legislature, by necessary implication, is only authorized to declare emergencies in that class of measures specified in the said exception to the referendum clause. As to all emergency measures and acts within the purview of this exception, the legislature may declare an emergency to exist, for the purpose and to the end that such enactment may at once go into effect, and such declaration and finding as to the existence of such emergency is final, and not within the power or province of the courts to question. But as to any measure, law, enactment, clearly not within the class of emergency measures specified within said exception, the legislature has no power or authority to declare an emergency to exist in relation thereto, by any vote, however large the same may be; and the action of the legislature in embodying emergency clauses in measures clearly not comprehended within the said exception are wholly unwarranted and void, and should be so held by the courts. Not that the act itself would be void, but the emergency clause would be void, . . . with the result that, in the event of a proper referendum petition being filed as required by law, such enactment would not go into effect until approved by a majority vote of the electors of the state."

So, it may be safely stated that there is no case to be found at variance with those above cited, except State ex rel. Langer v. Crawford, 36 N. D. 385, 162 N. W. 710, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 955. The conclusion there was by a divided court, three to two, in which every judge filed an opinion expressing his individual views. The prevailing opinions do not appeal to us as correctly interpreting the law, or as either logical or persuasive.

The emergency and so-called safety clauses here involved have separate and distinct functions. They are not interchangeable. After the adoption of the referendum amendments the emergency clause as to all referable laws, as a means of making such acts immediately effective, became inoperative. Nor does the safety clause alone make an act effective at once. It is only when both safety and emergency clauses are incorporated in, or attached to, an act, that it is immediately in force.

immediate effect
—emergency and
safety clauses.

The following language of the referendum constitutional amendment: "All elections on measures referred to the people of the state shall be held at the biennial regular general election, and all such measures shall become the law or a part of the Constitution, when approved by a majority of the votes cast thereon, and not otherwise" [art. 5, § 1], is stated in such clear and definite language so plainly expressing the purpose and intent of the act that construction is not possible. It simply states that no act which is subject to the referendum shall take effect until approved by a majority of the votes thereon, and that ends the matter. This provision cannot by any course of logical reasoning be held to mean that such an act can be put into effect through the emergency clause prior to the expiration of the time within which it may be referred. No other conclusion is possible, without doing violence to the meaning of the language which gives expression to the clear purpose and object of the people in adopting this amendment.

The conclusion is irresistible that no act, not of the excepted class, can have the force of law, or can become operative until after ninety days from the adjournment of the assembly at which passed, and if referred, then not until approved by a majority of the people by vote at a general election.

It is argued that the emergency clause of the Constitution above recited was not repealed by the initiative and referendum amendment. This requires no argument. It was not so repealed. It is as effective now as it was before the amendment in so far as the legislature has power to finally enact statutes. When the general assembly had the absolute power to enact all legislation, the emergency provision was applicable to all acts of the body. But when the power to finally enact legislation was withdrawn from the general assembly except as to certain classes, then manifestly the emergency provision could apply only to acts within the power of the legislature to finally enact. Plainly the legislature cannot act in an emergency where it has no power to act at all. It can only apply the emergency clause of the Constitution to an act to which it has the power to give finality.

We therefore reach these conclusions:

1. That all referable acts of the general assembly which contain the emergency clause, but not the so-called safety clause, if not referred, take effect ninety days after the adjournment of the session of the general assembly at which passed, and not before.

2. In the absence of the so-called safety clause, all acts of the general assembly, although they carry the emergency clause, declaring that they shall take effect from and after their passage, are still subject to reference.

3. All acts of general assembly not referable because the safety clause is attached or because they show upon their face that they are excepted from the referendum provision, not carrying the emergency clause, go into effect ninety days after their passage and approval by the governor.

4. All acts having both the emergency and safety clause go into effect immediately upon their passage and approval by the governor.

ANNOTATION.

Effect of declaring an emergency in the enactment of a law without declaring it free from the operation of the referendum.

A provision authorizing the legislature to put into immediate effect laws of a certain character, whereas other laws go into effect a stated time after adjournment of the legislature, is quite generally contained in state constitutions. In those states in which the acts of the legislature are subject to the referendum it is quite generally provided that all laws shall be subject to such referendum except laws necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, and safety. The exceptions to the laws that are subject to the referendum vary, but the above stated exception is typical. In some states, at least, a declaration of the legislative intent to free an act from the operation of the referendum is regarded as a declaration of a different purpose than that contemplated by a declaration intended to put the act into immediate effect. In states taking this —provision for referendum—effect on emergency

view the question under annotation herein arises as to the effect of a declaration of an emergency without a declaration intended to free the act from the referendum.

There are two general theories as to the effect of the legislative declaration of an emergency in passing an act, without enacting the safety clause to free it from the operation of the referendum. According to one view, the declaration of an emergency without the enactment of the safety clause is ineffectual to cause the act to go into effect at once, but such act does not go into effect until the expiration of the time fixed for the filing of referendum petitions. Arkansas Tax Commission v. Moore (1912) 103 Ark. 48, 145 S. W. 199; RE SHOUP (reported herewith) ante, 526; Birdzell, J., and Grace, J., in State ex rel. Langer v. Crawford (1917) 36 N. D. 385, 162 N. W. 710, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 955; Sears v. Multnomah County (1907) 49 Or. 42, 88 Pac. 522; State ex rel. Richards v. Whisman (1915) 36 S. D. 260, L.R.A. 1917B, 1, 154 N. W. 707, overruling State ex rel. Lavin v. Bacon (1901) 14 S. D. 394, 85 N. W. 605.

Or after its approval by the people if the referendum is invoked. Arkansas Tax Commission v. Moore (Ark.) supra.

In Arkansas Tax Commission v. Moore (Ark.) supra, the legislative act in question concluded as follows: "This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage." It seems this was treated as the declaration of an emergency, but it was also urged that by this declaration the legislature thereby determined that the act in question belonged to the class excepted from the operation of the referendum. This contention was denied, and the court, after stating what is quoted in the reported case (RE SHOUP, ante, 526), continued: "It was not intended that an act passed by the legislature should take effect conditionally, and subject to the referendum, and continue in force from its passage if the referendum was not ordered, or that an act once in force should be suspended by the referendum till its approval by the people.

. . . The concluding provision of the Revenue Act and the others fixing dates for the performance of certain things before the act could become operative under the constitutional amendment, unless it comes within the exception, do not manifest an intention upon the part of the legislature to put it into effect as a law necessary for the immediate preservation of public peace, health, or safety, and were not meant for and are not a legislative determination that the act should take effect as such; and it could not, therefore, take effect until ninety days after the final adjournment of the session of the legislature at which it was passed, or after its approval by the people, if the referendum is revoked."

It is stated in Sears v. Multnomah County (1907) 49 Or. 42, 88 Pac. 522, that the view that an act may take effect under a general emergency clause and yet be subject to the referendum is clearly contrary to the intent of the amendment, and would produce disastrous results.

It has been held that the legislature cannot constitutionally confer upon a county the referendum as to acts that have taken effect, since that involves the power of repeal. Meade v. Dane County (1914) 155 Wis. 634, 145 N. W. 239.

It is the view of some of these courts that the general constitutional provision relating to emergency legislation is amended by the provision relating to the referendum; and that emergency legislation is confined to legislation of the character specified in the latter provision. This is the view of Birdzell and Grace, JJ., in State ex rel. Langer v. Crawford (1917) 36 N. D. 385, 162 N. W. 710, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 955, Grace, Judge, thus expresses his thought: "Section 67 [the constitutional provision relating to general emergency legislation] as it originally stood and before amended and in part repealed is entirely inconsistent with the later constitutional amendment thereto contained in the referendum law. Either § 67 in so far as it is inconsistent with the referendum law must fall, or the later express will of the people in the referendum law must fall. They are inconsistent. They cannot stand together. One or the other must be inoperative. There cannot be two emergency clauses." Grace, Judge, then refers to the limitations placed upon the enactment of emergency legislation by stating that the "people in their sovereign capacity amended § 67, so as to meet all such emergencies, and they said that the only emergencies that would necessitate the immediate enactment of a law would be such necessity as would affect the health, peace, or safety of the people of the state."

That the general constitutional provision relating to emergency legislation is amended by the provision relating to the referendum is the view, also, of the court in Sears v. Multnomah County (1907) 49 Or. 52, 88 Pac. 522. This is the view also of State ex rel. Richards v. Whisman (1915) 36 S. D. 260, L.R.A.1917B, 1, 154 N. W. 707, overruling State ex rel. Lavin v. Bacon (1901) 14 S. D. 394, 85 N. W. 605. This seems to be the theory of Bennett Trust Co. v. Sengstacken (1911) 58 Or. 333, 113 Pac. 863.

Other courts hold that the legislative declaration that an act shall go into operation immediately is effective to put the law into immediate operation notwithstanding there is no declaration intended to free it from the referendum. State ex rel. Collins v. Jackson (1919) 119 Miss. 727, 81 So. 1; Bruce, Ch. J., and Robinson, J., in State ex rel. Langer v. Crawford (N. D.) supra.

The fact that the law is in effect is held, however, not to prevent the filing of a referendum petition, but it is in effect until such a referendum petition is filed, in which event its operation is suspended and its fate as a law is determined by a vote of the people. State ex rel. Collins v. Jackson (Miss.) supra. Bruce, Ch. J., in State ex rel. Langer v. Crawford (N. D.) supra, is of the opinion that an emergency act is subject to a referendum although it takes immediate effect, but no opinion is expressed whether the act is suspended by the filing of a referendum petition or only by an adverse result at the referendum election. Robinson, J., expresses no opinion whether an act put into immediate effect is subject to the referendum.

The court in Arkansas Tax Commission v. Moore (1912) 108 Ark. 48, 145 S. W. 199, supra, takes the view that in providing for the referendum it was not intended to provide for a referendum upon acts that had already gone into effect, while the opposite view is taken by the Mississippi court.

The Constitution of Mississippi was regarded as persuasive of this question by the court in State ex rel. Collins v. Jackson (Miss.) supra. It expressly provided that in case of laws necessary for the immediate preservation of public peace, health, or safety, the legislature might declare such to become immediately effective, and that "if a referendum petition is filed against such emergency measure, such measure shall be a law until it is voted upon by the people, and if it is then rejected by a majority of the voters voting thereon, it shall be thereby repealed." The court states that a law passed under this provision is of a higher nature than a law otherwise passed, in that it becomes effective immediately, and cannot be suspended by the filing of referendum petitions, but remains in force and effect until an adverse vote of the people upon it, in which case it is repealed; while in case of other laws that have been put into immediate effect, under the general constitutional provision, the law is suspended by the filing of the referendum petition. A dissenting opinion by Ethridge, J., takes the view that the constitutional provision relating to the referendum clearly implies that the act is not operative in any of its parts by the filing of a petition for referendum.

Apparently this question was involved in Keator v. Whittaker (1912) 104 Tex. 628, 143 S. W. 607, but the facts are not sufficiently stated in the report of that case to enable the questions there involved to be determined.

The emergency declaration, and the declaration intended to free the act from the operation of the referendum, seem not to be distinguished under the Maine Constitution, which contains an emergency clause in connection with the initiative and referendum as follows: "Section 16. No act or joint resolution of the legislature, except such orders or resolutions as pertain solely to facilitating the performance of the business of the legislature, at either branch, or of any committee or officer thereof, or appropriate money therefor or for the payment of salaries fixed by law, shall take effect until ninety days after the recess of the legislature passing it, unless in case of emergency (which, with the facts constituting the emergency, shall be expressed in the preamble of the act), the legislature shall, by a vote of two thirds of all the members elected to each house, otherwise direct. An emergency bill shall include only such measures as are immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, or safety; and shall not include (1) an infringement of the right of home rule for municipalities," etc. In Lemaire v. Crockett (1917) 116 Me. 263, 101

Atl. 302, an act of the state legislature, to which was attached an emergency clause, but which violated the provision of the Constitution that an emergency bill should not include an infringement of the right of home rule for municipalities, was held not to take effect until ninety days after the recess of the legislature, thus becoming a nonemergency act, permitting in the meantime the invoking of the referendum, instead of taking effect immediately. The court said that the act itself was valid, but the emergency clause was invalid, and the legislature was expressly prohibited from attaching it, but the two are clearly separable, and the act stands while the emergency provision falls.

In Maryland, certain classes of legislation are excepted from the operation of the referendum, and as to these classes the general constitutional provision relating to emergency legislation is held to apply. Beall v. State (1917) 131 Md. 669, 103 Atl. 99.

1. An employer who is not notified immediately of an accidental injury to his employee is liable for his reasonable expenses in procuring medical treatment for the remainder of the three weeks after receiving notice, under a statute making him liable during the first three weeks after the injury to furnish free medical and hospital services and medicine when necessary.

— necessity of notice of injury.

2. Ordinarily, to render an employer liable for the expense of medical services rendered an employee under a statute making him liable for such services during the first three weeks after injury, he must be notified of the injury and given an opportunity to select the physician and furnish the needed service himself.

— excusing failure to give notice.

3. Notice to the employer which is necessary to render him liable for medical services rendered an injured employee is excused where the injury is of such nature that the delay in giving the notice and awaiting the employer's service will endanger the employee's life.

Trial — question of fact — emergency requiring prompt medical attention.

4. Whether or not the emergency is such, in case of an injury to an employee, as to justify his procuring medical service without notifying the employer of his injury, where the employer is made liable by statute for the necessary medical service for a specified time after the injury, is a question of fact.

CERTIORARI to the Industrial Accident Board to review its award to plaintiff in a proceeding brought under the Workmen's Compensation Act to recover compensation for accidental injuries sustained by him while in the employ of defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Alexander J. Groesbeck, Attorney General, and Clare Retan, Assistant Attorney General, for plaintiff in certiorari:

By the provisions of § 5434 of the Compiled Laws of 1915, defendant was entitled to furnish medical and hospital services if it so desired.

Mr. A. Floyd Blakeslee for defendant in certiorari.

Steere, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case defendant questions the validity of an award of $189 made against it by the State Industrial Accident Board in favor of plaintiff, for medical, surgical, and hospital expenses incurred by him as the result of an accidental injury which he sustained on September 15, 1917, while in defendant's employ.

The necessity for such services and the reasonableness of the charges made therefor are apparently not questioned, but it is contended that defendant was entitled under the Employers' Liability Law to notice of plaintiff's injury and need of medical attendance by reason of it, and a reasonable opportunity to itself furnish all needed medical, surgical, and hospital service, before plaintiff could legally secure the same of others at defendant's expense. This contention is based on the provisions of § 4, pt. 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Comp. Laws 1915, § 5434), which is as follows: "During the first three weeks after the injury the employer shall furnish, or cause to be furnished, reasonable medical and hospital services and medicines when they are needed."

Plaintiff's injury was a hernia. The facts are practically undisputed, and the case has been adjusted in all other respects by appropriate proceedings before the Industrial Accident Board, based on an agreement in regard to compensation approved by the board.

The issue raised is pointedly presented and concisely argued by counsel on both sides, and by them narrowed to the question of whether, under the claimed exigencies shown here, the injured party may, pending reasonable notice to the employer of the necessity for medical and surgical attention, and until the latter after reasonable notice furnishes the same, secure such attention at the expense of the employer. Counsel for plaintiff frankly concedes it inferable from the duty imposed by the statute that in the majority of cases and as a general rule the employer should be entitled to furnish, or dictate where an injured employee shall obtain, the necessary medical, surgical, and hospital attendance, and broadly admits such general rule proper for the protection of both parties, "in order to prevent an unscrupulous physician from exploiting the injury to his own benefit and to prevent, perhaps, a possibility of malingering on the part of the injured employee." But no such evil elements are claimed or suggested as present in this case, and it is urged for plaintiff to be also fairly inferable, from the act as a whole and the particular subject to which the section applies, that the injured party may secure such services at the expense of the employer in exceptional cases involving manifestations of emergency and demanding prompt attention, as in the instant case, and whether such excepting conditions existed is a question of fact for the accident board to determine.

Plaintiff's home was on Johnson avenue in the city of Pontiac. He was when injured, and had been for many years, employed by defendant at the Pontiac State Hospital for the Insane, in its building department. On the day of his injury he was working in a tunnel, where it was somewhat dark, and in attempting to lift or carry out some material experienced an injury, the nature of which he did not then apparently understand or localize, but which caused him to suspend work, telling his "boss," who was the superintendent, that he was sick and had to go home, which he did, arriving there between 9 and 10 o'clock, as his wife testified, not yet knowing what ailed him. Shortly before noon he discovered that he was suffering from a hernia. During the day he experienced increasing pain and grew weaker. His wife summoned their family physician, Dr. Fox, who called shortly after supper, and found plaintiff suffering with a strangulated femoral hernia, which in the doctor's opinion demanded prompt surgical action, and he at once called in for consultation a surgeon in whom he had confidence, named Dr. Howlett, and an immediate operation was deemed by them necessary to save the patient's life. He was thereupon taken in an ambulance to the Pontiac City Hospital before dark that evening, and operated upon almost immediately, remaining in the hospital nineteen days. He made a good recovery, and at the time of hearing before the board had returned to his work in defendant's employ. The bill in question is for surgical and medical attendance, ambulance and hospital expenses, the largest item being $100 for the operation, furnished within three weeks after the injury. Of the necessity for prompt action after the physicians had determined Gage's condition Dr. Fox testified in part as follows:

Q. Was there any particular urgency there?

A. Very much so; yes.

Q. What was the hurry?

A. What we call strangulated hernia. It is where the bowel goes down and becomes strangulated. It is strangulated there, and the bands go round to the outer part, and the circulation is shut off. It is sometimes only a few hours before gangrene will set in in the bowels, which means almost certain death.

Q. For that reason you considered that an immediate operation was necessary?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In your opinion a delay would have been fatal?

A. Yes, sir. In the morning this man would have been beyond help.

The Pontiac State Hospital is one of the state asylums for the insane, formerly designated as the "Eastern Michigan Asylum" (Comp. Laws 1915, § 1311), but given its present name in 1911, without change of character or functions, by an act devoted to "changing the names of the Michigan asylums for the insane" (Comp. Laws 1915, § 1365). These institutions have, under the statute providing for them, a medical superintendent, with adequate medical and surgical staff for the purposes of the institution, which is the care and treatment of insane inmates committed to them by the probate courts and designated in the act as "patients." Dr. Christian was then medical superintendent of the institution. Mr. Halsey, its steward, testified it was customary to furnish medical attendance and hospital service to its employees in need of the same; that they did surgical work there, but had a surgeon, Dr. Mack, in Detroit, whom they called in to do "the surgical work,—the complicated work."

Defendant contends that reasonable notice and opportunity were not given it of plaintiff's injury and needs, and, as the statute makes it mandatory for the employer to furnish the same, plaintiff was not authorized to secure such service at its expense. The only notice plaintiff gave in relation to the matter was when he quit work in the middle of the forenoon, telling his boss, the superintendent, that he was sick and had to go home. This, while not definite notice of an accidental injury, was at least notice of a sudden physical affliction, which rendered him incapable of continuing at work. Plaintiff, who testified he never was advised and did not then know he could receive medical attention at the hospital, states that his condition was such that "everything was hurly-burly" with him anyway, and his "mind was occupied in other ways;" that he never notified them himself, and did not know who did. His wife, who first cared for him after he reached home, testified that she tried to get their family physician some time before she succeeded; that after he came and she learned of the seriousness of her husband's condition she "took on and cried," for he had to be taken to the hospital immediately; but that she notified defendant the next morning, which she says was "the first chance I had;" that she promptly went up there the next morning, and tried to see Dr. Christian, to notify him, but he was not in, and she told his assistant,

Dr. Butler, about it,—of the operation and that her husband was in the city hospital,—and asked if they could do anything for him, saying "he was entitled to have something done by them for him, if they did anything for any of their employees," to which Dr. Butler replied he would report the matter to Dr. Christian as soon as he returned, and, when she asked if it was necessary for her to do so, he replied it was not.

It appears undisputed that within twenty-four hours after the accident defendant was fully notified of it, and told where plaintiff then was by his wife, who requested aid in his behalf. Defendant then had notice, with a request for proper attention, certainly giving opportunity to offer, and, so far as shown, to furnish from that time on, all needed medical and hospital services during the remaining twenty days of the prescribed three weeks. It is not shown or claimed that defendant at any time furnished or offered to furnish plaintiff any free medical or hospital services or medicines for his accidental injury while in its employ. After such notice, request, and reasonable opportunity to furnish or offer the required treatment, and failure to act, defendant was clearly liable for plaintiff's reasonable expenses in securing the same during the remainder of the three weeks after the injury.

compensation
—liability for medical attention—neglect to

The more serious question is that of the expenses incurred in the claimed emergency prior to notice. Of this contention the board found and held as follows: "It would seem that ordinarily the employer should be notified of an accident and given an opportunity to provide medical and surgical treatment to an injured workman. However, in a case like the instant one, where the employee is in such a serious condition as to require an immediate operation, and where his life would be endangered by any delay, the board believes that he should have the right to secure the necessary attention as soon as possible, and that the employer should bear the expense of the same. . . .

Respondent failed and neglected to offer any medical services, even after receiving notice of the injury. The board believes that because of applicant's serious condition, the undisputed testimony of his physician being that an immediate operation was imperative in order to save his life, the case was brought within the emergency class, and respondents should pay the expenses incurred by the applicant for medical and hospital services during the first three weeks after his injury as provided by law."

In Honnold on Workmen's Compensation, vol. 1, § 193, where the admitted general rule of the employer's right to select the physician and furnish the necessary services for treatment of an injured employee is discussed, the author adds as a constructive corollary: "But this does not militate against the employee's right to obtain medical and surgical treatment at the expense of his employer in the interim between the happening of the injury and time for notice to the employer of the employee's needs, subject to the right of the employer or insurer to change physicians at the close of the emergency treatment."

The authority to support this text is found in 1 Cal. Industrial Acci. Cas. (Dec.) pp. 385-575. Counsel do not cite, nor have we found, any decisions by courts of last resort where this question has been directly involved. Counsel for defendant cite but two cases which relate to liability under a similar provision for medical services, where the employee has procured the same without the employer's knowledge or consent. Keigher v. General Electric Co. 173 App. Div. 207, 158 N. Y. Supp. 939, and Milwaukee v. Miller, 154 Wis. 652, L.R.A.1916A, 1, 144 N. W. 188, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 847, 4 N. C. C. A. 149. While the cases deal with that subject, the exact question at issue here was not involved. Counsel quote from the Keigher Case as follows: "But the duty to provide certain services, which is cast by the statute upon the employer, naturally implies the right of the latter to select his own agencies for the proper fulfilment of the duty, unless language is found in the statute indicating a contrary intent."

An examination of that case shows that defendant had provided for the injured employee a competent physician and surgeon, who took charge of the case and rendered professional service for a time, when the employee refused longer to accept his services, and requested the employment of a certain physician of his own selection, which defendant declined to do. The physician the employee desired thereafter rendered him medical services, which defendant declined to pay for. The court held that under these circumstances the general rule applied, and sustained the refusal. No question of intervening jeopardy before notice, or pressing emergency, was involved.

In Milwaukee v. Miller, supra, the employee, Miller, suffered an injury to his great toe, and without requesting medical service, or notifying the municipality of his injury, employed his own physician and nurse. Eleven days after the accident, amputation of the toe was deemed necessary by his physician, who then performed the operation. Ten days later, and three weeks after the accident, Miller for the first time notified the city of his injury and made claim for compensation, but even then gave no notice of his requiring medical services. Some time after receiving this notice the city tendered him the services of a competent physician, which he did not accept, and continued to employ his own physician until he had charged up 130 visits, and the bill for medical service and nursing, which Miller claimed the city should pay, amounted to over $250. This the court declared "preposterous," in view of the nature of the accident and actual needs of the patient. No question of emergency was involved; but in discussing the facts, and applying the general rule of the employer's right to notice, etc., the court to a degree recognized an inferable exception to it under possible circumstances as follows: "The result is that Miller, since he failed to notify his employer of his need, never had competency to employ a physician at the expense of the city of Milwaukee, except for such reasonable length of time as necessarily intervened between his injury and reasonable opportunity after due notice for the city to exercise its privilege."

In that case the general rule, conceded here, that the law should be construed and applied so as to secure to the employer reasonable opportunity to conserve the related interests of both parties to the misfortune by supplying the medical and surgical needs of the injured is instructively discussed at length. Running through the discussion is an indicated recognition that by fair construction of the act there may be exceptional cases where it is permissible and in the interest of both parties for the injured party to promptly secure such services before notice, although "ordinarily" reasonable opportunity should be first accorded by him to the employer. It is pointed out that the reason of the provision is twofold: "First. As a rule an employer is more competent to judge the efficiency of the doctor employed and to provide efficient medical and surgical treatment. Second. It is to the interest of the employer to furnish the very best medical and surgical treatment, so as to minimize the result of the injury and to secure as early a recovery as possible. The more serious the result of the injury, the more the employer must pay."

In this case there was, as the result of prompt and efficient action after plaintiff's critical condition was discovered, an early and full recovery, at small expense to defendant compared with a death loss, which was threatened and would have been the result of delay until the following morning, as the undisputed medical testimony shows. It is indicated that plaintiff, after his return home and his distress increased, was not in a physical or mental condition to judge or act in the matter. His wife is not shown to have then known he had sustained an accidental injury. She knew he was sick, and, when his condition indicated the need, called in their family physician, who recognized the emergency. It is undisputed that from that time immediate and proper action was successfully taken to save the patient's life by a prompt and critical major operation, which it can with some force be contended might have been delayed until too late by sending word to the hospital and waiting for them to investigate and call from Detroit Dr. Mack, who did their complicated surgery work. Broadly considered, the statute as to medical service to be paid for by the employer involves the combined interests of both parties. What services were actually and reasonably necessary to that end, and what is a fair compensation therefor, are the vital inquiries.

Unquestionably that construction of the statute is logical, and the adopted rule sound, which requires notice and opportunity to the employer to select the physician and furnish the needed service during the prescribed three weeks before the injured party can secure the same at the employer's expense, but in the many complications which arise in industrial activities it is not an unreasonable or strained construction of the statute, in view of its purpose, to recognize as inferable exceptions in extraordinary cases where the surrounding circumstances and critical condition of the injured party present emergencies or exigencies demanding prompt action, which reasonably

The liability under workmen's statutes of employer or insurance carrier for medical or hospital aid furnished to injured employees is discussed in the annotation on page 545, post. v.

MORRIS & COMPANY.

(— Neb. —, 170 N. W. 363.)

Workmen's compensation — liability for services of physician.

1. Under § 3661, Rev. Stat. 1913, as amended by Laws 1917, chap. 85, § 6, an employer who offers to furnish without charge to an injured employee the reasonable services of a competent physician and medicines as and when needed, and within the value and for the time contemplated by the act, cannot be held liable for such services by such employee, who has refused such offer by the employer and has obtained such services and medicines elsewhere.

Statute — effect of proviso.

2. The general purpose of a proviso in a statute is to qualify the statute in part or in whole, but it is not always so used. The word "provided," as it is first used in § 3661, Rev. Stat. 1913, as amended by Laws 1917, chap. 85, § 6, has the same meaning that the conjunction "and" or "but" would have, if used in its place.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff recovered an award from the compensation commissioner on account of an accidental injury sustained while in the employ of defendant at its packing house, and also $129 expenses incurred for medical and surgical treatment by a physician other than the one regularly furnished by the employer. On appeal to the district court by defendant, the award for compensation was affirmed, but the medical service bill for $129 was disallowed. From that ruling plaintiff appealed to this court.

As a result of the accident a part of the second finger of plaintiff's left hand was bruised and fractured, and afterwards amputated at the first joint by the physician whose bill is the subject of inquiry here. It is conceded that amputation was necessary, and it is agreed that the only question to be decided is this: Did the court err in disallowing the bill for medical and surgical treatment, under § 3661, Rev. Stat. 1913, as amended by Laws 1917, chap. 85, § 6? For relief both parties rely on § 3661, as amended, which follows: "During the first twenty-one days after disability begins the employer shall be liable for reasonable medical and hospital services and medicines as and when needed, not, however, to exceed $200 in value, unless the employee refuses to allow them to be furnished by the employer: Provided, however, in cases of dismemberment or injuries involving major surgical operations, the employer shall be liable for reasonable medical and hospital services and medicines as and when needed beyond as well as within the twenty-one day period, not, however, to exceed $200 in value: Provided, further, that where the injured employee refuses or neglects to avail himself of such medical or surgical treatment, the employer shall not be liable for any aggravation of such injury due to said neglect or refusal."

Plaintiff argues that, because an operation became necessary, he was therefore at liberty to make his own selection of a physician, and that defendant under the act became liable for the reasonable expenses so incurred. His argument is based in part on the 1917 amendment, that begins with the word "provided," where it first occurs in the section under consideration, and ends with the word "value." He contends that the amendment is a proviso, and hence operates to except the clause covered by it from the enacting clause, or to qualify it in some way. We do not think the authorities sustain his argument. It does not always follow that an amendment operates as a proviso in a technical sense, merely because it is preceded by the term "provided." Whether it is a proviso in effect, or merely a conjunction, must in part be determined from the context and from all the provisions of the act relating to the same subject-matter. With this in mind it seems that the word "provided," as used in the act, has the same meaning that the conjunction "and" or "but" would have, if used in its place. With this interpretation, § 3661, as amended, seems to be in harmony with the entire act of which it forms a part. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 128 U. S. 174, 32 L. ed. 377, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 47; 3 Words & Phrases, 2d Series, 1321.

The employer having been made liable for the services contemplated by the act, it seems from the language used that it must have been the legislative intent that he should be permitted to furnish a physician of his own choice, and if his selection is such as would satisfy a reasonable man under like circumstances the employee would not then be heard to complain. That is the general rule in manufacturing centers, where Employers' Liability Acts with provisions similar to ours were in effect before our act was adopted. Pecott's Case, 223 Mass. 546, 112 N. E. 217; Keigher v. General Electric Co. 173 App. Div. 207, 158 N. Y. Supp. 939; Re Davidson, 228 Mass. 257, 117 N. E. 310; Re McCaskey, 15 N. C. C. A. 113, note III. p. 116; Milwaukee v. Miller, 154 Wis. 652, L.R.A.1916A, 1, 144 N. W. 188, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 847, 4 N. C. C. A. 148. The record shows that the physician furnished by the company, and his assistant, who administered first aid, are in all re-

Was plaintiff's conduct reasonable in the premises? It appears that immediately after the accident, at about 5 o'clock in the evening, plaintiff went with a foreman of defendant to the near-by office of the company physician, where, in his absence, first aid was administered by the assistant in charge, who told plaintiff to return that evening between 7 and 8 o'clock for further treatment by defendant's physician. Plaintiff never returned, and denied that he was requested to do so, notwithstanding both the foreman and the assistant physician testified that the request was made. The next morning at 9 o'clock, on advice of his mother, he went to their family physician, and he from that time retained the case. Plaintiff attempted to justify his employment of a physician by criticizing the first-aid treatment that he received, but on this point he called a physician as a witness, and his testimony was corroborative of the treatment so received in all essential particulars.

It seems to us that plaintiff's conduct was in effect and within the meaning of the act an unjustifiable refusal to allow defendant to furnish the reasonable services and medicines that the act contemplates, and that defendant is not therefore liable for the medical expenses that he incurred. We have examined the case de novo, and our conclusion is the same as that arrived at by the trial court.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

NOTE.

The liability under Workmen's Compensation Statutes of employer or insurance carrier for medical or hospital aid furnished to an injured employee is discussed in the annotation beginning on page 545, post. The great weight of authority sustains the position of the court in the reported case (RADIL v. MORRIS & Co. ante, 539), to the effect that the employer or insurance carrier cannot be held liable for medical services to an employee who has refused the offer of the employer and obtained service and medicines elsewhere.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Harold J. Quinlan for respondent.

Mr. Wilson H. Pierce, for claimant:

Under the provisions of § 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act of Connecticut, as amended in 1917, providing for the furnishing of medical and surgical aid to an injured employee by his employer, appellant owes to claimant the legal duty of providing for the latter an artificial leg.

time and by the same accident, during the continuance of such incapacity not to exceed the period prescribed by law.

Wheeler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On September 26, 1916, the claimant suffered the injuries described below by being thrown from a horse. His left leg was so lacerated that it had to be amputated above the knee. His shoulder was so injured as to cause a partial incapacity equal to one half total incapacity from the date of the injury to the time of the hearing, May 9, 1917, and it continued thereafter. The commissioner included in his award compensation at the rate of $7.50 a week for 182 weeks, credit to be taken for payments already made; also, $3.75 a week for the partial incapacity resulting from an injury to the shoulder, to continue during such incapacity, not to exceed the time provided by law; also, $115, being the price of an artificial leg. The respondent appealed from so much of the award as gave compensation for the partial incapacity to the shoulder and that for the price of an artificial leg.

The questions submitted on the reservation were the following: (1) Whether or not the Workmen's Compensation Act of the state of Connecticut imposes a legal duty upon the appellant to purchase for the appellee an artificial leg in accordance with the provisions of § 7 of part B of that act, as amended in 1917, as a part of the surgical service and aid therein provided for. (2) Whether or not, under the provisions of said act, upon the foregoing facts, the appellant, respondent, is legally obliged to pay to appellee, claimant, compensation for partial incapacity arising from the injury to claimant's (appellee's) shoulder, in addition to the specific indemnity for the loss of the appellee's leg.

In Franko v. William Schollhorn Co. 93 Conn. 13, 104 Atl. 485, just decided, we construed § 11 (Rev. 1918, § 5331) of our act as providing one form of compensation during total incapacity and another for the permanent loss of a member of the body. The injury to the shoulder was a distinct injury, resulting in partial incapacity; the loss of the leg was also a distinct injury, resulting in total incapacity. For each injury, under our construction of this section, the injured employee was entitled to compensation. The fact that each injury resulted from one accident did not make

compensation—
for total and

of these a single injury. Nor did the act intend that compensation for the loss of a member should be in lieu of all compensation for other injuries resulting from one accident. The superior court in New Haven county, in Foley v. Demarest & Company, pointed out with great force that a contrary construction, carried to its logical conclusion, might limit the compensation in a case of total incapacity to practically nothing. As that court said: "An injury attended with blood poisoning might incapacitate for an entire year, and the injured person would be entitled to compensation for that period, provided no amputation were necessary; but, if such injury was attended with the loss even of a small toe or the phalanx of the fourth finger, compensation would be limited to from six to thirteen weeks." Our act does not permit double compensation, and hence the trial court was correct in making these awards consecutive; the award for the total incapacity to precede in payment that for the partial incapacity.

The agreed facts on the reservation fall far short of those found by the commissioner. Who furnished the surgeon does not appear in the agreed statement, nor whether he found the artificial leg "reasonable or necessary." The commissioner found as a fact, upon evidence, that "surgical aid" included an artificial leg. There is no such finding in the agreed facts. We are left with the bald question whether surgical aid or service includes the furnishing of an artificial leg.

There is no specific provision for the furnishing of medicines or any material or apparatus required by the physician. Yet it is clear that all these are included in the term "medical aid or service." It must also be clear that all necessary bandages, materials, splints, and apparatus required by the surgeon in effecting a cure are included under the term "surgical aid or service." The fact is that § 7, as amended by § 2 of chapter 368 of the Public Acts of 1917 (Rev. 1918, § 5347), is general in its terms and purposely so. In the New York act (Consol. Laws, chap. 67), there is a specification of various things to be furnished. We adopted a different course, and in our act used general terms, intending, as we think, to include all things which might reasonably fall within its provisions. The employer is required to furnish the employee a physician, and, in addition, "such medical and surgical aid or hospital service as such physician or surgeon shall deem reasonable or necessary." This language is broad and general. "Medical aid" is relief pertaining to the science of medicine. And "surgical aid" is relief pertaining to surgery or used in surgery. Webster's New Int. Dict. The term in its ordinary significance is not limited to the personal service of the surgeon, but includes all the means and instrumentalities used in surgery which will help effect a cure. Splints and crutches and apparatus for holding the limb manifestly are brought to the patient by the surgeon, adjusted by him, and usually paid for directly by the patient. It is part of the duty of the surgeon to prepare the stump of arm or leg for the artificial arm or leg. It is a part of his duty to adjust it. Why give the patient splints to hold the bones in place or crutches with which to walk, and regard these as used in surgery? Why supply a glass eye? Because it is the everyday duty of the surgeon to order these things for his patient, and they are included as of course under "surgical aid."

artificial limb.

There is no difference in principle between supplying these and the artificial limb. That pertains to surgery and is used in surgery. The stump must be prepared by the surgeon to receive the artificial limb, and that must be adjusted to the stump by the surgeon. The only difference between the crutch and the artificial limb is that the latter costs more than the former.

Our act contemplates the furnishing of all the medical and surgical aid that is reasonable and necessary. The purpose of this provision is to restore the injured employee to a place in our industrial life as soon as possible by the use of all medical and surgical aid and hospital service which the ordinary usages of the modern science of medicine and surgery furnish. Humanity and economic necessity in this instance are in harmony in working for the accomplishment of the individual and of the public welfare. "Surgical aid" is a term of technical significance and has an established meaning in standard works on surgery. The duty of the surgeon does not end with the healing of the stump. "As soon as all sensitiveness has left the end of the bone, an artificial limb should be fitted and the patient urged to make efforts to use the extremity." 5 Keen's Surgery, p. 951. The duty of the surgeon continues until the artificial limb is adjusted and the patient has learned how, with the help of the surgeon, to use it properly. It would not be questioned that the entire bill of the surgeon for his services would fall under the head of "Surgical Aid." It would be difficult to justify this expenditure, as well as that for bandages or ointments or other material used by the surgeon in his treatment of the patient, and not make a like expenditure for the artificial leg in connection with which these things were used.

The commissioner notes that, as a rule, insurers and insurance companies furnish under compensation acts artificial teeth, eyes, and limbs when required. Undoubtedly, the common understanding revolted at the failure to provide the only means by which the injured employee could be restored to the ranks of industry; and perhaps those in interest also had in mind the small cost of an artificial limb and the fact that the compensation awarded by our act was much less than in many other jurisdictions,—a fact due in some measure to the complete aid which the act gives to the cure of the injured.

Judgment is advised, in accordance with the foregoing opinion, dismissing appeal. In this opinion the other Judges concurred, except Prentice, Ch. J., who dissented as to the artificial leg.

Prentice, Ch. J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in that portion of the majority opinion which approves of the commissioner's allowance for an artificial leg as one justified by the provision of the statute requiring an employer to furnish an injured employee such surgical aid as the attending physician or surgeon shall deem reasonable. To my thinking the provision of artificial limbs for the improvement of physical efficiency following such repair of the consequences of injuries received as the circumstances will permit lies outside the sphere of the surgeon's professional activities as that sphere is commonly understood and established by actual practice. Such provision, as I understand it, partakes of the character of mechanical, rather than surgical, aid. I am further of the opinion that if it was the legislative intent to impose the burden of supplying such appliances upon the employer, more appropriate and certain language to that end would have been employed and some attempt made to assure the use of the money exacted of the employer for the purpose intended and to prevent its diversion to other purposes or squandered as the employee may prefer.

ANNOTATION.

Workmen's compensation: liability of employer or insurance company for medical and hospital aid furnished to injured employee.

With some exceptions noted below, Compensation Statutes generally contain provisions with reference to the furnishing by the employer or insurance carrier of necessary medical and surgical aid to injured employees. The employer is given the privilege, however, in the first instance, of selecting the physician or hospital to render the necessary service, and the employee may select his own physician or hospital only where, after proper notice, the employer refuses or fails to furnish it.

Thus, the intent of the compensation act obviously is that the employer shall, in the first instance, have the right to designate and select the physicians who are to give treatment to the employee; the latter is authorized to make his own selection at the expense of the employer, only where the employer has neglected or refused to provide the necessary service. Leadbettor v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1918) — Cal. —, 177 Pac. 449.

So, although an injured employee is entitled to medical, surgical, and other necessary treatment for sixty days after the accident, at the expense of the employer, the employer has the right to select the attending physician and the hospital. Junk v. Terry & T. Co. (1917) 176 App. Div. 855, 163 N. Y. Supp. 836.

"It is only where the employer fails to provide a physician after a request by the employee that the latter may employ a physician at the expense of his employer." Goldflam v. Kazemier & Uhl (1917) 181 App. Div. 140, 168 N. Y. Supp. 87.

An employer is liable for medical and hospital services during the remaining twenty days of the three-week period, where, within twenty-four hours after the accident, he was notified of it, told where the workman was,

and that he desired aid, but at no time furnished, or offered to furnish, workman any free medical or hospital services or medicine for his injury. GAGE v. PONTIAC STATE HOSPITAL (reported herewith) ante, 533.

The word "furnish," as used in the Massachusetts act, was defined in Panasuk's Case (1914) 217 Mass. 589, 105 N. E. 368, 5 N. C. C. A. 688, as meaning "something more than a passive willingness to respond to a demand. It implies some degree of active effort to bring to the injured person the required humanitarian relief."

These words import, again says the Massachusetts court in Ripley's Case (1918) 229 Mass. 302, 118 N. E. 638, "that some arrangement must be made in advance in the ordinary case, or at least that someone be at hand with authority to make the arrangement for medical relief."

Of course, the employer cannot be held liable for medical services in a case in which he has no knowledge at all that such services are required.

Thus, there does not rest upon the employer a duty to tender or supply additional medical treatment where the only knowledge which he possessed of the need of such treatment was a letter received from the employee in which there was a clear inference that the service had already been rendered, and the employee was merely interested in knowing whether or not the insurance company would pay the bill. Leadbetter v. Industrial Acci. Commission (Cal.) supra.

And under the Texas act an injured employee cannot recover for medical aid where the insurer was not notified of the injury and given an opportunity to furnish his own physician. American Indemnity Co. v. Nelson (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 201 S. W. 686.

But the employer is not in a position to claim that there was no demand for medical assistance, where he knew that the injured employee was in the hospital and paid the bill there. Junk v. Terry & T. Co. (1917) 176 App. Div. 855, 163 N. Y. Supp. 836.

As a result of the privilege given the employer of selecting the physician or hospital to care for the injured employee, it necessarily follows that the employer cannot be held liable in a case in which the employee refuses unreasonably to accept the services of the designated physician or hospital.

Thus, an employer is not liable for the services of a physician who attended an injured employee, when the latter arbitrarily refused to accept the services of a prominent physician and surgeon who had been provided by the defendant, and who attended the injured employee for several days immediately following the injury. Keigher v. General Electric Co. (1916) 173 App. Div. 207, 158 N. Y. Supp. 939.

So, an employee is not entitled to an award for hospital services, where he went to a hospital of his own choosing, although the employer's physician had directed him to go to another hospital, and had given him in writing the address of such other hospital. Cella v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1918) — Cal. App. —, 177 Pac. 490.

And there can be no award for medical attendance in a case in which the injured employee did not seek aid from the employer, but secured a physician of his own choosing. Swift & Co. v. Industrial Commission (1919) 288 Ill. 182, 123 N. E. 267.

Under the Nebraska act, an employer who offers to furnish, without charge, to an injured employee the reasonable services of a competent physician, and medicine as and when needed, and within the value and for the time contemplated by the act, cannot be held liable for such services by such employee, who has refused the offer of the employer and obtained services and medicine elsewhere. RADIL v. MORRIS & Co. (reported herewith) ante, 539.

Under the Massachusetts act an employee cannot recover for the services of a physician called by him, where the company had posted notices that only the services of certain physicians would be paid for, and the employee could read and understand the notices; and it is immaterial that the charges of the physician called by the employee were reasonable. Pecott's

Case (1916) 223 Mass. 546, 112 N. E. 217.

So, too, the insurer is not liable for the services of a physician selected by the employee where it had made arrangements with a hospital to furnish to employees injured in the course of their work necessary medical and physical treatment, and notices to this effect were posted conspicuously in different places in the factory of the insured employer, and the employee immediately, upon being injured, was urged to go to the designated hospital. Re Davidson (1917) 228 Mass. 257, 117 N. E. 310.

An employee is not entitled to hospital expenses, where, after spending some time in an emergency hospital to which he was first taken after the injury, he went to a hospital of his own selection, although, upon complaining to the employer, the latter offered to take him to another hospital. Junk v. Terry & T. Co. (1917) 176 App. Div. 855, 163 N. Y. Supp. 836.

In a few exceptional cases the injured employee has been held entitled to an award for the services of a physician or hospital of his own selection, notwithstanding the employer has designated otherwise.

Thus, an injured employee is justified in going to a family physician for treatment, where he was dissatisfied with the advice given him by the surgeon first selected by the insurance company, and, after being directed to go to another surgeon, finds the surgeon thus suggested to be out of town. Massachusetts Bonding & Ins. Co. v. Pillsbury (1915) 170 Cal. 767, 151 Pac. 419, 11 N. C. C. A. 426.

So, although a workman is not permitted generally to select his own physician or hospital, but is required to accept that which is provided for him by the employer, yet, in the case of an ignorant foreigner, unable to read, write, or understand the English language, who was not informed as to what he should do in case of injury, the employer will be required to pay the physician to whom he went, for necessary service rendered him. Panasuk's Case (1914) 217 Mass. 589, 105 N. E. 368, 5 N. C. C. A. 688.

The right of an injured employee to procure medical and surgical treatment for himself at the expense of the employer exists under the Wisconsin act for the reasonable time after the injury required to afford the employer opportunity to exercise his privilege; it is then suspended if the employer exercises such privilege, but revives and relates back to the time of suspension if necessary if the employer unreasonably neglects or refuses to exercise such privilege. Milwaukee v. Miller (1913) 154 Wis. 652, L.R.A. 1916A, 1, 144 N. W. 188, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 847, 4 N. C. C. A. 149.

In cases of pressing emergency an employee may procure medical or hospital services at the employer's expense without notifying the employer.

Thus, in GAGE v. PONTIAC STATE HOSPITAL (reported herewith) ante, 533, the court held that the employer was liable for services rendered to an injured employee where he, upon reaching home after the injury, was not in a physical or mental condition to act, and his wife did not know that he had been injured, but believed that he was sick, and summoned the family physician, who hurried the workman to a hospital, where he was immediately operated upon for strangulated hernia, and the evidence showed that had there been the delay incident upon notifying the employer of his condition, the injury might have been fatal. The court said: "Unquestionably that construction of the statute is logical, and the adopted rule sound, which requires notice and opportunity to the employer to select the physician and furnish the needed service during the prescribed three weeks before the injured party can secure the same at the employer's expense, but in the many complications which arise in industrial activities it is not an unreasonable or strained construction of the statute, in view of its purpose, to recognize as inferable exceptions in extraordinary cases where the surrounding circumstances and critical condition of the injured party present emergencies or exigencies demanding prompt action, which reasonably warrant the injured party in securing the then-needed service at the employer's expense without first giving notice and opportunity to furnish or offer the same. Such cases are, of course, distinctively exceptional and consequently rare. Where such exception is claimed, the question of a pressing necessity demanding and excusing prompt action before reasonable time for notice and opportunity thereafter for the employer to act becomes primarily an issue of fact."

In one case a question as to the liability for the services of a nurse as distinct from medical services was raised.

Thus, the Wisconsin statute does not provide for a separate allowance for the expense of a nurse as such; during the ninety-day period in which the injured employee is entitled to the services of a physician, an allowance for services of a nurse may be made only as a part of reasonably necessary medical and surgical treatment, proved to be such by the physician and surgeon in attendance; after the ninety-day period, expense for services of a nurse is not chargeable to the employer except as reflected in the allowance of the maximum percentage of disability indemnity. Milwaukee v. Miller (Wis.) supra.

The decision in OLMSTEAD v. LAMPHIER (reported herewith) ante, 542, to the effect that the "surgical aid" to which an injured employee is entitled under the Connecticut act includes an artificial limb if such an appliance is necessary, should be compared with the decision of the appellate division of the supreme court of New York in Kunasek v. New York Consol. Card Co. (1916) 176 App. Div. 135, 162 N. Y. Supp. 361, in which it was held that an employer cannot be required to furnish an artificial arm for an employee since such an artificial arm cannot be considered as included in the phrase "apparatus" as used in § 13 of the New York act, providing that the employer shall properly provide for an injured employee such medical or surgical attendance or treatment, nurse and hospital services, medicines, crutches, and apparatus as may be required or requested by the employee. It is to be noted that the language in the Connecticut statute is very general, while that of the New York statute specifies particularly the kind of service to be rendered to the injured employee.

The Pennsylvania statute provides that if the employee shall refuse reasonable surgical, medical, and hospital services, etc., tendered to him by his employer, he shall forfeit all right to compensation for any injury or for any increase in his incapacity shown to have resulted from such refusal. Under this provision it was held in Neary v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. (1919) 264 Pa. 221, 107 Atl. 696, that an employee's right to compensation is not affected by his act in putting himself in charge of his own physician after receiving the services of the employer's physician for a number of days, where there was no evidence at all that his incapacity was in any way increased by the change of physicians.

The statutes usually fix a time limit within which the employer is required to furnish medical aid to the employee.

Thus, the Industrial Accident Board cannot make an allowance for medical and hospital services for more than three weeks after the accident. McMullen v. Gavette Constr. Co. (1918) 200 Mich. 203, 166 N. W. 1019.

So, under the Nebraska act an injured employee is not entitled to medical expenses after the first three weeks after the injury, although such medical expenses were subsequently incurred after blood poisoning had developed from the wound. Epsten v. Hancock-Epsten Co. (1917) 101 Neb. 442, 163 N. W. 767, 15 N. C. C. A. 1067.

After the thirty-day period no obligation rests upon the employer to furnish an attending physician, and the Industrial Board has no authority or discretionary power by which it may require such service after the expiration of said period. Re Henderson (1917) — Ind. App. —, 116 N. E. 315; Born & Co. v. Durr (1917) — Ind. App. —, 116 N. E. 428.

Under the Massachusetts act the medical service to be furnished by the employer is limited to two weeks after the injury or incapacity except in "unusual cases" when, in the discretion of the board, it may be extended.

However, the case of an employee who, two weeks after his injury, was able to go from his own home to that of a physician for treatment, is not an "unusual case" within the meaning of this provision. Huxen's Case (1917) 226 Mass. 292, 115 N. E. 426.

An employer may, by his act, obligate himself to pay for medical services beyond the statutory period.

Thus, the statement by the employer to a physician to take the injured employee to the hospital, give him close attention, and do the best that can be done for him, together with the employer's knowledge of the serious character of the injury, and the apparent solicitude of the employer about the treatment of the employee both before and after the expiration of the thirty-day period, warrants the inference that the employer intended to be liable for the treatments after such thirty-day period. Re Myers (1917) — Ind. App. —, 116 N. E. 314.

So, where the employer duly authorizes treatment by a physician of an injured employee beyond the first thirty days after his injury, the insurance carrier under the provisions of the Indiana act is liable therefor, and such claim may be enforced by the physician against the insurance carrier. Kirkoff Bros. & McElwaine v. McCool (1917) — Ind. App. —, 116 N. E. 439.

And an insurance carrier is, under the Indiana statute, liable for the services of a physician rendered beyond the first thirty days after the injury by authorization of the employer, where such services were absolutely necessary to effect a cure. Re Kelley (1917) — Ind. App. —, 116 N. E. 306.

In a case which is not "unusual" within the meaning of the Massachusetts act requiring the insurer to furnish medical services after the first two weeks' period, if the insurer agrees to pay $1 a visit for the services of a physician, and the latter, with knowledge of this offer, continues to render service to the injured employee, he does so upon the terms offered by

And an employer cannot escape liability for services which could have been and should have been rendered to the employee within the period, merely by delay in the rendering of such service.

Thus, in Re Henderson (1917) — Ind. App. —, 116 N. E. 315, the court said: "So, if in this case the Industrial Board is of the opinion that the evidence before it shows that the emergency for the amputation of the employee's foot arose before the expiration of said thirty-day period, and that such amputation should have been and could have been performed before the expiration thereof, and that the employer was responsible for the delay that prevented the amputation before the expiration of such period, the board would be authorized, under the section of the act in question, in holding such employer liable for any surgical or hospital service and supplies that were in fact furnished or might have been furnished within said period, notwithstanding the employer's said notice, and notwithstanding such service may not have been in fact furnished, until after the expiration of said period."

There is a conflict of opinion as to the time when the period within which the employer must furnish medical aid to the injured employee begins to run.

Under the Indiana act the employer is liable for medical and hospital services reasonably required by an injured workman within the thirty-day period after the happening of the "injury;" and it has been held that the "injury" referred to in this provision means the occurrence of the disability, and not merely the occurrence of the accident, so that in a case in which the employee suffers from an accident which neither he nor the employer believes serious enough to require medical aid at the time, but thereafter disability results therefrom, the employer may be liable for medical aid although the thirty-day period has elapsed since the accident. Re McCaskey (1917) — Ind. App. —, 117 N. E. 268, 15 N. C. C. A. 113; John A. Shumaker Co. v. Ken-

In the latter case, the court said: "When the injury resulting from an accident is such that both the injured employee and the employer at the time regard and treat it as one of little or no consequence, and as not requiring the attention of a physician, and as not of the kind or character contemplated by the act, and later developments show an injury which does fall within the scope of said act, and one which does require the services of a physician or surgeon, the date for computing the time from which medical attention must be furnished in such a case, as in all others, is the date when the 'injury' develops within the meaning of the act, and this is so even though the development of such an injury is delayed thirty days or more after the happening of the accident which causes it."

The Massachusetts act expressly provides that the period begins from the time of the injury or from the time of the incapacity, if the incapacity does not immediately develop after the injury. Huxen's Case (1917) 226 Mass. 292, 115 N. E. 426.

A different rule, however, prevails in some states.

Thus, the three weeks after the accident during which the employer is required to furnish medical and hospital services for an injured employee begins to run at the time of the accident, and not from the time when the seriousness of the injury becomes known to the plaintiff. McMullen v. Gavette Constr. Co. (1918) 200 Mich. 203, 166 N. W. 1019.

So, a rule of the Commission that an award shall include medical services for two weeks after the "disability" is inconsistent with the statute which provides that medical services shall be rendered for two weeks after the "injury." McKenna's Case (1918) 117 Me. 179, 103 Atl. 69.

If the employer has furnished medical service at the time of the accident, he is not liable for medical services furnished more than thirty days thereafter, notwithstanding there later developed, as a direct result of the accident, a more serious condition, which was not susceptible of diagnosis and treatment during the period of the first attendance of the physician. John A. Shumaker Co. v. Kendrew (1918) — Ind. App. —, 120 N. E. 722.

The approval of the Industrial Accident Board is not required for a bill for professional attendance by a physician upon an employee after the expiration of the two-week period, since the Massachusetts act applies in no way to arrangements for professional attendance between a physician and an employee, for which the employee is liable and the insurer is not. Holland v. Zeuner (1917) 228 Mass. 142, 117 N. E. 1.

Under the Illinois statute, the total amount which can be awarded for first aid, medical, surgical, and hospital services, is the sum of $200. Butler Street Foundry & Iron Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1917) 277 Ill. 70, 115 N. E. 122, 15 N. C. C. A. 486; Crescent Coal Co. v. Industrial Commission (1918) 286 Ill. 102, 121 N. E. 171.

In Villalobos v. Cudahy Packing Co. (1919) 105 Kan. 106, 181 Pac. 599, an award of $150 for doctor's bills and hospital and medical bills was sustained where the hospital and medicine bills amounted to $87, and one physician testified that charges for his services would probably run from $50 to $75.

The burden of proof to establish to reasonable certainty the reasonableness of charges for medical and surgical treatment secured by the employee himself is upon the employee. Milwaukee v. Miller (1913) 154 Wis. 652, L.R.A.1916A, 1, 144 N. W. 188, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 847, 4 N. C. C. A. 149.

A number of cases have passed upon the manner of enforcing an award for medical and hospital bills.

There is no authority in the New York Compensation Act for bringing a separate and independent action to recover necessary medical, surgical, or hospital services to an injured employee, which the employer has failed to furnish; the Industrial Commission has power to make an award for such services, to be recovered as a part of the compensation awarded. Semmen

v. Butterick Pub. Co. (1917) 101 Misc. 285, 166 N. Y. Supp. 993. To the same effect Goldflam v. Kazemier & Uhl (1917) 181 App. Div. 140, 168 N. Y. Supp. 87.

So, a physician has no cause of action against an employer for services rendered to an injured employee, although the award of compensation to the employee included an allowance for the physician's services and the injured employee had assigned the award to the physician. Bloom v. Jaffe (1916) 94 Misc. 222, 157 N. Y. Supp. 926.

The enforcement of any claim for compensation or for services of a physician in attending an injured employee is not by an action by the employee or by the physician, but by an action "to be instituted by the Commission in the name of the people of the state." Hirsch v. Zurich General Acci. & Liability Ins. Co. (1916) 97 Misc. 360, 161 N. Y. Supp. 380.

The New York statute does not provide for any award to a physician who has attended an injured employee, but it merely gives him a lien upon the compensation awarded to the workman. Bloom v. Jaffe (N. Y.) supra.

Where a hospital brings an action against employers for the care of an injured employee, basing the action upon contract, it cannot rely upon the terms and conditions of the Compensation Act. Homeopathic Hospital v. Chalmers (1916) 94 Misc. 600, 157 N. Y. Supp. 1000.

So, no right of recovery exists under the Illinois statute for injuries to the workman, because of the failure of the employer to furnish medical or hospital services, since no such right of recovery is given by the provisions of the statute. Hill v. Kerens-Donnewald Coal Co. (1918) 210 Ill. App. 560.

So, too, an employee cannot recover, under the Alaska act, for the employer's neglect to furnish him timely and sufficient surgical aid and medical and hospital care, since injury due to such neglect does not arise out of, and in the course of, the employment. Ellamar Min. Co. v. Possus (1918) 159 C. C. A. 474, 247 Fed. 420.

In proceedings to recover compensation under the Minnesota act, where the joint answer of the employer and insurer alleged that defendants were ready and willing to pay plaintiff the compensation due him under the act, and willing to pay reasonable hospital and medical expenses, the plaintiff is not obliged to prove compliance with the provisions of the act necessary to make the insurer liable directly to him, and the defendants are barred from resisting the claim for medical expenses set up in the complaint on the ground that their own physician was ready to perform the services. State ex rel. Globe Indemnity Co. v. District Ct. (1917) 136 Minn. 147, 161 N. W. 391.

A number of cases upon various points of practice and procedure follow:

An action under an elective act is based on contract so that a count on the act and one on a contract made between the employer and employee with reference to benefits and hospital care may be joined in the same complaint. Ellamar Min. Co. v. Possus (Fed.) supra. The court distinguished between the Alaska act and the Washington act, and held that under the former act any recovery for failure of the employer to take proper care of the employee after his injury cannot be recovered, in a count based on the act.

In the absence of an application for reimbursement for expenditures for funeral services the Commission has no jurisdiction to make an allowance to a third person upon the sole ground that in the course of the proceeding it appeared that he, a stranger to the record, had made such disbursements. Western Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 35 Cal. App. 104, 169 Pac. 261.

An award cannot be made "for services in the matter of the funeral and burial" of a deceased workman where there is nothing whatever in the record to indicate that the claimant had paid, or become liable for the payment of, any part of any funeral expenses, or had ever made any claim to that effect. Tirre v. Bush Terminal Co. (1916) 172 App. Div. 886, 158 N. Y. Supp. 883, 12 N. C. C. A. 64.

So, under the California act, an award of physician's fees to be paid by the employer or insurer "to the persons entitled to receive the same" is invalid, since it does not fix the amount to be paid nor the names of the persons entitled thereto. Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury (1915) 171 Cal. 319, 153 Pac. 24.

Since the fees to a physician awarded under the Massachusetts act are to be fixed by a committee of arbitration in case of disagreement, it seems to follow necessarily from the terms of the act that where the physician is a party interested in that matter, he may be a party to the proceeding. Huxen's Case (1917) 226 Mass. 292, 115 N. E. 426.

In an employee's proceeding for compensation, issues upon a contract between the insurer and the hospital and doctors, to which the employee was not a party, have no place. Hull v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. (1918) 102 Neb. 246, 166 N. W. 628.

The mere fact that an injured employee did not pay a hospital for services rendered to him during the first two weeks after the accident, for which, under the Compensation Act, the insurer is liable, is not evidence that he elected to proceed under the act, where he did not refuse to pay for those services, had never been asked to pay for them, and it did not appear that the hospital authorities ever regarded him as responsible therefor. Wahlberg v. Bowen (1918) 229 Mass. 335, 118 N. E. 645.

The fact that the insurance carrier paid the doctors and the infirmary does not estop him from setting up the contention that no claim for compensation had been filed unless the payment was made with some representation by him justifying the claimant in a belief that his claim had been filed or would be filed with the Commission. Twonko v. Rome Brass & Copper Co. (1918) 224 N. Y. 263, 120 N. E. 638.

Neither the payment by the employer of the physician's bill for attendance during the first two weeks of disability after the accident, nor an agreement between the employer and the employee that there shall be "no compensation," can properly be called an agreement such as may be reviewed by the court of common pleas under the authority of paragraph 21st of the New Jersey act, on the ground that the incapacity of the injured employee had subsequently increased or diminished. Benjamin & Johns v. Brabban (1917) 90 N. J. L. 355, 103 Atl. 688, affirmed for reasons given below in (1919) 92 N. J. L. 508, 105 Atl. 717.

An award of compensation is not vitiated by the inclusion of a gratuitous suggestion or recommendation that the employer render to the employee certain medical service in excess of that required by the statute to be furnished. Marshall v. Ransome Concrete Co. (1917) 33 Cal. App. 782, 166 Pac. 846.

In State ex rel. Griffiths v. Superior Ct. (1916) 92 Wash. 44, 159 Pac. 101, the supreme court authorized the printing of a proposed initiative measure upon the ballot, which measure provided that surgical and hospital services of injured employees should be provided for out of the state insurance fund.

The Indiana statute authorizes an appeal from an order of the Industrial Board allowing and approving the claim of a physician for services. Kirkoff Bros. & McElwaine v. McCool (1917) — Ind. App. —, 116 N. E. 439.

And under the California act an award for medical bills for claims to be approved by the Commission is not a final judgment subject to review in the court. Garratt-Callahan Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1915) 171 Cal. 334, 153 Pac. 239.

The finding of the Industrial Accident Board that the employer or insurer had made no provision to furnish medical treatment for the injured employee must be accepted as a fact if there was any evidence by which to support it. Ripley's Case (1918) 229 Mass. 302, 118 N. E. 638.

In a few statutes there are no provisions with reference to the payment of medical or hospital bills for an injured employee.

The Kansas act contemplates no allowance on account of medical attendance except where a workman dies as a result of his injuries leaving no dependents. Cain v. National Zinc Co. (1915) 94 Kan. 679, 146 Pac. 1165, 148 Pac. 251.

A similar rule prevailed in New Jersey prior to the amendment of 1914. Central R. Co. v. Kellett (1914) 86 N. J. L. 84, 90 Atl. 1005, 5 N. C. C. A. 529; Taylor v. Seabrook (1915) 87 N. J. L. 407, 94 Atl. 399, 11 N. C. C. A. 710; Hammill v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1915) 87 N. J. L. 388, 94 Atl. 313.

The provision of the Kansas act that "in fixing the amount of the payment, allowance shall be made for any payment or benefits which the workman may receive from the employer during his period of incapacity," authorizes an allowance for hospital charges of a reasonable amount actually and necessarily incurred for the benefit of the workman and paid by the employer. Bundy v. Petroleum Products Co. (1918) 103 Kan. 40, — A.L.R. —, 172 Pac. 1020.

So, under the same provision, an allowance for hospital charges and medical attendance of a reasonable amount actually incurred by the employer for the benefit of the workman is proper, and where the employer has been rendered liable for such expenses, the court is justified in ordering a stay of execution until the charges are paid and the employer released from liability. Gadberry v.

Hutchinson Egg Case Filler Co. (1919) 104 Kan. 72, 177 Pac. 834.

Under the English act the employer is required to pay hospital or medical expenses only in case of the death of the employee leaving no dependents; under such circumstances the employer is liable for the reasonable expenses of medical attendance and burial, not exceeding £10.

Expenses paid by an employer for treatment given to an injured workman at a hospital may be deducted from the compensation paid to the workman. Suleman v. The Ben Lomond (1909; County Ct.) 126 L. T. Jo. (Eng.) 308, 2 B. W. C. C. 499.

Maintenance and medical treatment received by an injured employee in a hospital, which were subsequently paid for by the employer, may be found to be a benefit received by the employee during the period of incapacity, for which deduction may be made from the amount of compensation payable. Sorensen v. Gaff [1912] S. C. 1163, 49 Scot. L. R. 896, [1912] 2 Scot. L. T. 137, 6 B. W. C. C. 279.

Under the Quebec act an employer is not responsible for medical aid furnished to a workman, where the injury does not result in death, but if he voluntarily pays out money for that purpose he cannot deduct it from the amount of compensation payable to the injured employee. St. Maurice Lumber Co. v. Cadorette (1916) Rap. Jud. Quebec 25 B. R. 410. W. M. G.

G. M. PETERSON et al.

(136 Ark. 72, 206 S. W. 55.)

Evidence — adjudication of insanity — conclusiveness.

1. An adjudication of lunacy is not conclusive, but prima facie evidence only, that insanity continues up to the time of making a subsequent contract, and one dealing with the lunatic may show that at the time of making the contract he had sufficient mental capacity to make it.

Incompetent person — contract — validity.

2. A contract by an insane person is voidable only, and not void.

— ratification of contract.

3. A conveyance by an insane person may be ratified by him after he is restored to reason.

[See 14 R. C. L. 595.]

Evidence — delay in suit to set aside deed.

4. Delay of two years after restoration to sanity, before institution of suit, by one who had conveyed property while insane, to set aside the deed, may be considered upon the question of confirmation of the conveyance.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Lonoke Chancery Court (Martineau, Ch.) dismissing the complaint in a suit to cancel a deed. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Charles A. Walls and W. A. Leach for appellees.

Hart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the chancery court in the case of Victor Daughtry, as next friend of Linn C. Eagle, against G. M. Peterson, W. H. Young, J. V. Ferguson, and W. C. Ferguson. The object of the suit was to annul a deed executed by Linn C. Eagle to G. M. Peterson in March, 1912, and subsequent deeds to the same property from Peterson to Young, and deeds from Young to the Fergusons to a part of said property. Linn C. Eagle owned a large quantity of lands in Lonoke county, Arkansas, which he inherited from his father. On the 1st day of March, 1912, Linn C. Eagle conveyed 240 acres of these lands to G. M. Peterson. In June, 1912, Peterson conveyed the land to W. H. Young for a consideration of $925. Young subsequently conveyed a part of the lands to J. V. Ferguson, and a part of them to W. C. Ferguson. The lands were wild and unimproved at the time of the conveyance by Eagle to Peterson. Since that time a county road has been laid out across them, and they are within the boundaries of a drainage district which has greatly increased their value. Linn C. Eagle was about thirty-two years old at the time he executed the deed to Peterson, and had been, since early manhood, a confirmed drunkard and addicted to the use of morphine. In July, 1908, Linn C. Eagle was adjudged insane by the probate court of Lonoke county, and a guardian of his estate was appointed. There being no room in the state hospital for nervous diseases for him, the probate court ordered Eagle to be confined in a private hospital in the city of Little Rock. Eagle remained in this hospital for something over two months, when his brother procured his release from custody from the owner of the hospital. After his discharge from this private hospital, Eagle took charge of his own business affairs and has continued to have charge of them ever since. His guardian filed his final account current and was discharged in the year 1909.

Evidence was adduced by Eagle tending to show that he was insane from the excessive use of intoxicating liquors and morphine at the time he executed the deed to Peterson. On the other hand, evidence was adduced tending to show that he was mentally competent to transact business at that time. For the reasons given in the course of the opinion, it will not be necessary to abstract this testimony in detail.

Peterson was in the employment of Eagle at the time the deed was executed to him. Soon after the execution of the deed by Eagle to Peterson, Eagle removed to the state of Oklahoma, and remained there until some time in the fall of 1912, when he returned to his old home in Lonoke county. On his return he found that Peterson had left there, and his whereabouts have since been unknown.

According to the testimony of Young, Peterson first asked him $1,500 for the land, but he declined to give that much. They finally agreed on $925, which was about one half of the real value of the land. During their negotiations Peterson wrote to the state of Oklahoma, where Eagle then resided, and got his affidavit to cure a defect in the title of the land. After Eagle returned, either in the fall of 1912 or in the spring of 1913, he went into the bank of which Young was cashier and asked to see the affidavit which he had made in regard to the title. Young showed the affidavit to Eagle, and also showed him the deed which he had received to the land from Peterson. Eagle told Young that the sale of the land was all right, but that Peterson owed him some money, and that he was hunting for him to make him pay it. Young also testified that he had never heard that Eagle claimed that fraud had been practised on him with regard to the execution of the deed until after the suit was brought.

According to the testimony of Eagle, his mind was so deranged by the excessive use of whisky and morphine at the time he executed the deed to Peterson in March, 1912, that he did not know what he was doing. He thought he was executing to Peterson an option deed, or was giving Peterson the power to sell the land for him. He never received any compensation from Peterson, and, according to his own testimony and that of other witnesses, it was well known that Peterson did not have any money at that time. It was shown by witnesses for the defendants that Peterson had some money at the time the transaction took place. Eagle testified that he signed the affidavit to cure a defect in the title, thinking it was necessary in order to enable Peterson to sell the land for him. He quit the use of morphine in August, 1912, and thereafter, to a great extent, also quit the excessive use of whisky. He returned to Arkansas in the fall of 1912 to see about his affairs. He testified that he had never done or said anything to ratify the sale of the land to Young, and that Young knew that Peterson had never had money enough to buy the land from him, and that Young told him that he knew Peterson had never in reality owned the land.

The record shows that in 1908 Linn C. Eagle resided in Lonoke county, and that he was adjudged insane by the probate court and ordered to be confined in a private hospital. He was released from the hospital in about two months, but there was never any order of the court that he had been restored to his right mind.

Under this state of the record it is earnestly insisted by counsel for the plaintiff that an adjudication of insanity substitutes for the general presumption of sanity a presumption of insanity, and that contracts made by the insane person before he has been adjudged to be restored to reason are void, and not merely voidable. Hence they contend that, under the facts of the present case, it was incompetent to show that Eagle was capable of contracting at the time he executed the deed to Peterson. The authorities on this point are in conflict. In many of the states, by statute, the contracts of a person who has been judicially declared insane and placed under guardianship, made before an order that such person has been restored to his right mind, are absolutely void.

There is no statute of this kind in this state.

It is a matter of common observation and experience that many persons who are insane at a particular period are subsequently restored to their right mind. Such cases are not unusual, and the return of reason may be anticipated when the cause for the insanity has been removed. We think the true rule to be that an adjudication of lunacy is not conclusive, but prima facie, evidence only, and that a person who deals with the supposed insane person may show that at the time the contract was made he had sufficient mental capacity to make it. Clark v. Trail, 1 Met. (Ky.) 35; Parker v. Davis, 53 N. C. (8 Jones, L.) 460; Armstrong v. Short, 8 N. C. (1 Hawks) 11; Field v. Lucas, 21 Ga. 447, 68 Am. Dec. 465; and 22 Cyc. 1134; and see Small v. Champeny, 102 Wis. 61, 78 N. W. 407; also Miller v. Rutledge, 82 Va. 863, 1 S. E. 202; Elston v. Jasper, 45 Tex. 409; and Willwerth v. Leonard, 156 Mass. 277, 31 N. E. 299.

In the case of Clark v. Trail, supra, the court said: "An inquest of lunacy, or of unsoundness of mind, although conclusive evidence of the condition of the party at the date of the inquest, is only prima facie evidence of his condition at a subsequent period. Having been found a lunatic, the law presumes the state of his mind to continue unchanged until the contrary be made manifest. It is this presumption of the law that makes the inquest even prima facie evidence of his insanity at a subsequent time. Being a mere presumption, it may be repelled by oral testimony. There is no rule of evidence which requires another inquest to be found, in order that this presumption may be thereby rebutted."

This holding is in accordance with the principles of the common law. Mr. Justice Blackstone, in his Commentaries, states the doctrine as follows: "Idiots and persons of adjudication of insanity—

conclusiveness.

nonsane memory, infants, and persons under duress are not totally disabled either to convey or purchase, but sub modo only, for their conveyances and purchases are voidable, but not actually void." 1 Cooley's Bl. Com. p. 666.

Chancellor Kent says: "By the common law, a deed made by a person non compos is voidable only, and not void." 2 Kent, Com. 14th ed. *451.

Having reached the conclusion that the inquisition is only prima facie evidence, and that evidence contradictory is admissible, it remains for us to decide whether or not Eagle was mentally incompetent to contract at the time he executed the deed to Peterson in March, 1912, or, if so mentally incompetent at that time, did he, after his reason was restored, ratify and confirm the contract?

Under the doctrine that conveyances of insane persons are voidable, and not void, it is obvious that such instruments are subject to ratification as well as disaffirmance, and that the insane person may, when restored to sanity, ratify or confirm the conveyance which he made while insane. George v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 34 Ark. 613; 14 R. C. L. 595; and 22 Cyc. 1209.

The testimony on the question of the mental capacity of Eagle to execute the deed to Peterson in March, 1912, is very voluminous and is in direct and irreconcilable conflict. We have not set out the testimony on this point, and do not deem it necessary to do so, for if it be assumed that Eagle was mentally incompetent when he executed the deed to Peterson to the property in question, it is quite clear from the record that he ratified his act after he became sane. That Eagle was restored to his right mind in the fall of 1912 is abundantly shown by the record. It is shown by both the testimony of Young and of Eagle himself. Their testimony only conflicts on the question of the ratification of the deed. Eagle testified that he quit using morphine in August, 1912, and also to a great extent, the use of intoxicating liquors. According to his own testimony, he returned to Arkansas that fall, and Young admitted to him that he knew Peterson did not have any money with which to purchase the land and that the title in reality was in Eagle. Young flatly denies this, and, on the other hand, states that he showed to Eagle the deed of Eagle to Peterson, as well as the affidavit of Eagle made to cure a defect in the title, and that Eagle acknowledged the same and ratified his contract with regard thereto. The testimony of Young is corroborated by the circumstances of the case. The conversation between Young and Eagle with reference to the execution of the deed from Eagle to Peterson was had in the fall of 1912, or in the early part of the year 1913. The present action was not instituted by Eagle until the 27th day of February, 1915, and no reasonable excuse is given by him for the delay.

The delay in bringing the suit is a circumstance to be considered in determining whether or not Eagle confirmed the execution of the deed made at the time when he at least thought himself to be mentally incompetent to execute the same. Another circumstance is that Eagle first had the suit brought in his own name, and it was afterwards changed to a suit by next friend because there had been no adjudication restoring him to sanity.

The court made a general finding for the defendants and dismissed the complaint of the plaintiff for want of equity. This included a finding that Eagle had ratified and confirmed the deed executed by him to Peterson in March, 1912. This finding is sustained by a preponderance of the evidence, and it follows that the decree must be affirmed.

NOTE.

The question considered in the reported case (EAGLE v. PETERSON, ante, Messrs. W. B. Wilson, Joseph A. Jenkins, Keeslar & Gunn, and Acton & Acton for appellees.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Vermilion county setting aside the will of Jason H. McKinney, deceased. The bill alleged that the instrument in question was not signed by the deceased, that he was not of sound mind and memory at the time of its execution, and that such execution was obtained by fraud and undue influence of certain of the beneficiaries. On a trial of the issues raised by the pleadings the verdict of the jury stated that the writing in question was not the last will and testament of the deceased, and the decree was entered accordingly.

Jason H. McKinney died March 20, 1912, leaving as his only heirs a half-brother, Albert McKinney, one of the appellees herein, and Malinda Nichols, a half-sister, to each of whom he left $500, and George Holliday and Mary Stenger, children of a deceased sister. All of his property except the said two $500 legacies, consisting mainly of an 80-acre farm, was divided by the will equally between Reason Shepherd, a cousin, and Josephine Lawrence, a distant relative, who was the wife of the attorney who drew the will. The instrument was executed on May 6, 1893. McKinney had lived all his life in Vermilion county. There is no positive testimony in the record as to his age, but we gather from what was stated that he was nearly seventy years old at the time of his death.

The principal question urged by appellants is that the evidence does not sustain the verdict and decree. From the testimony there is little question that McKinney was not well developed mentally. Some of the witnesses testified that he was feeble-minded, and one or two stated they would consider him an idiot or an imbecile. The great weight of the testimony of all the witnesses is to the effect that he was weak mentally. Testimony of more than sixty witnesses was heard by the jury,—about twenty-five for appellants and about forty for appellees. Four doctors, a number of business men, farmers, and others who knew the deceased at the time of the making of the will and previous thereto, testified for the appellants. About twenty of them testified they believed he knew his friends, what property he had and to whom he wished it to go. Many of them admitted he was of weak mental capacity, using different language, as "not bright," "not normal," "peculiar," "had an undeveloped mind," "was like a child," was considered "a joke" by those who knew him. Practically all the witnesses for appellees, many of whom had been intimately acquainted with him a long time, after stating the facts upon which they based their testimony, gave the opinion that he was not of sound mind, some saying he did not have sufficient mind to reason intelligently on any subject. Many witnesses stated that he was better at some times than at others. For years before he executed this will he lived on the farm in question with his mother. She died shortly before the will was executed. The great weight of the testimony is to the effect that when living with his mother she took charge of the farm, and while he helped her, went on errands and did small jobs, he rarely acted independently of her directions. While some of the witnesses for appellants say he was a good judge of stock and talked about horses and trading a good deal, no one ever took such talk seriously. He did little trading of any kind. The most he ever bought at the store was candy, tobacco, or something of like character. The testimony, we think, is uncontradicted that he often talked of getting married the same as he talked of making trades, buying and selling live stock, there being no real foundation for talk of this kind. Some of the witnesses stated that he was easily excited, would talk of doing certain things, but that no one ever took him seriously in regard to any of these matters. A tenant of his mother testified that McKinney would frequently call people his friends and other persons his enemies, when, as a matter of fact, the one he would call an enemy was a friend and the one he called a friend was not friendly to him. One witness testified he had given testator a dollar bill and the latter thought it was a ten dollar bill. The testimony is also to the effect that he was a great eater and never knew when to quit, eating so much that he would sometimes make himself sick; that when others had finished he would go to the table and eat from the various plates; that he would go to the cellar and open cans of fruit and eat therefrom and drink from the crocks of milk.

In April, 1893, after his mother's death, on the petition of his half-brother, one of the appellees herein, a conservator was appointed to take charge of McKinney's property, which at that time, according to the petition, consisted of about 90 acres of land and about $4,000 of personal property. This appointment was made the month preceding the execution of the will. The conservator was appointed and apparently acted for some time, and was followed by a successor, but there is no proof in the record as to whether a conservator had charge of his property up to the time of his death. One of the persons who had acted as conservator testified for appellants that McKinney had sufficient mental capacity to understand what property he had and how he wished to dispose of it.

The will was drafted and executed in Danville, in the law office of Attorney Lawrence, the husband of one of the beneficiaries. One of the attesting witnesses was called on at his store by Reason Shepherd and asked to act as such. This witness, M. S. Plaut, swore that he thought McKinney was of sound mind and memory at the time. The other witness, C. E. Jones, a near neighbor of the testator, testified that he was asked by McKinney to go to Danville to act as a witness. His testimony at the time the will was presented for probate was of such a nature the probate was allowed. On the trial in this case he testified that he did not think that the testator, judged by what he told witness afterwards, understood, at the time the will was executed, what he was about. It seems he drew this conclusion largely from the fact that the testator told him, a short time after the will was executed, that he did not know much about the will, but said he had left his cousin Josie $500 and Reason Shepherd $500, and "the balance of my property goes to my half-brother and sister." The cousin Josie was Reason Shepherd's wife. The testimony of both attesting witnesses was that there was no discussion of the contents of the will at the time it was executed. Some of the witnesses testified that McKinney had been confined in an asylum for a time, but just how long the record does not show. One of the witnesses testified he had been there about two years. There was no attempt to show whether he was sent to the asylum at the time of the appointment of the conservator herein referred to, or whether there was another trial and finding upon which he was confined in the asylum.

We have not attempted to detail all of the evidence but have given the substance of the most material things bearing on the testator's mental capacity. We can reach no other conclusion than that the great weight of the evidence supports the verdict of the jury and the decree of the court on that question.

Counsel for appellants earnestly contend that the trial court erred in admitting the record of the county court to show that a conservator had been appointed for McKinney in April, 1893, on the ground that the statute under which that trial was held only required proof that he was unable, from any cause, to control, direct, or manage his property; that a conservator might have been appointed under that statute because McKinney was a spendthrift. The first section of the statute in force at the time of the appointment of the conservator (Hurd's Stat. 1891, p. 930) is somewhat similar in wording to the present statute. There was at that time another statute which provided for an inquisition in insanity if the person was to be confined because of mental unsoundness. Hurd's Stat. 1891, p. 926. While both of these statutes have been amended or revised since that time (Hurd's Stat. 1913, pp. 1581, 1588) they are, so far as they bear on this question, substantially like the ones then in force. The argument of counsel for appellants on this point is, that by the statute then in force, under which the conservator was appointed, it was only necessary to show that McKinney was incapable, for any reason, of managing and caring for his property, while the issue in the present case was whether he had sufficient mental capacity to make a will. No question is raised here that the record of the appointment of the conservator was not correctly certified to and properly admissible in evidence if it was competent on the issue here involved. Ordinary inquisitions in lunacy are held admissible in evidence as bearing on the question of the mental capacity of the person who was the subject of such inquisition, but such inquisitions or records are not generally conclusive except against the parties immediately concerned and their privies. 1 Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. § 556. Such a record is generally only prima facie evidence as to the sanity or insanity of the person at the time when the adjudication was made. 7 Enc. Ev. 477, and cases cited. It is true, as contended by counsel for appellants, that the proof under the two statutes as to lunatics in force at the time said conservator was appointed might have been different in the case of the mere appointment of a conservator than would be required if the patient was also to be confined in a hospital for the insane, but we do not think that fact would prevent the admission of the records of a proceeding under either statute on a hearing of this character. The general rule is that the admission in evidence of an adjudication of insanity does not depend upon whether it was founded upon an oath or not, but rather upon the public nature of the hearing and the public interests involved. 1 Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. § 556. The verdict of the jury upon which the appointment of the conservator was based found that McKinney was insane.

appointment of conservator for estate of in-

In view of the history of this man, as shown in this record, from the time of his boyhood, the record of the county court as to the appointment of a conservator for McKinney in 1898 was admissible, not as conclusive on the question of insanity, but to be considered by the jury for what it was worth. If the proof in this record had shown that the conservator was appointed for the sole reason that McKinney was a spendthrift or a drunkard a different question as to the admissibility of the county court record would be presented. The reasoning of this court in Bollnow v. Roach, 210 Ill. 364, 71 N. E. 454, on an analogous question, tends to support this conclusion. This court held in Entwistle v. Meikle, 180 Ill. 9, 54 N. E. 217, that the record of the appointment of a conservator three years after the will was made was too remote to the issue to be admissible. We do not consider that case as in any way conflicting with the conclusions already reached here as to the admissibility of the record in question in this case. The case of Re Weedman, 254 Ill. 504, 98 N. E. 956, was a hearing on an application for the probate of a will, and therefore is not in point on the admissibility of this record in this proceeding.

Counsel for appellants further contend that the testimony of the attesting witness Jones as to the conversation concerning the contents of the will, a few days after it was executed, was inadmissible, being, in effect, an attempt to revoke a will by parol evidence. At the time this testimony was offered the court ruled that it was admitted solely on the ground of its bearing on the mental capacity of the testator. The declarations of the testator, made either before or after the execution of an alleged will, as to his testamentary intentions, are competent on the question of his testamentary capacity. Hurley v. Caldwell, 244 Ill. 448, 91 N. E. 654; Kellan v.

to intention—testamentary

Kellan, 258 Ill. 256, 101 N. E. 614. The admission of this testimony was therefore not error.

Counsel for the appellants further argue that the trial court, contrary to the holding in Wetzel v. Firebaugh, 251 Ill. 190, 95 N. E. 1085, permitted witnesses for appellees to express opinions as to the ultimate facts to be determined by the jury. This question was raised in this court for the first time in the reply brief of appellants. Under the rules of this court and its long-settled practice, questions not raised by appellants in the original brief cannot be raised in the reply brief. A contrary practice would permit appellants to argue questions in their reply briefs as to which counsel for appellees would have no opportunity to reply. This question, therefore, need not be considered.

Appeal—raising questions in reply brief.

Before the jury was impaneled and the issue as to the mental capacity of the testator taken up for a hearing, certain proof was offered by appellees as to the relationship of George Holliday and his co-complainants, and certain testimony of Albert McKinney as to why his sister, Malinda Nichols, did not join with him as a contestant. Counsel for appellants insist that the court erred in admitting any of this testimony, as it was given by parties who under the statute were not competent to testify. Conceding, for the purposes of this argument, that counsel are right, we cannot see how it in any way injuriously affected the issues before the jury as to the testator's mental capacity.

Numerous errors are assigned on the record, but few of them have been argued. Errors assigned and not argued are waived. Lewis v. King, 180 Ill. 259, 54 N. E. 330; Sullivan v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 262 Ill. 317, 104 N. E. 707. The questions already considered are the only ones, as we read the briefs, that are argued therein by counsel for appellants.

We find no reversible error in the record. The decree of the Circuit Court will therefore be affirmed.

NOTE.

The question considered in the reported case (HOLLIDAY v. SHEPHERD, ante, 558) as to the admissibility of an adjudication of incompetency on issue of testamentary capacity is treated in I. g. of the annotation following WESTERLAND v. FIRST NAT. BANK, post 568, on the general subject of the admissibility and probative force on issue as to mental condition of evidence that one had been adjudged incompetent or insane or had been confined in an asylum.

Grace, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint, among other things, alleges: That the defendant Newberry was the cashier of the First National Bank of Carrington, of which plaintiff was a customer, and transacted his financial business; that is, such customer was in the habit of counseling with Newberry with reference to such financial business, and did confide in and take the advice of said Newberry in financial matters. That Newberry, on the 28th day of September, 1909, advised the plaintiff that it was plaintiff's debts that were causing him to worry and producing his ill health, and that to relieve the same (debts) he should sell his farm. At said time Newberry produced a writing, of which the following is a copy: "For \$1 in hand paid by G. S. Newberry, I hereby grant on him an exclusive option for sixty days on purchase or sale of the following lands: South  $\frac{1}{4}$  of 22, northwest  $\frac{1}{4}$  of 26, all in 147 R. 65, including windmills, buildings, and all other improvements on the farm. Price \$23 per acre net to me. Terms, \$3,000 cash; balance five annual payments at 6 per cent interest. Good paper. The privilege of withdrawing the option by notice in writing inside of thirty days is reserved. All plowing done to be paid for at \$1.25 per acre, and possession of

The plaintiff further alleges that at the time of the signing of said option the plaintiff did not know that said option provided for an exclusive sale, but plaintiff believed that such writing was necessary in order for the said Newberry to obtain a purchaser for said land. The plaintiff further alleges that at the time of signing such contract his mind was in such condition that he did not know what he was doing, or realize the binding effect of said writing, all of which was known to Newberry, and of which Newberry took advantage at said time. The plaintiff further states that on the 2d day of November 1909, the defendant Newberry told the plaintiff he was ready to carry out said contract for the purchase of said land and buy the same himself, and demanded of plaintiff a deed to said land, advising said plaintiff at said time that he, the defendant, would place a mortgage upon the premises for the purpose of paying the plaintiff $3,000 cash provided in said option. Plaintiff refused to make such deed. Newberry demanded the sum of $480 by way of damages. Plaintiff further alleges that defendant threatened suit against the plaintiff for said amount of money, and alleges that on account of his mental condition he was put in fear and caused to believe that, if he did not settle with said Newberry, he would lose his farm. The plaintiff then executed a note for $860, which also covered other amounts owing by the plaintiff to the bank, which was secured by a mortgage on the land in question. Plaintiff alleges that at the time said mortgage and note were paid by the bank at Barlow the plaintiff was insane, and was afterwards placed in the insane asylum at Jamestown, North Dakota. Plaintiff alleges: that the offer which the defendant made to purchase said farm was not in good faith, and that the whole transaction was a conniving scheme for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff of said money.

The defendant Newberry, for his answer, makes, first, a general denial, and further, by way of defense, alleges that on the 28th day of September, 1909, the plaintiff solicited the defendant to purchase or procure the purchase of certain real estate then the property of plaintiff, and for a consideration did make, execute, and deliver to the defendant the option as hereinbefore set forth, which option was on the 28th day of October, 1909, assigned by the defendant to his wife, Mary G. Newberry. The answer further alleges that more than thirty days from the execution and delivery of said option, on the 2d day of November, 1909, the plaintiff again called upon the defendant and asked to withdraw said option, and that by mutual agreement of the parties, and the consideration of the surrender of said option, the plaintiff agreed to pay, and did pay, to the defendant, the sum of $1 per acre, amounting to the sum of $480. The answer further denies all allegations of fraud.

The facts in the case are as follows: The plaintiff was the owner of 480 acres of land. On the 28th day of September, 1909, he granted an option to the defendant for sixty days, which gave the said Newberry the right to find a purchaser to said land, or purchase the same himself, within the sixty-day period. The plaintiff also had a reservation in such option of withdrawing the same by notice in writing inside of thirty days. The plaintiff did not withdraw the option within thirty days, and did not attempt to do so until after the thirty-day period had expired. The plaintiff had transacted business, for quite a long period of time prior to the date of the option contract, with the First National Bank of Carrington, of which Newberry was cashier. After receiving such option, the defendant assigned the same to his wife. The plaintiff desired, after the thirty-day period had expired, to withdraw the option and cancel the same, which Newberry refused to do, unless he was paid the sum of $480, which was agreed to by the plaintiff, and a note for $860 executed, which included, among other items, the $480, which was secured on the land in question.

The first assignment of error by the defendant is one in which he complains that the court erred in receiving in evidence, over the objection of appellant, exhibits F, G, H, I, J, K, L, and M, inclusive, which exhibits constituted the record of the board of insanity for Foster county in the matter of the insanity proceedings against Carl Westerland, the plaintiff in this case, which proceedings as to the insanity of the plaintiff were had on the 28th day of June, 1913, a period of time of four years subsequent to the date of the transaction complained of and involved in this suit. This record concerning the insanity of the plaintiff was offered at the very commencement of the trial of the case. The defendant made proper objections to the introduction of such records, because of their incompetency, irrelevancy, and immateriality, which objection was overruled by the court, and such records were received in evidence.

The question presented is quite a novel one, and is as follows: Where it is claimed by the plaintiff that at the time of the execution of the contract he was insane, and had no capacity to execute such contract, is it competent to introduce testimony that four years subsequent to the date of such contract the plaintiff was declared to be insane by the board of insanity of the county in which he resided? Adverting to the question of insanity, an inquisition finding that a person is insane at the time of such inquiry, such finding is not evidence that he was insane at a previous date, and especially is this true where the date is long prior to the date of the inquiry. Southern Tier Masonic Relief Asso. v. Laudenbach, 5 N. Y. Supp. 901;

Rippy v. Gant, 39 N. C. (4 Ired. Eq.) 443. Such finding by the insanity board is no presumption of insanity at an earlier date. Lilly v. Waggoner, 27 Ill. 395; Small v. Champeny, 102 Wis. 61, 78 N. W. 407; Koons v. Benscoter, 2 Kulp, 451. The admission of such testimony is only competent to prove the incapacity of the person to have charge of his property at the time of the inquiry as to the sanity of the person examined; and where such person is found to be insane on such inquiry and examination, it is no evidence of insanity at a prior date, but is evidence only of the insanity of the person examined when the adjudication was made. Burnham v. Mitchell, 34 Wis. 134.

Evidence—
insanity—
adjudication

The only possible theory upon which such testimony could be admissible would be where there was competent testimony adduced, showing a continuance of the insanity from the date the act was done, or, in case of a contract, from the date the contract was made, for all the succeeding interval of time down to the date of the inquiry and adjudication of insanity; and such continuance of such insanity during all the interval from the time of the making of the contract to the adjudication of insanity is shown by a clear preponderance of evidence, of such a nature that it would strongly tend to prove the continuance of such insanity. Notwithstanding such connecting proof, the adjudication of insanity is not competent proof of insanity at a prior date, and the records of such adjudication of insanity of a certain date are entirely inadmissible, incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial to prove insanity at a prior date. There is still another objection to the admission of the exhibits of the adjudication of the insanity of the plaintiff, in that the insanity was at a very remote time from the time of the making of the contracts in question, and because of such remoteness they were inadmissible and incompetent; the time between the making of the contracts and the adjudication of insanity being a period of more than four years. As to remoteness of the testimony in this class of cases, see Dickinson v. Barber, 9 Mass. 225, 6 Am. Dec. 58; Harden v. Hays, 14 Pa. 91. A party alleging insanity has the burden of establishing it by a preponderance of evidence, and the ordinary rules of evidence as to admissibility, materiality, competency, and relevancy apply as in other cases.

The pivotal question in a case such as the one at bar is the capacity to contract with reference to property or its conveyance at the time the contract or conveyance was made. If a person at the time of making the conveyance or contract has sufficient mental capacity fully to comprehend the nature and effect of the act, the conveyance is valid. Willwerth v. Leonard, 156 Mass. 277, 31 N. E. 299; Parker v. Marco (C. C.) 76 Fed. 510. It may be said to be a sound principle of law, to make a binding contract does not require a very high order of intellect. While the contracts of a lunatic or an idiot, except for necessities, are of no binding force upon him, yet, if a man possess sufficient

capacity—
insanity.      mental capacity to understand and know what he is doing, to know the nature of the contract, the terms thereof, and the time of its continuance, he may be required to perform it, unless the contract is unfair, fraudulent, or dishonest, when he might be relieved from the performance thereof, but most likely upon other grounds than insanity. The law does not presume to make a distinction between much and little intellect. Stewart, Legal Medicine, § 155. Sanity is always presumed to exist until the contrary appears.

The testimony in this case is quite voluminous. Much of it relates to the business transactions of Mr. Westerland prior to the time of the execution of the contract in question. There is testimony that he transacted business with other business men in the vicinity. There is some testimony tending to show that Mr. Westerland worried about his debts; that he at times had crying spells; that he at times made disturbances with his family. There is also testimony that he used intoxicating liquors, and sometimes to excess, and that at times he kept intoxicating liquors at home. All such testimony was proper to be considered by the jury, and to be weighed by them in assisting them in determining whether or not, at the time of the execution of the contract in question, the plaintiff was of sufficient mental capacity to enter into the contract which he did. The main question to be determined in the case is whether or not the plaintiff Westerland had sufficient capacity and intellect, and knew what he was doing at the time he made the contract; and the business transactions of plaintiff, not too remote from the time of the making of the contract, his general conduct, his actions, eccentricities, if any, his habits, all may be shown by competent testimony, as bearing upon his capacity to execute the contract in question at the time it was executed. The contract in question was one which it was lawful to make. If the plaintiff Westerland had capacity to make it at the time when he did make it, he is legally bound by the consequences of his making the contract.

Another question which should be taken into consideration is that a disaffirmance of a contract should be timely, and the same disaffirmed —disaffirmance
within a reasonable time, or, if money has been paid thereunder, an action brought to recover such money within a reasonable time after the contract is disaffirmed; otherwise, long delay tends to show a ratification. We are of the opinion that the admission of the records of the county court of Foster county, which showed the result of the inquiry at which plaintiff was adjudged insane, which inquiry was some four years or more subsequent to the date of the making of the contract in question and the note and mortgage given in settlement, was too remote to be competent evidence; that it was inadmissible to prove the insanity of the plaintiff at a point of time four years or more prior thereto; and the admission of the same was prejudicial and reversible error.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and a new trial granted.

Robinson, J., dissenting:

In this case Cashier Newberry appeals to this court from a verdict and judgment against him for obtaining from the plaintiff $480 and interest by fraud and undue influence. By some smoothness he obtained from the plaintiff a one-sided land-listing document, which is a fraud on its face. It is in this form:

September 28th, 1909.

For \$1 in hand paid by G. S. Newberry, I hereby grant him an exclusive option for sixty days on purchase or sale of the following lands: South  $\frac{1}{4}$  of 22, northwest  $\frac{1}{4}$  of 26, all in 147 R. 65, including windmills, buildings, and all other improvements on the farm. Price \$23 per acre net to me. Terms, \$3,000 cash; balance five annual payments at 6 per cent interest. Good paper. The privilege of withdrawing the option by notice in writing inside of thirty days is reserved. All plowing done to be paid for at \$1.25 per acre, and possession of buildings retained until April 1st, 1910.

Carl Westerland.

Witnesses: H. H. Steffens.

J. W. A. Fisher.

The plaintiff was a poor, illiterate, hard-working Norwegian of weak and unsound mind. He called on his banker, who posed as his confidential friend and heard his tale of woe, and advised him to get away from trouble by selling his land, and by giving his friend, the banker, an exclusive right to sell it for him. The banker presented his listing document, and said to the weeping and distracted man, "Sign there;" and he signed it. Then the banker assigned the document to his innocent spouse and put it on record, so as to cloud the title of plaintiff's land. Of course, when the illiterate Norse came to think it over, the signing of that document caused him days and nights of worryment. Then he came to his banker friend and asked leave to withdraw the document, and was told that it had been transferred to some person (whom the banker declined to name); that the holder would give it up for $480, and so the banker kindly took a mortgage on the land and advanced the $480 to himself. In time the mortgage was paid; the maker went insane, went to the insane asylum, got out, and recovered a verdict and judgment inviting the banker to refund his $480 and interest. How strange it is that any person should think of appealing such a case to the highest court of justice? Of course, the claim is made that in signing the document the Norse knew just what he was doing, and that he was not misled or deceived; but the claim is futile. The document is a fraud on its face. No sane man signs such a thing, only when he is deceived. It is needless to review the testimony showing the weak mental condition of the plaintiff, who finally committed suicide, and the way in which he was induced to sign the paper and to mortgage the land to pay $480 and interest, without receiving any value whatever. It is high time for bank cashiers and others to stop trying to get money or property from poor people by such sharp and smooth practices. In a way it is worse than theft, because it is more likely to prey upon the mind and to drive one to insanity and suicide.

The judgment should be affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied, August 23, 1917.

ANNOTATION.

Admissibility and probative force on issue as to mental condition, of evidence that one had been adjudged incompetent or insane, or had been confined in insane asylum.

I. Admissibility:

- a. In general, 568.
- b. Effect of remoteness of adjudication, 571.

The general rule is that an adjudication of insanity is admissible upon the issue of the mental condition of the alleged lunatic at the time of the transaction in question. It is so firmly established that in the majority of the cases no objection is raised to the admission of such evidence, the question being limited to its weight.

This rule applies where the adjudication is prior to the transaction in question:

While, in the great majority of the cases holding admissible adjudications of insanity rendered subsequently to the transaction involved, such transaction is within the period of time in which the insanity is found to have antedated the adjudication, no point is made of such fact, so that it would appear that a subsequent adjudication is competent evidence on the mental condition of the adjudged lunatic at a time prior to the period covered by the finding, unless such time is too remote.

In Rhoades v. Fuller (1907) 139 Mo. 179, 40 S. W. 760, however, it was held that a record of an inquest held twenty days after the making of a deed, in which the grantor was adjudged to be of unsound mind and incapable of managing his own affairs, was inadmissible in evidence in an action to set aside the deed, the court saying: "The record was clearly inadmissible. The inquest was a judicial proceeding held after the trade. Defendant was not a party to it, had no connection with it, and his rights previously acquired could in no possible way be affected thereby. It raised no presumption as against him of Rhoades's insanity at the time of the trade, which was consummated something over twenty days before the date of the inquest. It is no uncommon occurrence for persons who have never manifested any evidences of insanity to become violently insane within a very short space of time. Neither party claimed under the proceedings in the probate court, and whether Rhoades was sane or insane at that time could in no way affect defendant's rights."

And in New York, since 1875, when by an amendment of the Code of Civil Procedure the inquiry in lunacy proceedings was expressly limited and confined to the competency of the alleged lunatic at the time of the hearing, the portion of an inquisition finding prior insanity is not admissible upon the question of the lunatic's previous incompetency, but the remainder of the adjudication is apparently still admissible. Re Preston (1906) 113 App. Div. 732, 99 N. Y. Supp. 812.

In Dominick v. Dominick (1887) 20 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 286, involving the capacity of a testatrix to destroy her will, where it was urged that the court had erred in permitting an inquisition to be read in evidence by which the jurors had found the testatrix to have been a lunatic at the time of the destruction of the will, on the ground that under the Code the jury were not permitted to return an inquisition retrospective in this respect, it was held that the submission of the inquisition to the jury without any remark as to its effect, further than that it was not conclusive, was not open to such objection. The court said in this connection: "The limitation of the inquiry under the commission would restrict it as evidence to the time when the inquisition itself shall be taken. But this rule was not transgressed in the submission of this case to the jury. . . . Whether it should be given a retroactive effect by the jury was not within the direction of the court. If anything more particular than what was said had been deemed necessary, further instructions concerning the effect of the inquisition should have been asked on behalf of the plaintiff. But it was not. Neither was any objection or exception taken to the manner in which the inquisition was submitted as evidence to the jury. Accordingly, there was no ground for setting aside the verdict because any undue effect was allowed to be attributed to the inquisition as proved."

In Sprinkle v. Wellborn (1905) 140 N. C. 168, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 174, 111 Am. St. Rep. 827, 52 S. E. 666, an action to set aside a deed because of the grantor's mental incapacity, the court, in holding untenable an objection to the admission of the records of an inquisition of lunacy because they were not admitted as evidence generally, but only for the consideration of the court in order to decide upon the competency of a witness, said: "Those records, of course, were not and could not have been considered as evidence for the jury. They were made after the date when the deed was executed and the proceedings in which they were made were ex parte. If made before that time, they might have been competent, but not conclusive as to the insanity of Nancy Sprinkle."

54 Tex. Civ. App. 289, 118 S. W. 149, holding inadmissible a subsequent judgment of non compos mentis, the court said: "The question seems to be squarely presented as to the admissibility of such a judgment, rendered a year after the deed in question was executed, as evidence relevant to the question of the grantor's sanity a year previous. The courts have adopted a liberal rule of admitting evidence of acts, conduct, etc., of the person, both prior and subsequent to the time of the execution of the instrument in question, in inquiries of this nature. As stated in Hamburger v. Rinkel (1901) 164 Mo. 398, 64 S. W. 106: 'Evidence of the condition of the mind of the testator before and after making a will is admitted, of course, for the sole purpose of shedding light upon his mental condition at the time of executing the will.' See also Williams v. Sapieha (1901) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 62 S. W. 72. The acts, conduct, and peculiarities, etc., of the person before and after the time are allowed. The judgment offered was evidently one adjudging plaintiff of unsound mind as preliminary to the granting of guardianship of her person and estate. The determination of her mental capacity for that purpose was a matter within the jurisdiction of the county judge, but it was nothing more than an adjudication of her condition at that time. Perhaps the evidence on that hearing was much the same as that in this record, and it probably was, for there was evidence on this trial that no changes have taken place in plaintiff's condition for a considerable period. It seems to us an unsound and dangerous rule which would permit either side to use the judgment of the county judge to strengthen the facts. We presume that if the county judge had ruled that plaintiff was of sound mind, and had refused to appoint a guardian, appellees would have endeavored to have the prestige of that court's views to fortify their theory of the evidence. We think that while subsequent acts, conduct, etc., of the party are proper evidence, a subsequent judgment, such as we have here, declaring the person to be of unsound mind at that later time, is not. Such judgment is in no sense the act or conduct of the party, and to allow it to be used as testimony would tend to the substitution of the judgment of the county judge upon the facts, for that of the jury who were there to try this case. It has been decided in this state that a contract made with one who has been adjudged insane and is under guardianship is void. Elston v. Jasper (1876) 45 Tex. 409. But it has not been held in this state that a contract is affected in any manner by such proceedings had after the making of the contract, nor that such subsequent proceedings can be looked to as a material fact in determining the state of the party's mind when the contract was made. What is said by the supreme court in Boehme v. Sovereign Camp, W. W. (1904) 98 Tex. 376, 84 S. W. 422, 4 Ann. Cas. 1019, and in McCamant v. Roberts (1886) 66 Tex. 260, 1 S. W. 260, is not in line with the view that the subsequent judgment sought to be used in this case was any evidence of insanity of plaintiff when she executed the papers in question."

And in Rowan v. Hodges (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 175 S. W. 847, it was held, following Uecker v. Zuercher (Tex.) supra, that an adjudication of lunacy entered more than a year after the execution of a deed by the lunatic was inadmissible upon the question of his capacity to execute it.

An inquisition made over four months after the alleged lunatic parted with certain promissory notes is not admissible in an action of replevin by his guardian to recover such notes, upon the ground of the lunatic's incapacity to part therewith. The court, in stating the law upon this subject, said: "The general rule is that an adjudication as to mental soundness is direct evidence of the fact at the time of the adjudication, and presumptive evidence of the condition of the subject at a subsequent time, upon the theory that a condition of mind once shown to exist is presumed to continue. It is not evidence of itself of the mental soundness of the subject at any time prior to the adjudication.

In the absence of independent evidence showing that the same condition of mind existed at the prior time as at the time of the adjudication, and had been continued in the meantime, it is not admissible at all in a controversy as to such condition at such prior time. That is the state of the law as laid down in previous adjudications of this court, and no reason is perceived for departing from it. Such is the law also according to standard text-writers and courts generally." Small v. Champeny (1899) 102 Wis. 61, 78 N. W. 407.

The question whether evidence tending to show the insanity of a testator is too remote from the time of the execution of the will is a matter resting very largely in the discretion of the trial court. No general rule can be given on the subject. Each case must depend upon its particular circumstances. Where the evidence tends to show that the insanity developed early in life and was of a fixed and permanent character, the period during which the insanity may be shown is of necessity greatly extended. Its persistent character can best be shown by proof of its existence during a long period of time, and evidence thereof is properly admissible in such cases. Hence, evidence of various adjudications of insanity, the earliest of which was more than fifty years before the death of the testator, is not necessarily too remote. Re Baker (1917) 176 Cal. 430, 168 Pac. 881.

In People v. Farrell (1867) 31 Cal. 576, it is said: "No rule can fix with precision the limits of time within which evidence of subsequent insanity on the score of competency shall be received and beyond which it shall be rejected. . . . Where the insanity sought to be proved is of a temporary character or interrupted by lucid intervals, which is apt to be the case where it results from personal injuries acted upon by casual and exciting causes, a wider range on the score of time should be allowed to the testimony than in cases where the insanity is of a more continuous and permanent character, and therefore its periods of commencement and termination more clearly defined and readily ascertained. But from the nature of the case no fixed rules as to the period of time over which an inquiry of this character should be extended can be established, and hence the particular conditions of each case must be allowed to fix the limits. To allow a wide range is certainly in keeping with the humanity of the law, which always prefers the escape of the guilty to the punishment of the innocent."

While large latitude should be allowed in determining the admissibility of an adjudication of insanity, and while there is no agreed limit of time within which the prior or subsequent condition is to be considered, the circumstances of each case, in the very nature of things, ought to control, and the discretion of the trial judge, though reviewable for abuse, ought to have weight. Taylor v. Taylor (1910) 174 Ind. 670, 93 N. E. 9.

Where one brings an action to recover money paid under a contract, on the ground that at the time of the making of the contract he was insane, evidence that, at a point of time four years or more subsequent to the time of the making of the contract, he was adjudged insane by the board of insanity, is inadmissible and incompetent, and too remote to prove his mental condition at the time of the making of the contract. WESTERLAND v. FIRST NAT. BANK (reported herewith) ante, 562.

Proceedings for the appointment of a guardian over the testatrix two years after the date of the will are properly excluded in a will contest. Re Harvey (1903) — Iowa, —, 94 N. W. 559.

The record of a proceeding in lunacy by which it appears that a person was found by a jury, and adjudged by the probate court, to be of unsound mind, and confined in an asylum for the insane, but subsequently discharged therefrom "not restored to his right mind," is receivable in evidence on the issue of insanity raised by the person, in defense to an information for crime alleged to have been committed by him between seven and eight years after the inquisition of lunacy. State v. McMurtry (1899) 61 Kan. 87, 58 Pac. 961. In this case the court said: "The time intermediate the adjudication in the probate court and the date of the commission of the alleged offense was considerable, it is true, but the general rule is that a condition of insanity, if shown to exist, is presumed to continue. This presumption is, of course, a disputable one, and evidence of the actual condition of mind at any particular subsequent time is properly receivable; but on the question of sanity the record of a proceeding in lunacy is properly receivable for the purpose of proof of an insane state of mind at a particular time in question, and thereby to give rise to the presumption of its continuance from that date. We know of no subsequent time at which this presumption ceases. The lapse of much time, during which the patient has not been confined for his malady or known as a fact to be insane, may so materially weaken the presumption as practically to neutralize it, but nevertheless an accused person who alleges his insanity as an excuse for his act is entitled to introduce in his behalf all the admissible evidence he can command."

A judgment in proceedings for the appointment of a guardian of an incompetent person, rendered two months after the making of a will, cannot be said to be so remote that its exclusion does not constitute prejudicial error. Whether it is too remote is largely for the trial court to determine. McAllister v. Rowland (1913) 124 Minn. 27, 144 N. W. 412, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1006.

An order in guardianship proceedings, purporting to be an adjudication of the mental incapacity of the ward many years before the application for appointment of a guardian was made, is not admissible as evidence of his incapacity to make a prior settlement on a note to him, or of such unsoundness of mind as to prevent the running against him of the Statute of Limitations. Burnham v. Mitchell (1874) 34 Wis. 117.

It was held in Giles v. Hodge (1889)

74 Wis. 360, 43 N. W. 163, that an inquisition of lunacy was admissible in an action to set aside a prior deed of the lunatic, as evidence of his incapacity to execute such deed. The court distinguished the preceding case upon the ground that in that case the adjudication was offered to prove the mental incapacity of the lunatic reaching back thirty years before the adjudication, while in this case the petition was filed the next day after the deed was executed, and the adjudication was of the time when the petition was filed. The court said: "It is no doubt the general principle that the adjudication cannot relate back to a prior time as evidence of incapacity, and so, too, as to the future also, except by the presumption that it continued. . . . But when it is shown that the mental incapacity and condition had been the same for a considerable time, and was the same at the date of the act to be affected by it as when adjudication was had, the adjudication is none the less competent. . . . In a case where the mental weakness and incapacity are the concomitants of old age, and have been gradual and continuous for a considerable time, and not the result of any recent or intervening cause, but of gradual and natural decay, such evidence is competent to show that the conditions had not changed, but were the same as when the adjudication was had; and the adjudication itself is admissible as the foundation of such an inquiry."

In Sergeson v. Sealey (1742) 2 Atk. 412, 26 Eng. Reprint, 648, 9 Mod. 370, 88 Eng. Reprint, 513, an action to set aside a purchase of real estate by an alleged lunatic within the period overreached by the finding of an inquisition, the chancellor, in answer to an objection to the competency of the inquisition, because it was offered as evidence to affect the right of a third person, and because it had a retrospect of eight years, said that inquisitions of lunacy are always admissible, but that the inquisition was not conclusive even as to the point of time when taken, much less as to the retrospect of eight years.

1. Commitment to insane asylum.

The distinction between an adjudication of incompetency and the appointment of a guardian of an insane person, and an order made by the court for the commitment of a person to a state hospital for the insane as a fit subject for treatment and custody, is discussed in Leggate v. Clark (1873) 111 Mass. 308, as follows: "An inquisition of lunacy under the English system, and proceedings under our system to appoint a guardian of an insane person, are in the nature of proceedings in rem, and are designed to fix the status of the person proceeded against. Under our system careful provision is made for notice to the alleged insane person, and for a full hearing, and the decree fixes the status of the ward as an insane person, 'incapable of taking care of himself.' The statutes give the care and management of his person and estate to the guardian, and take from him the capacity to make contracts or to transfer his property. The necessary effect of the decree is that the ward is, in law, what the decree declares him to be,—incapable of taking care of himself, as to all the world. Otherwise, the object of the statute would be entirely defeated. Gen. Stat. chap. 109; Chase v. Hathaway (1817) 14 Mass. 222; Leonard v. Leonard (1838) 14 Pick. (Mass.) 280. But an order under the Statute of 1862, chap. 223, § 3, is not of this character. It does not pretend to declare the person committed to the hospital to be incapable of transacting business. It does not take from him the care and management of his estate. It affords a justification for the restraint of his person, but is not designed to fix his status."

This distinction is similarly brought out in Dewey v. Allgire (1893) 37 Neb. 6, 40 Am. St. Rep. 468, 55 N. W. 276, where the record of proceedings under a statute, the sole object of which is to ascertain whether or not the person alleged to be insane is a fit subject for custody and treatment in the hospital for the insane, is held not admissible in evidence as tending to establish want of business capacity.

The proceedings in an examination by a commission as to the sanity of a certain person, for the purpose of determining whether she was a proper subject to be admitted for treatment to the hospital for the insane, are inadmissible as affecting the credibility of such person as a witness five years subsequently. Hicks v. State (1905) 165 Ind. 440, 75 N. E. 641.

The daily record of an accused while at a state hospital, kept as required by statute, is admissible on the trial of the issue of his sanity, under the familiar rule of evidence as to public records. Hempton v. State (1901) 111 Wis. 127, 86 N. W. 596, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 657.

In Roe v. Nix, L. R. [1893] P. 55, 68 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 26, 62 L. J. Prob. N. S. 36, 1 Reports, 472, on proceedings to probate the will of one in an insane asylum after being found by inquisition to be a lunatic, the reports of the Lord Chancellor's visitors to the testatrix, although undoubtedly the best evidence extant as to the mental condition of the testatrix at the time of the execution of the will, were held inadmissible because of a statute requiring them to be kept secret, and because of the refusal of the Lords Justices to make an order permitting their contents to be divulged.

It was held in Karnes v. Johnston (1906) 58 W. Va. 595, 52 S. E. 658, that an order of a justice of the peace, finding that a person was insane, not committing him to a hospital for the insane, but leaving him freedom of person until the appointment of a committee, and then committing him to the custody of such committee, was not admissible as evidence of insanity in a proceeding before the county court to appoint a committee, on the ground that such finding was beyond the jurisdiction of the justice, under a statute limiting his jurisdiction to a finding of lunacy solely for the purpose of commitment to a hospital for the insane.

The commitment of one to an insane asylum is competent upon the question of his capacity to subsequently execute a will. Mileham v. Montagne (1910) 148 Iowa, 476, 125 N. W. 664; Re Bar- ney (1918) 185 App. Div. 782, 174 N. Y. Supp. 242.

The commitment to, and confinement of one in, an insane asylum, is admissible on the issue of insanity, upon his prosecution for a crime. McCully v. State (1920) — Ark. —, 217 S. W. 453; State v. McMurtry (1899) 61 Kan. 87, 58 Pac. 961; Wheeler v. State (1877) 34 Ohio St. 394, 32 Am. Rep. 372; Hempton v. State (1901) 111 Wis. 127, 86 N. W. 596, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 657.

The transfer of a convict from the penitentiary to a lunatic asylum, under a statute authorizing the removal of an insane prisoner, is a circumstance to be considered with other evidence bearing on the question of such person's insanity. Langdon v. People (1890) 138 Ill. 382, 24 N. E. 874.

In Re Maas (1900) 10 Okla. 302, 61 Pac. 1057, where a defendant convicted of murder was brought into court for judgment and sentence, and filed a motion in arrest of judgment, and, in support thereof, introduced in evidence an order of the county board of insanity, adjudging him to be insane, and the court overruled such motion and sentenced the defendant, it was held that the correctness of such ruling could not be inquired into on a writ of habeas corpus. The court said: "The fact that the county board of insanity may have adjudged him insane prior to the time fixed for his sentence, even if the order of such adjudication was admitted in evidence or considered by the trial court, would not necessarily control its action, because such order is not an adjudication or finding of any court, and is not admissible upon a trial to prove the insanity of such person. Such an order amounts to no more than the expression of an opinion by any other person or persons out of court as to the mental condition of a defendant's mind, except where the right of the officers of the asylum to confine and treat such person is called in question, or in other cases of a kindred character which fall within the spirit of the law authorizing such finding by the board of insanity."

The reports of the examining physicians in judicial proceedings, resulting in the commitment to the hospital for the insane of one accused of crime, are admissible on the trial of the special issue of insanity. Hempton v. State (1901) 111 Wis. 127, 86 N. W. 596, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 657.

But it was held in People v. Willard (1907) 150 Cal. 543, 89 Pac. 124, that the certificates of the examining physicians, in a proceeding for the commitment of a person to a state asylum for the insane, were inadmissible to show the insanity of the defendant in a criminal prosecution, being purely hearsay evidence.

2. Guardianship proceedings.

Proceedings for the appointment of a guardian or conservator are admissible upon the question of the ward's mental condition, the court holding in McAllister v. Rowland (1913) 124 Minn. 27, 144 N. W. 412, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1006, that the fact that the application was not to have testatrix declared insane, but only to have a guardian appointed because of the impairment of her mental faculties by reason of old age, and the consequent inability to manage her affairs, did not render the adjudication inadmissible.

Such proceedings were held competent evidence of testamentary incapacity in Re Loveland (1912) 162 Cal. 595, 123 Pac. 801; HOLLIDAY v. SHEPHERD (reported herewith) ante, 558; Spiers v. Hendershott (1909) 142 Iowa, 446, 120 N. W. 1058; Rice v. Rice (1883) 50 Mich. 448, 15 N. W. 545.

An adjudication of habitual drunkenness is competent evidence of subsequent testamentary incapacity. Lewis v. Jones (1868) 50 Barb. (N. Y.) 645.

It was held in Mulholland's Estate (1907) 217 Pa. 65, 66 Atl. 150, that an adjudication of weakmindedness of a testatrix, followed by the appointment of a guardian, was, because of its entry shortly after the making of the will, proper evidence for consideration in a conflict over the will.

A judgment in proceedings for the appointment of a guardian of an incompetent person is admissible evidence in any litigation, to prove the mental condition of the person at the time the judgment is rendered, or at any past time during which the judgment finds the person incompetent. McAllister v. Rowland (Minn.) supra.

In Herndon v. Vick (1898) 18 Tex. Civ. App. 583, 45 S. W. 852, an action to try title to land claimed by an alleged lunatic through his father, it was held that the fact that a foreign adjudication of lunacy and appointment of a guardian, involving land, was rendered by a court which had no jurisdiction over the land in question, did not render such adjudication inadmissible as evidence of the lunatic's unsoundness of mind, so as to bring him within the exception of incompetent persons in the Statute of Limitations.

An order of the probate court that a person is, by reason of mental infirmity, incompetent to have the charge and management of his estate, and appointing a guardian, where it otherwise appears that the condition of such person was continuing from boyhood to death, is proper to be considered as evidence of his mental capacity subsequently to execute a deed, although it does not appear that letters of guardianship were issued. Chase v. Spencer (1907) 150 Mich. 99, 113 N. W. 578.

In Cathcart v. Sugenhimer (1882) 18 S. C. 123, an action by a lunatic, after an adjudication superseding the commission of lunacy, to recover from the purchaser land sold by the plaintiff's committee to pay his debts, in proceedings alleging the lunacy of the plaintiff and the appointment of a committee for his person and estate, it was held that the record of such proceedings was admissible, though as to the lunatic res inter alios acta because he was not made a party, to show that he had been declared a lunatic, and that the court had ordered a sale of the land.

But it was held not error, in a proceeding to determine the validity of a will, to exclude from the consideration of the jury a court record showing that two or three years after the execution of the will a conservator was appointed over the estate of the testator, since, conceding that the appointment of the conservator was proper, it did not follow that the testator did not possess testamentary capacity to make a will. Entwistle v. Meikle (1899) 180 Ill. 9, 54 N. E. 217.

In Re Harvey (1908) — Iowa, —, 94 N. W. 559, subsequent proceedings for the appointment of a guardian over a testatrix were held properly excluded, apparently because too remote.

A verdict and judgment finding one mentally incompetent to manage his estate by reason of infirmity and age, and appointing a committee for him, are not competent evidence upon the question whether he had testamentary capacity six months previously. Watson v. Watson (1910) 137 Ky. 25, 121 S. W. 626.

Re Pinney (1880) 27 Minn. 280, 6 N. W. 791, 7 N. W. 144, holding that the record of the probate court, on an application to appoint a guardian for a person whose incapacity was due to the gradual decay of his mental faculties from great age, is properly excluded in determining his competency to make a will, was overruled in McAllister v. Rowland (1913) 124 Minn. 27, 144 N. W. 412, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1606.

In Schindler v. Parzoo (1908) 52 Or. 452, 97 Pac. 755, the court said: "There can be no doubt, however, of the general principle that the adjudication by itself cannot relate to a prior time as evidence of incapacity, . . . but when it is shown that the mental condition of the ward had been the same for a considerable length of time, and was the same at the time of the act to be affected by it as when the adjudication was had, the adjudication is competent evidence of previous insanity. . . . And in a case where mental weakness and incapacity are the concomitants of old age, and have been gradual and continuous for a considerable time, and not the result of any recent or intervening cause, but of gradual and natural decay, such evidence is competent to show that the conditions have not changed, but are the same as when the adjudication was had."

proceedings for the appointment of a guardian for the testatrix were a nullity because instituted in the wrong county, it was held that the record of those proceedings should have been excluded, as the facts and circumstances surrounding the appointment afforded no reasonable ground for inferring an admission on the part of testatrix that she was in need of a guardian to manage her business.

3. Proceedings to determine sanity of prisoners awaiting trial.

A finding of a jury, impaneled to try the question of sanity of one in custody on a criminal charge, that such person is insane, is competent evidence, on his being brought to trial, upon the question whether he was insane at the time of the commission of the supposed offense. People v. Farrell (1867) 31 Cal. 576.

And in Bond v. State (1913) 129 Tenn. 75, 165 S. W. 229, the court held admissible, on the question of the mental condition of the accused at the time of the offense, a verdict of the jury, on the accused being put to trial on his plea of present insanity, to the effect that he was then insane and incapable of defending the charge against him.

Proceedings in which one was adjudged insane, had on the day after the homicide, and based upon the provisions of a statute providing that it shall not apply to persons charged with criminal offenses and who plead insanity, are properly excluded from evidence upon the trial for homicide of the person adjudged to be insane, in which insanity was relied upon as a defense. Davis v. State (1902) 44 Fla. 32, 32 So. 822; Johnson v. State (1909) 57 Fla. 18, 49 So. 40.

4. Miscellaneous.

It was held in Davis v. Davis (1910) 24 S. D. 474, 124 N. W. 715, that an adjudication that the grantor was insane, in an action in another state by the grantor's heir to cancel the deed, was admissible in a subsequent action between the same parties to cancel a subsequent deed to other property by the alleged lunatic to the same grantee, as evidence of the mental condi-

d. As against persons not parties or privies to, or without notice of, lunacy proceedings.

Most of the cases which hold an adjudication of insanity or incompetency admissible on the issue of mental condition in a collateral action or proceeding assume without discussion that its admissibility is not dependent upon the party against whom it is offered having been a party or privy in the proceeding in which the adjudication was made. Some of the cases, however, discuss the point, and a few have rejected the adjudication on the ground that it was res inter alios.

The principle of the admissibility of an inquest against strangers seems to be that it is a public proceeding, had under public authority, and in which the public are interested, and that therefore, all persons being to some extent interested and represented in the proceedings, all should in some degree be bound by it. Hopson v. Boyd (1845) 6 B. Mon. (Ky.) 296.

An inquisition of lunacy is admissible upon the question of the lunatic's competency to testify, although his testimony is offered against one who was not a party to the proceedings in lunacy. Hoyt v. Adees (1870) 3 Lans. (N. Y.) 173.

In State v. McMurtry (1899) 61 Kan. 87, 58 Pac. 961, holding admissible the record of a proceeding in lunacy on the issue of insanity in a criminal prosecution, the court said: "Ordinarily, the judgment of a court is not receivable in a controversy to which a stranger to the judgment is a party, except merely to prove its existence and effect. . . . An exception, however, is made in the case of judgments in rem, declaring the status of persons or things. These are adjudications to which, in a sense, the whole world is a party."

And in Osterhout v. Shoemaker (1842) 3 Hill (N. Y.) 518, where it was unnecessary to pass upon the admissibility of an inquisition because, after its admission in evidence, it was withdrawn with the assent of the defendant, the court said: "I see no principle upon which the inquisition taken on a commission of lunacy can be given in evidence to defeat the title of third persons who were strangers to the proceeding, and had no opportunity to offer or cross-examine witnesses. But it seems to be settled that such evidence is admissible, though not conclusive."

But it was held, in an action to annul a deed on the ground of the mental incapacity of the grantor, that the record of the lunacy proceedings by which the grantor was committed to the insane asylum several years before he made the deed was properly rejected as res inter alios acta, such proceedings being purely ex parte, and hence not binding upon the grantor nor upon his later privies in estate. Frederic v. Wilkins (1913) 182 Ala. 343, 62 So. 518.

An inquisition of lunacy found five years subsequent to the date of the will is, where the record does not disclose that the propounders of the will were parties or privies to that proceeding, res inter alios acta, and hence inadmissible. Terry v. Buffington (1852) 11 Ga. 337, 56 Am. Dec. 423.

The record of the appointment of a guardian, made nearly a year after the date of a deed, is not admissible as bearing on the question whether the grantor was of sound mind, at the time of its execution, such proceeding being res inter alios. Hovey v. Chase (1863) 52 Me. 304, 83 Am. Dec. 514.

In Rhoades v. Fuller (1907) 139 Mo. 179, 40 N. W. 760, the court gave, as one of the reasons for holding an adjudication of the insanity of the grantor inadmissible in an action to set aside a deed, that the defendant was not a party to the inquisition, had no connection with it, and that his rights previously acquired could in no possible way be affected thereby.

And in Sprinkle v. Wellborn (1905) 140 N. C. 163, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 174, 111 Am. St. Rep. 827, 52 S. E. 666, where an objection to the admission of an inquisition of lunacy was held untenable, because it was received only for the consideration of the court in order to decide upon the competency of a witness, the court stated that the inquisition was, of course, inadmissible, for the reason, among others, that the lunacy proceedings were ex parte.

The adjudication is generally held inadmissible if the proceeding in which it was made was void, regardless of the nature of the defect which rendered the proceeding void.

The decree of a court of probate granting letters of guardianship of one as non compos mentis was held inadmissible, because void, in Wait v. Maxwell (1827) 5 Pick. (Mass.) 217, 16 Am. Dec. 391.

Where a proceeding to secure the appointment of a committee for an alleged incompetent is void on its face, it will be presumed that such person is competent. Hanson v. Hanson (1916) 148 C. C. A. 451, 234 Fed. 853.

In an action by one claiming title to property under a bill of sale, in which the defense was that at the date of the execution of the instrument the grantor was non compos mentis, an inquisition had by order of the court to ascertain the competency of such individual, of the pendency of which he had no notice, was improperly admitted in evidence. McCurry v. Hooper (1848) 12 Ala. 823, 46 Am. Dec. 280.

An adjudication of insanity in a proceeding, the hearing in which was had twenty-four hours before the time fixed in the order, is void for want of jurisdiction, and is, therefore, inadmissible in a subsequent proceeding to have a guardian appointed of the person and property of the alleged insane person. Re Phillips (1890) 158 Mich. 155, 122 N. W. 554.

A judgment of insanity without notice to the person adjudged insane, and without appearance, is not competent evidence to show that the purported maker of a deed was, at the date thereof, insane and in ward, such judgment being absolutely void. Hunt v. Searcy (1902) 167 Mo. 158, 67 S. W. 206.

The portion of an inquisition finding prior insanity is not admissible on the question of the lunatic's prior testamentary capacity, since the Code expressly limits and confines the inquiry as to competency to the time of the hearing. Re Preston (1906) 113 App. Div. 732, 99 N. Y. Supp. 312.

In Carter v. Gahagan (1918) 102 Neb. 404, 167 N. W. 412, the admission in a will contest of the record of a guardianship proceeding, which was a nullity because held in a county other than that in which the alleged incompetent resided, was held prejudicial error, the surrounding facts and circumstances affording no reasonable ground for inferring an admission on the part of the testatrix that she needed a guardian to manage her business.

And in Karnes v. Johnston (1906) 58 W. Va. 595, 52 S. E. 658, it was held that an order of a justice of the peace finding that a person was insane, but not committing him to a hospital for the insane, but committing him to the custody of a committee to be appointed, was inadmissible in a proceeding for the appointment of a committee before the county court, for the reason that such finding of the justice was beyond his jurisdiction, which was limited by statute to a finding of lunacy solely for the purpose of commitment to a hospital for the insane.

But in Herndon v. Vick (1898) 18 Tex. Civ. App. 583, 45 S. W. 852, it was held that the fact that a foreign adjudication of lunacy, involving land, was rendered by a court which had no jurisdiction over the land in question, did not render such adjudication inadmissible as evidence of the lunatic's unsoundness of mind, so as to bring him within the exception of incompetent persons in the Statute of Limitations.

In Arrington v. Short (1824) 10 N. C. (3 Hawks) 71, an action on the bond of one previously adjudged to be a lunatic, the trial court, upon objection to the introduction in evidence of the inquisition of lunacy on the ground of invalidity, permitted the lunacy proceedings to be read subject to such remarks as he might make thereon in instructing the jury, and, after explaining in his charge what the law intended by the reason and understanding sufficient to contract, remarked on the proceedings that, if regular, they would be but prima facie evidence of defendant's incapacity, but that here they were irregularly taken and void as an inquisition, though the jury might give to them the same weight which they would to the opinion of any twelve respectable men. The appellate court, on granting a new trial, said: "It seems to me that the court erred in stating to the jury that the paper writing purporting to be an inquest of lunacy was not, and ought not to be, considered in the light of an inquest. I think it was too late to question it; it had been received by the county court as such; they had proceeded to appoint a guardian in consequence of it; and the proceedings show that that guardian had been, by the plaintiff himself, made a party to this suit. It is true, the writing or inquest was read to the jury; but its effects might have been weakened by stating to them that it was only the opinion of twelve honest men, but not such evidence as a lawful inquest would be. Although received as an inquest, it would not be conclusive evidence; yet it ought to have been given to them in that character."

An adjudication of insanity is admissible upon the question of the lunatic's capacity to execute a deed. Nichol v. Thomas (1876) 53 Ind. 42; Yauger v. Skinner (1862) 14 N. J. Eq. 389; Van Deusen v. Sweet (1873) 51 N. Y. 378; Hutchinson v. Sandt (1833) 4 Rawle (Pa.) 234, 26 Am. Dec. 127; Rogers v. Walker (1847) 6 Pa. 371, 47 Am. Dec. 470; Davis v. Davis (1910) 24 S. D. 474, 124 N. W. 715; Giles v. Hodge (1889) 74 Wis. 860, 43 N. W. 163.

There is a dictum to the same effect in Osterhout v. Shoemaker (1842) 3 Hill (N. Y.) 513.

In Hall v. Warren (1804) 9 Ves. Jr. (Eng.) 605, 32 Eng. Reprint, 738, 7 Revised Rep. 306, an inquisition of lunacy was held admissible on a bill for the specific performance of a land contract.

In Mitchell v. Inman (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 156 S. W. 290, an action to cancel a deed on the ground of the grantor's insanity, an adjudication of lunacy was admitted to evidence over an objection limited to the validity of the adjudication.

A prior adjudication of lunacy is admissible to show the plaintiff's lunacy in an action by him for conversion of his property by his landlord, who bought in such property on a sale under a distress warrant, in satisfaction of rent. M'Creight v. Aiken (1838) 24 S. C. L. (Rice) 56.

In Rider v. Miller (1881) 86 N. Y. 507, an action to set aside a deed on the ground that the grantor was at the time non compos mentis, it was held that an inquisition of lunacy was competent evidence that at the time it was taken the grantor was not competent, and that to this extent and no more it was material, and whatever inference was to be derived therefrom prior to that time was a subject for consideration by the trial court.

In Frederic v. Wilkins (1913) 182 Ala. 343, 62 So. 518, the record of lunacy proceedings by which a grantor was committed to an insane asylum before he made the deed was held properly rejected as res inter alios acta.

And, for the same reason, the record of the appointment of a guardian was held in Hovey v. Chase (1863) 52 Me. 304, 83 Am. Dec. 514, inadmissible on the question of the ward's capacity to execute a deed.

In an action involving the validity of the deed made by a married woman, in which her husband joined, the alleged ground of its invalidity being that the husband was insane at the time, an order of the judge of probate committing the husband to the insane hospital is not admissible as evidence of his insanity, the question before the judge of probate being whether the husband was a proper subject for treatment or custody, while the issue before the jury was whether the husband was of sufficient mental capacity to give an intelligent consent to his wife's conveyance. Leggate v. Clark (1873) 111 Mass. 308.

And in Dewey v. Allgire (1893) 37 Neb. 6, 40 Am. St. Rep. 468, 55 N. W. 276, the record of statutory proceedings to determine whether a person was a fit subject for treatment in a hospital for the insane was held inadmissible on the question of his insanity at the time of the prior execution of a deed.

An adjudication of lunacy was held, in an action to set aside a deed of the lunatic, to be inadmissible because rendered subsequently to the execution of the deed. Uecker v. Zuercher (1909) 54 Tex. Civ. App. 289, 118 S. W. 149; Rowan v. Hodges (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 175 S. W. 847.

An inquisition, because void, was held, in McCurry v. Hooper (1848) 12 Ala. 823, 46 Am. Dec. 280, to have been improperly admitted in evidence on the question of the lunatic's capacity to execute a bill of sale.

And, in Hunt v. Searcy (1902) 167 Mo. 158, 67 S. W. 206, to be inadmissible for the same reason, on the question of the lunatic's competency to execute a deed.

In Wait v. Maxwell (1827) 5 Pick. (Mass.) 217, 16 Am. Dec. 391, the court held that the decree of a court of probate granting letters of guardianship of one non compos mentis was not admissible, because void, upon the question of her capacity to subsequently execute a deed.

B. Bills and notes.

An inquisition is admissible in an action on a note executed by the maker within the period during which he was found to have been a lunatic. Willis v. Willis (1849) 12 Pa. 159.

In Stitzel v. Farley (1909) 148 Ill. App. 635, where the maker of a note, adjudged insane but a few years before the making of the note, was released from the insane asylum and had been without a conservator until shortly after the making of the note, when a new conservator was appointed, it was held, in an action on the note, that it was a question of fact to be found by the jury from all the evidence, whether the maker was or was not of sound mind at the time of the execution of the note.

In an action upon a note by the administrator of the payee, defended upon the ground of a settlement, a subsequent order for the appointment of a guardian of the payee was held admissible in evidence as to his mental condition at the time of the entry of such order, but not as to his condition at the time of the making of the settlement. Burnham v. Mitchell (1874) 34 Wis. 117.

An inquisition, because made after the alleged lunatic parted with the notes in question, was held inadmissible in an action of replevin by his guardian to recover them. Small v. Champeny (1899) 102 Wis. 61, 78 N. W. 407.

Since, on a trial of a scire facias to revive a judgment, the original judgment is not open to attack for any cause, an inquisition of lunacy is not admissible as evidence of the defendant's incapacity to execute the note on which the original judgment was rendered. Henry v. Brothers (1864) 48 Pa. 70.

C. Miscellaneous.

An inquisition is admissible, in an action of debt on a bond, on the question of the obligor's incompetency to execute such bond. Hart v. Deamer (1831) 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 497; Faulder v. Silk (1811) 3 Campb. (Eng.) 126, 18 Revised Rep. 771.

An adjudication finding one who has made agreements for legal services to have been a lunatic before the agreements were made is admissible in an action upon such agreements. Goodell v. Harrington (1874) 3 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 345.

In Pearl v. M'Dowell (1830) 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 653, 20 Am. Dec. 199, an action of assumpsit for medical services to an alleged lunatic, it was held that the fact that the one to whom the services were rendered was a lunatic at the time of the supposed assumpsit, so found before that time by a regular inquisition, was admissible and a complete bar to the action.

And in Portsmouth v. Portsmouth (1828) 1 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 355, 162 Eng. Reprint, 611, an inquisition was held admissible, in a suit to annul a marriage solemnized within the period of the finding of insanity.

An adjudication of insanity is competent evidence of the mental condition of the testator at the execution of a will. Re Baker (1917) 176 Cal. 430, 168 Pac. 881.

The record of an inquisition de lunatico inquirendo is admissible on the trial of an issue devisavit vel non, but such portion of the order of adjudication as instructed the committee appointed, as to the scope of his duties, is incompetent. Kerr v. Lunsford (1888) 31 W. Va. 659, 2 L.R.A. 668, 8 S. E. 493.

In determining the question of capacity of a testator to make an alteration in his will, an inquisition of lunacy finding him to have been a lunatic, without lucid intervals, from a period of about seventeen months prior to his death, is admissible. Hawkins v. Grimes (1852) 13 B. Mon. (Ky.) 257.

In Van Guysling v. Van Kuren (1866) 35 N. Y. 70, upholding the probate of a will, an inquisition eight months after the date of the will, finding the testator to have been insane five months prior to the inquisition, was apparently admitted in evidence.

An adjudication of weakmindedness was held in Mulholland's Estate (1907) 217 Pa. 65, 66 Atl. 150, to be competent, because of its entry shortly after the making of the will.

The commitment of a person to an insane asylum is admissible in evidence as bearing on the question of his capacity to make a subsequent will. Mileham v. Montagne (1910) 148 Iowa, 476, 125 N. W. 664; Re Barney (1919) 185 App. Div. 782, 174 N. Y. Supp. 242.

In Re Smith (1913) 163 N. C. 464, 79 S. E. 977, the contest of a will on the ground of testamentary incapacity, the court held that it could not consider on appeal an exception to the refusal of the trial judge to receive in evidence a record in a proceeding said to have involved the sanity of the testator, because the appellate court was not informed as to its contents so that it could see its relevancy, and give an intelligent opinion as to the validity of the exception.

The exclusion, in a suit to set aside the probate of a will on the ground of the testatrix's mental incapacity, of the record of an adjudication that the testatrix was of unsound mind and incapable of managing her estate, rendered five years after the making of the will, is not erroneous where there was direct evidence of the mental capacity of the testatrix when the will was executed. Taylor v. Taylor (1910) 174 Ind. 670, 93 N. E. 9.

In Terry v. Buffington (1852) 11 Ga. 337, 56 Am. Dec. 423, an inquisition of lunacy was held inadmissible because the propounders of the will were not parties or privies to the lunacy proceeding.

And in Watson v. Watson (1910) 137 Ky. 25, 121 S. W. 626, a judgment finding one mentally incompetent to manage his estate by reason of infirmity and age was held incompetent, on the issue of his testamentary capacity six months previously.

In Re Preston (1906) 113 App. Div. 782, 99 N. Y. Supp. 312, the portion of an inquisition finding prior insanity was held inadmissible on the issue of the capacity of the lunatic to execute a prior will, on the ground that the Code of Civil Procedure expressly limited the inquiry in lunacy proceedings to the mental condition of the alleged lunatic at the time of the hearing.

But in Dominick v. Dominick (1887) 20 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 286, where such Code provision was made the ground of objection to the admission of a subsequent inquisition, in an action involving the capacity of a testatrix to destroy her will, it was held that the submission of the inquisition to the jury without any remark as to its effect was not open to such objection, especially where no instructions were requested as to the effect of such evidence.

Proof of the appointment of a conservator for the testator about a month before the will was made, on the verdict of a jury finding him insane, is admissible as bearing on the question of his capacity to make a will. HOLLIDAY v. SHEPHERD (reported herewith) ante, 558.

The subsequent appointment of a guardian of a testatrix is proper for the consideration of the jury, on the question of her mental condition at the time the will was made. Spiers v. Hendershott (1909) 142 Iowa, 446, 120 N. W. 1058.

Proof of the appointment of a guardian for a person, as incompetent to manage his own affairs, is admissible in evidence on the question of his testamentary capacity. Rice v. Rice (1883) 50 Mich. 448, 15 N. W. 545.

An adjudication of incompetency in guardianship proceedings, only a few days after the execution of a will by the alleged incompetent, while not fixing the status of the person affected as incompetent to make a will on a date prior to that of the adjudication, is evidence proper to be considered on the issue of want of testamentary capacity at the time of the appointment of the guardian; and where there is testimony tending to show that the mental condition of the person has not changed between the date of the act in question and the appointment of a guardian, the appointment, although later in time, is admissible on the issue of capacity when the act was done. Re Loveland (1912) 162 Cal. 595, 123 Pac. 801.

Whether a judgment in proceedings for the appointment of a guardian of an incompetent person, instituted after a will was made, which did not find the testator incompetent at such prior time, should be admitted on the question of his testamentary capacity, depends on its probative value as tending to prove the fact at issue. It stands on the same basis as would other evidence of the mental condition of the testator at a subsequent time. Whether it has probative value is largely for the trial court to determine. McAllister v. Rowland (1913) 124 Minn. 27, 144 N. W. 412, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1006.

But it was held in Re Harvey (1903) — Iowa, —, 94 N. W. 559, that proceedings for the appointment of a guardian over the testatrix, two years after the date of the will, were properly excluded in a will contest.

The exclusion of the record of the subsequent appointment of a conservator was held not error in Entwistle v. Meikle (1899) 180 Ill. 9, 54 N. E. 217, on the ground that, conceding that the appointment was proper, it did not follow that the testator did not possess testamentary capacity.

The record of the appointment of a guardian for a testator because of the gradual decay of his mental faculties from great age was held to have been properly excluded in Re Pinney (1880) 27 Minn. 280, 6 N. W. 791, 7 N. W. 144. This case was, however, overruled in McAllister v. Rowland (Minn.) supra.

In Carter v. Gahagan (1918) 102 Neb. 404, 167 N. W. 412, it was held that the record of guardianship proceedings should be excluded, where the evidence shows that the circumstances surrounding the appointment of the guardian for the testatrix afford no reasonable doubt for inferring an admission by her that she was in need of a guardian.

In Roe v. Nix L. R. [1898] P. (Eng.) 55, 68 L. T. N. S. 26, 62 L. J. Prob. N. S. 36, 1 Reports, 472, the reports of the chancellor's visitors to a testatrix in an insane asylum, which the court considered to be the best evidence extant as to her testamentary capacity, were rejected by him because of the refusal of the Lords Justices to permit their use in evidence, since by statute they were required to be kept secret, and to be destroyed upon the inmate's death.

h. Criminal irresponsibility.

A verdict upon a lunacy inquest is competent evidence upon a trial of the incompetent for the commission of a crime either before or after the inquest. Davidson v. Com. (1916) 171 Ky. 488, 188 S. W. 631.

The same holding is made in McCully v. State (1920) — Ark. —, 217 S. W. 453, as to the record of a probate court showing commitment to an insane asylum.

A prior adjudication of insanity and commitment to an insane asylum are admissible on the trial of the issue of insanity in a prosecution for crime. — State v. McMurry (1899) 61 Kan. 87, 58 Pac. 961 (arson); Wheeler v. State (1878) 34 Ohio St. 394, 32 Am. Rep. 372 (burglary and larceny); Hemp-ton v. State (1901) 111 Wis. 127, 86 N. W. 596, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 657 (homicide).

In Bond v. State (1913) 129 Tenn. 75, 165 S. W. 229, a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, it was held that a subsequent inquisition whose finding of lunacy overreached the time of the commission of the crime was admissible, as was also the verdict of the jury, on the accused being put to trial on his plea of present insanity, that he was then insane and incapable of defending the charge against him.

An inquisition of lunacy, held at the same term of court at which the trial of a person on a criminal charge occurs, is admissible in support of his defense that he was of unsound mind at the time of committing the crime charged. Smedley v. Com. (1910) 139 Ky. 767, 127 S. W. 485.

A finding of insanity by a jury impaneled to try the question of sanity of one in custody on a criminal charge is competent evidence on his subsequent trial. People v. Farrell (1867) 31 Cal. 576.

In Cooper v. State (1913) 71 Tex. Crim. Rep. 489, 160 S. W. 382, a prosecution for bigamy, a prior adjudication of lunacy was admitted without objection, the court refusing, which was held proper, to permit the accused to introduce a certified copy of the evidence in the lunacy proceeding.

An inquisition of lunacy was received in evidence in Rex v. Bowler (1812; Eng.) 1 Starkie, Ev. 7th Am. ed. 309, vol. 2, p. 1277, note, on a prosecution for shooting at and wounding another, with a blunderbuss.

It was held in State v. Glindemann (1904) 34 Wash. 221, 101 Am. St. Rep. 1001, 75 Pac. 800, a prosecution for incest, that the exclusion of the appointment of a guardian for the accused was not reversible error, where the actual adjudication of his insanity preceding the guardianship proceeding was in evidence.

Proceedings in which one charged with homicide was adjudged insane, based on a statute providing that it shall not apply to persons charged with criminal offenses and who plead insanity, are properly excluded on his trial. Davis v. State (1902) 44 Fla. 32, 32 So. 822; Johnson v. State (1909) 57 Fla. 18, 49 So. 40.

In Re Maas (1900) 10 Okla. 302, 61 Pac. 1057, it was held that an order of a county board of insanity adjudging a murderer to be insane had no bearing upon his legal mental status, the effect of such an order being to admit one to the territorial asylum for treatment; and that such an order was not entitled to the faith and credit of a judgment of a court, as the members of such board did not act as judicial officers, but as a special board clothed with special powers only.

And in People v. Willard (1907) 150 Cal. 543, 89 Pac. 124, the certificates of the examining physicians in a proceeding for the commitment of a person to a state asylum were held inadmissible, because hearsay, to show the insanity of the defendant in a criminal prosecution.

4. Mental unfitness for trial.

The verdict of a jury which was called at a previous term of the court to inquire into the sanity of a prisoner, for the purpose of determining whether his trial ought to proceed at that term or be postponed, may be received in evidence at a subsequent term, for the purpose of showing that the defendant was still insane, and therefore that his trial ought to be further postponed. People v. Farrell (1867) 31 Cal. 576.

In Reeves v. State (1914) 186 Ala. 14, 65 So. 160, where it was suggested to the court that the defendant was insane and therefore ought not to be placed on trial, and the defendant, on this issue, seemed to rely solely on an order committing him to the state asylum for the insane, it was held that the court properly submitted the issue to the jury.

And in Bond v. State (1913) 129 Tenn. 75, 165 S. W. 229, it was held that the verdict of the jury, on the accused being put to trial on his plea of present insanity, that he was then insane and incapable of defending the charge against him, was admissible on his subsequent trial.

An inquisition of lunacy is admissible on the issue of the lunatic's competency to testify. Hoyt v. Adees (1870) 3 Lans. (N. Y.) 173.

And in Barker v. Washburn (1911) 200 N. Y. 280, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 159, 140 Am. St. Rep. 640, 93 N. E. 958, an inquisition was admitted in evidence on such issue, apparently without objection, the holding being as to its effect.

But in Hicks v. State (1905) 165 Ind. 440, 75 N. E. 641, it was held that the proceedings in an examination by a commission as to a person's sanity, to determine whether he should be sent to a hospital for the insane, were inadmissible as affecting his credibility as a witness five years subsequently.

An adjudication of insanity is admissible as tending to establish the extent of personal injuries sustained. Donnelly v. Chicago City R. Co. (1911) 163 Ill. App. 7.

An inquisition of lunacy is properly admitted in an action for divorce on the alleged ground of desertion, to show the insanity of the defendant during a part of the period of desertion. Blandy v. Blandy (1902) 20 App. D. C. 535.

An adjudication of lunacy is admissible in an action on a bond of the committee by his successor, to recover a balance of the lunatic's estate in the hands of the first committee. Com. use of Beatty v. Patterson (1900) 13 Pa. Super. Ct. 136.

An adjudication of insanity is conclusive evidence of the lunatic's mental condition at the time of such adjudication. Avery v. Avery (1919) — Cal. App. —, 183 Pac. 453; Lucas v. Parsons (1857) 28 Ga. 267; Clark v. Trail (1858) 1 Met. (Ky.) 35; Andrews v. Andrews (1905) 120 Ky. 718, 87 S. W.

1080, 90 S. W. 581; Johnson v. Mitchell (1912) 146 Ky. 382, 142 S. W. 675; Wathens v. Skaggs (1914) 161 Ky. 600, 171 S. W. 198; Rahh v. Smith (1918) 180 Ky. 326, 202 S. W. 501; Southern Tier Masonic Relief Asso. v. Laudenbach (1889) 5 N. Y. Supp. 901; Johnston v. Given (1884) 4 Walk. (Pa.) 341; Hempton v. State (1901) 111 Wis. 127, 86 N. W. 596, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 657.

But it was held in Hill v. Day (1881) 34 N. J. Eq. 150, and Mott v. Mott (1891) 49 N. J. Eq. 192, 22 Atl. 997, that a subsequent inquisition, finding the lunatic to have been insane from a time prior to the conveyance by him in question, was not, as to the other party thereto, conclusive even as to the point of time when taken.

And in Rider v. Miller (1881) 86 N. Y. 507, the court said: "The inquisition of lunacy was also competent and prima facie evidence that at the time it was taken the grantor was not competent. To this extent, and no more, it was material, and whatever inference is to be derived therefrom prior to that time was a subject for consideration by the trial court."

1. Prior adjudication.

There is a conflict of authority on the question whether an adjudication of insanity or incompetency resulting in the appointment of a guardian or committee is conclusive, or only prima facie, evidence of subsequent incapacity to contract. In some jurisdictions it is held that the adjudication is conclusive of the person's incapacity to make ordinary contracts subsequently thereto, and until the guardian or committee has been discharged, or the adjudication has in some other direct way been rendered no longer effectual.

Texas.—Elston v. Jasper (1876) 45 Tex. 409 (obiter).

The reason given in Leonard v. Leonard (1833) 14 Pick. (Mass.) 280, for holding the adjudication conclusive of the disability of the lunatic in relation to all subjects on which his guardian can act is that otherwise the situation of the guardian would be extremely unpleasant, and it would be almost impossible to execute the trust.

Marriage contracts, however, are held in these jurisdictions to be an exception to the rule, on the ground that marriage is a contract so peculiarly individual and personal as not to permit of anyone acting for the party concerned. Payne v. Burdette (1900) 84 Mo. App. 332; Goodheart v. Ransley (1892) 11 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 655.

But it was held in O'Reilly v. Sweeney (1907) 54 Misc. 408, 105 N. Y. Supp. 1033, that an inquisition of lunacy was conclusive evidence of the subsequent incapacity of the lunatic to make a promise of marriage.

In Kiehne v. Wessell (1893) 53 Mo. App. 667, where the ward had no guardian at the time of the execution of the contract in question, the court said that the adjudication of lunacy was conclusive as to subsequent contracts, regardless of the fact whether the lunatic had a guardian or not.

But in Gibson v. Soper (1876) 6 Gray (Mass.) 279, 66 Am. Dec. 414, the court stated that an adjudication of insanity was not conclusive unless followed by the appointment of a guardian, and that then the party became incapable of contracting, not merely from the state of his mind, but because the power of present control over his property was taken from him.

And it was held in Southern Tier Masonic Relief Asso. v. Laudendach (1889) 5 N. Y. Supp. 901, that an inquisition of lunacy was not conclusive evidence of the subsequent incapacity of the lunatic to contract, where his committee never qualified or acted, but that in such case his subsequent recovery might be shown.

And in Tozer v. Saturlee (1855) 3 Grant, Cas. (Pa.) 162, the court said: "Where it is suspended or abandoned in mid-course, as seems to have been the case here, it may be doubted whether any stronger presumption is furnished by an inquisition as to contracts made after it was found, than as to such as were made previously, but within the ascertained period of incompetency. If no stronger, then it is not conclusive, and may be rebutted by such evidence as was offered here."

The nature of the cause of the insanity, whether old age, sickness, habitual drunkenness, or other cause, does not affect the conclusiveness of the adjudication. Rannells v. Gerner (1883) 80 Mo. 474.

In other jurisdictions, however, an adjudication of insanity or incompetency resulting in the appointment of a guardian or committee is held to be merely prima facie, and not conclusive, evidence of subsequent incapacity to contract. EAGLE v. PETERSON (reported herewith) ante, 553; Barkheimer v. Lockhart (1919) — Ark.

—, 213 S. W. 381; Field v. Lucas (1857) 21 Ga. 447, 68 Am. Dec. 465; Chase v. Spencer (1907) 150 Mich. 99, 118 N. W. 578 (letters of guardianship not issued); Armstrong v. Short (1820) 8 N. C. (1 Hawks) 11; Arrington v. Short (1824) 10 N. C. (3 Hawks) 71 (obiter); Johnson v. Kincaide (1843) 37 N. C. (2 Ired. Eq.) 470 (marriage contract); Parker v. Davis (1862) 53 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 460; Blaisdell v. Holmes (1875) 48 Vt. 492 (practically not under guardianship); Miller v. Rutledge (1887) 82 Va. 863, 1 S. E. 202 (committee practically discharged before contract).

Whatever may be the true rule as regards subsequent incapacity to contract, the courts are substantially agreed that for other purposes the adjudication is at most prima facie, and not conclusive, evidence of mental incapacity, even when the inquiry relates to a time subsequent to the adjudication. Thus the adjudication is only prima facie, and not conclusive, evidence of testamentary incapacity (see infra, II. h), of criminal irresponsibility (see infra, II. i), and of incapacity to testify (see infra, II. k).

2. Subsequent adjudication.

The general rule as to the probative force of an adjudication of insanity, made after the transaction in question, is that such an adjudication is not conclusive, but at most presumptive, evidence of insanity, a few cases holding that it does not have even this force.

Ireland.—Hassard v. Smith (1872) Ir. Rep. 6 Eq. 429.

It was held in Andrews v. Andrews (1905) 120 Ky. 718, 87 S. W. 1080, 90 S. W. 581, that an adjudication of lunacy raised no presumption that its subject was a lunatic at any previous time.

A judgment of inquest finding a person to be mentally unsound has no retroactive effect. Rath v. Smith (1918) 180 Ky. 326, 202 S. W. 501.

In Shirley v. Taylor (1844) 5 B. Mon. (Ky.) 99, it was held that an inquest finding a person to be of unsound mind was no evidence that he was of unsound mind sixteen months previously.

It was held in Wathens v. Skaggs (1914) 161 Ky. 600, 171 S. W. 198, an action to cancel a deed on the ground of the grantor's insanity, that proof of an inquest held a few days after its execution, adjudging him incompetent to manage his estate, did not relieve the plaintiff of the burden of establishing the grantor's mental incapacity at the date of the conveyance.

It was held in Whitenack v. Stryker (1838) 2 N. J. Eq. 8, as to an inquisition of lunacy taken after the making of a codicil admitted to probate, that it was only entitled to the respect which was due to the opinion expressed in their verdict, of the jurors on the inquisition.

In New York, prior to 1875, a subsequent adjudication was presumptive evidence of insanity, but since the change in the law at that time, as is held in Boschen v. Stockwell (1918) 224 N. Y. 356, 120 N. E. 728; Southern Tier Masonic Relief Asso. v. Laudenschach (1889) 5 N. Y. Supp. 901; Reals v. Weston (1899) 28 Misc. 67, 59 N. Y. Supp. 807, and Shanck v. Hooper (1916) 160 N. Y. Supp. 627, it has no force as evidence of prior insanity.

In Boschen v. Stockwell (N. Y.) supra, the court, in reference to this change, said: "The inquiry is limited and confined to the question of incompetency at the time of the inquiry, and such has been the law ever since chapter 446 of the Laws of 1875, title 2, § 2. Prior to that time the practice had been to permit the jury to find how long the lunacy had continued (2 Barbour, Ch. Pr. 234; Butler v. Jarvis (1889) 51 Hun, 248, 4 N. Y. Supp. 137; L'Amoureux v. Crosby (1831) 2 Paige (N. Y.) 422, 22 Am. Dec. 655; Hart v. Deamer (1831) 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 497; Griswold v. Miller (1851) 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 520), and it had been held that a finding on an inquisition that the insanity existed at a date prior to the date of inquiry was presumptive evidence of the fact; that if the finding of the jury overreached the execution of a deed executed by the alleged incompetent, their inquisition was presumptive, but not conclusive, evidence of the grantor's incapacity. Van Deusen v. Sweet (1872) 51 N. Y. 378; Hughes v. Jones (1889) 116 N. Y. 67, 5 L.R.A. 632, 15 Am. St. Rep. 386, 22 N. E. 446. Although this latter case was not decided in this court until 1889, examination will disclose that the lunacy proceedings were conducted under the old practice, the inquisition being returned on the 18th day of October, 1871. However, since the amendment above referred to there is no such presumption, and the finding by the jury that the lunacy existed at a time prior to the date of the inquiry is of no effect and without authority. Attention was directed to this change in the practice by the present chief of this court when sitting at special term. Reals v. Weston (1899) 28 Misc. 67, 59 N. Y. Supp. 807. See also Re Preston (1906) 113 App. Div. 732, 99 N. Y. Supp. 312. In Dominick v. Dominick (1887) 20 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 286, it was said of § 2335 of the Code of Civil Procedure: ' . . . By this section a change has been made in the practice to be pursued in this class of cases. Prior to its enactment the jury were at liberty to inquire into, and return a statement of, the antecedent period over which the lunacy had extended; and upon such a determination as to that period the inquisition was accepted by the court as prima facie or presumptive evidence that the unsoundness of mind had so far continued. Van Deusen v. Sweet (1872) 51 N. Y. 378; Banker v. Banker (1875) 63 N. Y. 409. And it had this effect as evidence against persons acquiring rights or interests under the lunatic prior to the inquisition, although they were not parties to, and had no notice whatever of, the proceedings. It was probably to abolish the injustice of this rule that in the enactment of the Code of Civil Procedure it was declared that "the inquiry . . . must be confined to the question whether he is so incompetent at the time of the inquiry." Such authorities to the contrary as Richie v. Shepard (1913) 158 App. Div. 192, 143 N. Y. Supp. 19; Sander v. Savage (1902) 75 App. Div. 333, 78 N. Y. Supp. 189; Hardy v. Berger (1902) 76 App. Div. 393, 78 N. Y. Supp. 709, do not correctly state the law, and failed to note that the Van Deusen and Hughes Cases, cited and relied upon, were determined according to the practice before the above statutory change in the law."

An inquisition of lunacy, whose finding overreaches the execution of a mortgage by the alleged lunatic, is not sufficient evidence of his incapacity to throw the burden of proof on the mortgagee to show the mortgagor's sanity, in an action to set aside the mortgage. Jacobs v. Richards (1854) 18 Beav. 300, 52 Eng. Reprint, 118.

A person adjudged to be insane is presumed to continue such until it is shown that sanity has returned. People v. Farrell (1867) 81 Cal. 576; Lilly v. Waggoner (1862) 27 Ill. 395; Titcomb v. Vantyle (1877) 84 Ill. 371; Langdon v. People (1890) 133 Ill. 382, 24 N. E. 874; Mileham v. Montagne (1910) 148 Iowa, 476, 125 N. W. 664; State v. McMurtry (1899) 61 Kan. 87, 58 Pac. 961; Clark v. Trail (1858) 1 Met. (Ky.) 35; Herndon v. Vick (1898) 18 Tex. Civ. App. 583, 45 S. W. 852.

In Lucas v. Parsons (1857) 23 Ga. 267, holding that a finding in an inquisition of lunacy is not conclusive of lunacy at a subsequent date, the court said: "The fact which the judgment finds is that the party is a lunatic at the time of the judgment. The law, from this fact, presumes, strongly presumes, that he will remain so."

And in Small v. Champeny (1899) 102 Wis. 61, 78 N. W. 407, the court said: "The general rule is that an adjudication as to mental unsoundness is direct evidence of the fact at the time of the adjudication, and presumptive evidence of the condition of the subject at a subsequent time, upon the theory that a condition of mind once shown to exist is presumed to continue."

Where the insanity of a testator has been legally established by an inquisition of lunacy before the will was made, its continuance will be presumed and the onus cast upon the propounders of the will to show that the disqualification had been removed. Terry v. Buffington (1852) 11 Ga. 337, 56 Am. Dec. 423.

In Stitzel v. Farley (1909) 148 Ill. App. 635, where it appeared that the maker of a note previously adjudged insane had been released from the asylum, and been without a conservator until shortly after the making of the note, it was held in an action on the note that, the maker having once been adjudged insane and not adjudged sane thereafter by a court, the presumption of insanity continued, and the burden was upon the holder to establish the maker's sanity at the time the note was executed.

In a proceeding to have the committee discharged and a decree vacated, the adjudication of lunacy is prima facie evidence of continuing incapacity. Johnson v. Safe Deposit & T. Co. (1906) 104 Md. 460, 65 Atl. 333.

It is held in State v. Davis (1887) 27 S. C. 609, 4 S. E. 567, in connection with the defense of insanity to a charge of murder, that where insanity has once been established by the fact that the person in question has been committed to a lunatic asylum, the presumption is that the same state of mind continues to exist, until it has been overthrown by satisfactory evidence of restoration to sanity.

In Haynes v. Swann (1871) 6 Heisk. (Tenn.) 560, the court stated, upon the question of the validity of a deed signed by one previously adjudged a lunatic, that, the fact of insanity having been judicially ascertained, the law presumed its continuance until his restoration to sanity, or until a lucid interval was established by evidence.

In State ex rel. Thompson v. Snell (1907) 46 Wash. 327, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1191, 89 Pac. 931, an application for a writ of mandamus requiring the court to make an examination as to the defendant's sanity after a trial for murder, and an acquittal on the ground of insanity, it was held that the presumption of insanity created by such acquittal continued until overcome by contrary proof.

While, where one is proved and adjudged to be of unsound mind arising from mania, the presumption of law is, in a controversy whether a writing executed by him was executed in a lucid interval, that his condition is unchanged, until the contrary is shown, that rule does not apply to one offered as a witness in the presence of the court unless the witness is still confined in an asylum, or the judgment of lunacy is so recent as to raise the presumption of fact that his condition has not materially changed since the verdict. Covington v. O'Meara (1909) 133 Ky. 763, 119 S. W. 187.

But in Carter v. Beckwith (1891) 128 N. Y. 312, 28 N. E. 582, an action by an attorney for services rendered on the request of an adjudged lunatic in the prosecution of proceedings to supersede the commission of lunacy, the court said that a lunatic whose lunacy had been judicially determined, and for whom a committee had been appointed, is incapable of entering into any contract, and that any contract which he may assume to make while in that situation is absolutely void; and that the court will not inquire whether the lunacy, in fact, continued and existed when the contract was made, but that the presumption of its continuance is conclusive as to all dealings after the inquisition, until it has been superseded.

A decree appointing a conservator for an alleged incompetent, although it settles for the time being the status of the person whose property is to be held, raises no conclusive presumption of continued incapacity. Chase v. Chase (1914) 216 Mass. 394, 103 N. E. 857.

An adjudication of insanity, followed by the commitment of the patient to an asylum for the insane, does not create a conclusive presumption of continuance of insanity several years after the discharge of the patient from such asylum. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Wiswell (1896) 56 Kan. 765, 35 L.R.A. 258, 44 Pac. 996.

A person who had been adjudged insane and placed in an asylum for treatment, but who was not found by the jury to be incapable of managing her affairs, and for whom no guardian was ever appointed, will not, after she has been discharged from the asylum because of her improved condition, be conclusively presumed to continue insane until a formal adjudication shall be had finding that she has been restored to her reason. Topeka Water-Supply Co. v. Root (1895) 56 Kan. 187, 42 Pac. 715. See also to the same effect, Lower v. Schumacher (1900) 61 Kan. 625, 60 Pac. 538.

In Davis v. Davis (1910) 24 S. D. 474, 124 N. W. 715, an action to cancel a deed on the ground of the grantor's insanity, where a foreign judgment holding the grantor incompetent to execute a prior deed was admitted in evidence, it was held that the presumption that the mental condition of the grantor continued the same up to the time he executed the second deed was rebuttable.

This presumption may be repelled by oral testimony, and there is no rule of evidence which requires another request to be found in order that the presumption may be thereby rebutted. Rodgers v. Rodgers (1896) 56 Kan. 483, 43 Pac. 779; Clark v. Trail (1858) 1 Met. (Ky.) 35.

Where no guardian of the person and estate of a person who has been duly adjudged insane has been appointed, the discharge of such person from the insane asylum as restored to his right mind is sufficient to overcome the presumption that the insanity continued to exist after the person had been adjudged insane. Walker v. Coates (1896) 5 Kan. App. 209, 47 Pac. 158.

The presumption in favor of the legality of a marriage will prevail over the presumption that a person who has been adjudged insane by the proper tribunal continues insane until he has been duly declared sane. Castor v. Davis (1889) 120 Ind. 231, 22 N. E. 110.

A qualification of the rule that the insanity of a party, when once established, will be presumed to continue until it is disproved, is that too long a period of time must not be shown to have elapsed between the proved insanity and the act of crime charged against the prisoner. Langdon v. People (1890) 133 Ill. 382, 24 N. E. 874.

And in Wheeler v. State (1877) 34 Ohio St. 394, 32 Am. Rep. 372, where the record of an adjudication of lunacy and of confinement in an asylum was admitted on a subsequent prosecution of the lunatic for crime, the court said: "The length of time between confinement in the asylum and the commission of the act charged, the nature of the crime, and other facts, may render such inquisition of little weight as evidence; but its weight is for the jury in each case."

The distinction between a proceeding to have a guardian appointed for a person of alleged unsound mind, and a proceeding to have one adjudged a fit subject for custody and treatment in a hospital for the insane, is discussed in Dewey v. Allgire (1893) 37 Neb. 6, 40 Am. St. Rep. 468, 55 N. W. 276, holding inadmissible the record of a proceeding of the latter kind, where it is said: "At the common law an inquisition founded upon a commission de lunatico inquirendo, resulting in an adjudication of insanity, was held to be in all cases prima facie evidence, and sometimes conclusive of the insanity of the person charged. This was upon the ground that such a proceeding was in the nature of one in rem to determine the status of the party, and was therefore binding upon the whole world. This proceeding bore a close analogy to the proceedings under our statute, whereby guardians are appointed for persons insane. It differs very materially, however, from a proceeding looking toward the custody and treatment of a person in the hospital. In the latter proceeding the examination is more or less ex parte, and its object, under the broad definition of insanity before referred to, presents an issue entirely different from that presented in this case, which is the competency of the party to manage his own affairs and enter into a valid contract."

Proof of commitment of a person to the hospital for the curable insane nine years previously raises no presumption that he is still insane. Breedlove v. Bundy (1884) 96 Ind. 319.

Proceedings for the commitment to the state hospital for the insane, of a person needing care and treatment, do not establish his incapacity to do business. Knox v. Haug (1892) 48 Minn. 58, 50 N. W. 934.

An inquest of lunacy by which one was adjudged to be a person of unsound mind and committed to an asylum for treatment, though conclusive evidence that such was his condition at the time of the inquest, is only prima facie evidence of his incapacity to contract at a subsequent period. Johnson v. Mitchell (1912) 146 Ky. 382, 142 S. W. 675; Rath v. Smith (1918) 180 Ky. 326, 202 S. W. 501.

Commitment to a state hospital for the insane is not proof of incapacity to contract, prior thereto. Avery v. Avery (1919) — Cal. App. —, 183 Pac. 453.

Proof that a person had been adjudged to be of unsound mind and a fit person to be committed to the insane asylum, and of his commitment to the asylum in pursuance of such adjudication, is, where no guardian of his estate has been appointed, merely prima facie evidence of his incompetency to do business at a subsequent time. Walker v. Coates (1896) 5 Kan. App. 209, 47 Pac. 158.

An inquest of lunacy in which a person was adjudged to be of unsound mind and a fit subject for the lunatic asylum is only prima facie evidence of his condition at a subsequent period, and, being a mere presumption, may be repelled by oral testimony. Logan v. Vanarsdall (1905) 27 Ky. L. Rep. 322, 86 S. W. 981.

Statutory provisions for a commitment of an alleged insane person on the certificate of physicians, and an inquisition as to whether or not he is a public charge, make the certificate merely prima facie evidence of insanity, subject to be overthrown by countervailing evidence, and the statute does not therefore deprive the alleged insane person of his liberty without due process of law. Re Allen (1909) 82 Vt. 365, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 232, 73 Atl. 1078.

An order made in an ex parte proceeding committing a person to an insane asylum is not conclusive of his insanity in a criminal prosecution. Reeves v. State (1914) 186 Ala. 14, 65 So. 160.

In People v. Willard (1907) 150 Cal. 543, 89 Pac. 124, it was held that proof that the defendant in a prosecution for homicide had, on three different occasions, been committed to the state asylum for the insane, the last commitment having been made on the morning of the homicide, did not conclusively establish his irresponsibility. The court said: "There are many kinds and degrees of insanity, and it is not every kind or degree which will relieve a person from such responsibility, and the degree of mental impairment which would authorize his confinement in an asylum for the insane may be entirely different from the degree of mental derangement which will relieve him of responsibility for his criminal acts."

The transfer of a convict from the penitentiary to a lunatic asylum, under a statute authorizing the removal of an insane prisoner, is not conclusive upon the question of his insanity. Langdon v. People (1890) 133 Ill. 382, 24 N. E. 874.

Proof that one accused of assault had been confined in an insane asylum some years previously is not conclusive of his criminal irresponsibility. Meyer v. People (1895) 156 Ill. 126, 40 N. E. 490.

And in Wheeler v. State (1877) 34 Ohio St. 394, 32 Am. Rep. 372, the court said: "Ordinarily, such inquisitions are not conclusive, but only prima facie, evidence of incapacity, as will be seen from the authorities cited; but on a question like that in issue here, it is manifest they cannot be regarded as even prima facie evidence. A person who is a fit subject for confinement in an insane asylum does not necessarily have immunity from punishment for crime; and the length of time between confinement in the asylum and the commission of the act charged, the nature of the crime, and other facts, may render such inquisition of little weight as evidence; but its weight is for the jury in each case."

And it was held in McCully v. State (1920) — Ark. —, 217 S. W. 453, that the weight of a record of a probate court, showing commitment to an insane asylum, was for the jury in a criminal prosecution.

An adjudication that a person is a fit subject for treatment in the hospital for the insane is not conclusive of his want of responsibility for a crime subsequently committed. Pflueger v. State (1895) 46 Neb. 493, 64 N. W. 1094.

Proceedings for the commitment of a person to a hospital for the insane, under a statute which does not contemplate that such proceedings shall be a conclusive adjudication of insanity, but merely entitles the person pronounced insane to be placed in the hospital for treatment, is not conclusive of the insanity of such person in a prosecution for homicide. Goodwin v. State (1884) 96 Ind. 550.

Irresponsibility for a crime is not established by proof that, about twenty-five years previously, the defendant had been confined for a few months in a hospital for the insane. Blue v. Com. (1916) 171 Ky. 165, 188 S. W. 329.

An adjudication of insanity and confinement in an insane asylum affords prima facie evidence that the alleged lunatic is a person of unsound mind, within a statutory provision disqualifying such persons as witnesses. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v. Thompson (1897) 27 C. C. A. 333, 54 U. S. App. 222, 82 Fed. 720.

That a person has been found unsound of mind by a court of competent jurisdiction, and is an inmate of an asylum for the insane, is prima facie evidence that he is of unsound mind, and imposes the burden on the party offering him as a witness to show his competency. Covington v. O'Meara (1909) 133 Ky. 763, 119 S. W. 187.

A record made nine years before by two justices of the peace, certifying that a certain person was then insane and was a suitable person to be admitted into the hospital for the curable insane, and that he was then so committed, is not sufficient to establish his incompetency as a witness. Breedlove v. Bundy (1884) 96 Ind. 319.

It was held in Cathcart v. Matthews (1916) 105 S. C. 329, 89 S. E. 1021, an action for rent or for the use and occupation of land, upon the question of the capacity of an alleged lunatic to direct a conveyance of the land by his trustee, that his prior confinement in a lunatic asylum, and subsequent adjudication of his lunacy, were not conclusive of the fact of his incapacity.

In Schmidt's Succession (1910) 125 La. 1065, 52 So. 160, it was held that proof of the interdiction of the testatrix and her commitment to an insane asylum some eighteen months after the making of the will, together with proof that within a period varying from five to ten months after the making of the will the testatrix had given signs of senile dementia, was insufficient to support an attack upon the validity of the will upon the ground of testamentary incapacity, where the proof failed to show that the testatrix was insane before or at the time of the execution of the will, and where there was nothing in the will itself sounding in folly.

It was held in Newton v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. (1879) 76 N. Y. 426, 32 Am. Rep. 335, where an action on a life insurance policy was defended on the ground that the insured falsely stated in his application that his father had not been afflicted with insanity, that the record of a probate court ordering the latter to be sent to a lunatic asylum, and the record of the asylum showing his admission thereto, were not conclusive evidence against the plaintiff of the insanity of the insured's father.

The order of commitment of a person to an insane asylum is not conclusive evidence against him, in an action for the malicious prosecution of him as an insane person. Kellogg v. Cochran (1890) 87 Cal. 192, 12 L.R.A. 104, 25 Pac. 677.

2. Inquisition of habitual drunkenness.

A prior adjudication of habitual drunkenness is conclusive evidence of the drunkard's incapacity to contract. Wadsworth v. Sharpsteen (1863) 8 N. Y. 388, 59 Am. Dec. 499; Imhoff v. Witmer (1856) 31 Pa. 243.

An adjudication of habitual drunkenness is not conclusive, but only prima facie, evidence of the subsequent incapacity of the drunkard to make a will. Lewis v. Jones (1860) 50 Barb. (N. Y.) 645; Leckey v. Cunningham (1867) 56 Pa. 370.

But in Re Patterson (1849) 4 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 34, it was held that an inquisition of habitual drunkenness was conclusive evidence of the invalidity of a subsequent will, made without permission of the court.

In Griswold v. Miller (1851) 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 520, setting aside a conveyance of realty taken by one with full knowledge that proceedings had been instituted against the grantor to have him declared an habitual drunkard, the court said that the rule seems to be well settled that, on a bill filed to set aside a conveyance on the ground of the lunacy of the party at the time he executed the conveyance, the finding of a jury on an inquisition which overreached that period is prima facie evidence of his incapacity, even as against a stranger to the proceedings who had no opportunity to contest the issues therein.

An adjudication of incompetency because of habitual drunkenness is only prima facie evidence of the drunkard's incapacity to make a settlement during the prior period covered by the finding of incapacity, and such presumption may be rebutted by the other party to the settlement, although he had notice of the inquisition at the time of the making of the settlement. In this case the court said that such adjudication would be conclusive evidence of incapacity in all the future after the finding thereof, until the restoration of the subject of it, by order of the court and a discharge of his committee. Klohs v. Klohs (1869) 61 Pa. 245.

In Miskey's Appeal (1888) 107 Pa. 611, a suit to set aside a deed of trust on the ground that the maker was incompetent because of habitual drunkenness, holding that an inquisition finding him competent was only prima facie evidence of his competency, the court stated that the rule making an inquisition of lunacy or habitual drunkenness only prima facie evidence of mental infirmity, during the period found, applied likewise where the finding was negative.

In Tozer v. Saturlee (1865) 3 Grant, Cas. (Pa.) 162, holding reversible error the rejection of evidence offered in support of declarations of an alleged habitual drunkard against one claiming under him, the court said: "An inquisition is only persuasive evidence of incompetency as to contracts made before the inquest, but during the time the incompetency is found to have existed . . . where it is suspended or abandoned in mid-course, as seems to have been the case here, it may be doubted whether any stronger presumption is furnished by an inquisition as to contracts made after it was found, than as to such as were made previously, but within the ascertained period of incompetency. If no stronger, then it is not conclusive, and may be rebutted by such evidence as was offered here."

3. Guardianship proceedings.

A decree of a court appointing a guardian for a lunatic is conclusive evidence of the ward's incapacity in relation to all subjects on which the guardian can act. Pavey v. Wintrode (1882) 87 Ind. 379; Leonard v. Leonard (1833) 14 Pick. (Mass.) 280; Rannella v. Gerner (1883) 80 Mo. 474; Payne v. Burdette (1900) 84 Mo. App. 332.

Where a finding that a person is insane is followed by the appointment of a guardian, the party becomes incapable of contracting, not merely from the state of his mind, but because the power of present control over his property is taken from him. Gibson v. Soper (1876) 6 Gray (Mass.) 279, 66 Am. Dec. 414.

So long as the guardianship continues, the decree of the court appointing the guardian may be regarded as conclusive on the question of the ward's sanity. Willwerth v. Leonard (1892) 156 Mass. 277, 31 N. E. 299.

But when the guardianship has terminated, and a controversy has arisen between third parties, one of whom claims under a contract made with the ward after the termination of the guardianship, the reason ceases for holding the decree conclusive. Ibid.

In Griswold v. Butler (1820) 3 Conn. 227, an adjudication of insanity and an appointment of a conservator were assumed, upon a question of adverse possession, to be conclusive evidence of the alleged lunatic's incapacity during the continuance of his guardianship.

In Musselman v. Cravens (1874) 47 Ind. 1, the court said: "An inquisition and appointment of a guardian is conclusive evidence that the ward is incapable of contracting, and is notice to all the world."

In Redden v. Baker (1882) 86 Ind. 191, it was held that the provisions of a statute providing for the appointment of a guardian for a person found by a jury to be of unsound mind, that such guardianship shall terminate with the restoration to reason or death of the ward, that whenever it is alleged that such person of unsound mind has become of sound mind again the facts may be tried and determined in the same manner as the allegation of the unsoundness of mind, and that every contract, sale, or conveyance of any person, while of unsound mind, shall be void,—must be construed to mean that the incapacity or disability, once found and adjudged, must continue in full force until the restoration of mind shall have been tried and determined in the manner provided in the act.

In Wait v. Maxwell (1827) 5 Pick. (Mass.) 217, 16 Am. Dec. 391, holding a decree of a probate court granting letters of guardianship of an incompetent inadmissible, because void, the court said in effect that, had the decree and letters been valid, they would have been conclusive evidence of her incapacity.

In Thorpe v. Hanscom (1896) 64 Minn. 201, 66 N. W. 1, sustaining the foreclosure of a mortgage, where the defense was that the mortgagor was insane and under guardianship at the time of its execution, but it appeared that, although long prior thereto he had been adjudged incompetent and placed under guardianship, he was doing business at the time of the execution of the mortgage, and the control of the guardian over him had practically terminated, and he made no claim that the transaction in question was an improvident or an unfair one for him, but planted himself upon the technical proposition that the action of the probate court in placing his person and estate under guardianship was conclusive evidence of his mental incompetency to act for himself, and that, until the guardian was formally discharged and his estate restored to him by the judgment of the probate court, his contracts were under all circumstances absolutely void, the court said: "The deed of an insane person not under guardianship is not void, but only voidable, but while he is under actual and subsisting guardianship he is conclusively presumed incompetent to make a valid contract concerning his property, though in fact he is sane at the time of making the same. This rule is based upon convenience and necessity, for the protection of the guardian, and to enable him properly to discharge his duties as such. Without this rule it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the guardian to execute his trust, for in every action concerning the property of the ward he might be obliged to go before the jury upon the question of the ward's sanity, and one jury might find one way and another the other way. Leonard v. Leonard (1833) 14 Pick. (Mass.) 280; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 371. Now, when the reason for the rule does not exist, the rule does not apply. Hence, if there is in fact no actual and subsisting guardianship, but the same has been practically abandoned, and the person who had been under guardianship, after such abandonment, makes a deed at a time when he is in fact of sound mind, and the contract is fair, the deed will be enforced, though the guardian has not been discharged by any judicial action. Elston v. Jasper (1876) 45 Tex. 409."

In Elston v. Jasper (Tex.) supra, a suit to enforce specific performance of a title bond, the court, in passing upon, for the purpose of a new trial, the effect of the appointment of a guardian for the maker of the bond as an incompetent, said that an insane person, while actually under legal and subsisting guardianship, and in support of the guardian's authority, was conclusively presumed incompetent to contract, and that his deed as against his guardian was absolutely void, but the court held that this presumption could be overcome by proof of the lunatic's subsequent restoration to sanity and the termination of the guardianship, either by a judicial determination, or, as in this case, by the practical termination of the guardianship.

In Jordan v. Dickson (1888) 19 Ohio L. J. 64, the appointment of a guardian for a person as an imbecile was held to be conclusive evidence of his incapacity to ratify transfers by him of his property, but the court said that, where the capacity of the ward to make a will, to marry, or to commit a crime was in question, the guardianship was, at the most, only prima facie evidence of incapacity.

In Messenger v. Bliss (1880) 35 Ohio St. 587, it was held that an alleged imbecile could, in an action by him to enjoin his guardian from interfering with the control and management of his property, rebut the presumption of imbecility arising from the appointment of a guardian, because such appointment was made under a statutory provision expressly declaring that the appointment by the probate court of a guardian for an imbecile should be regarded only as prima facie evidence of imbecility. This statutory provision was repealed before the determination of the preceding case.

An order declaring a person to be a lunatic and appointing a guardian for him is not conclusive upon third persons not parties to it, who may accordingly be permitted to show that, while the letters of guardianship remained unrevoked, the lunatic was capable of contracting. Field v. Lucas (1857) 21 Ga. 447, 68 Am. Dec. 465.

The appointment of a guardian for one as an insane person, under a statute providing that the term "insane person" shall include a distracted person, is not conclusive evidence of the ward's subsequent incapacity to enter into a contract of hiring, but it may be shown that the ward had recovered at the time of the taking of such contract. Blaisdell v. Holmes (1875) 48 Vt. 492.

The appointment of a guardian is not conclusive, but only prima facie evidence of want of testamentary capacity. Harrison v. Bishop (1891) 131 Ind. 161, 31 Am. St. Rep. 422, 30 N. E. 1069; Re Fenton (1896) 97 Iowa, 192, 66 N. W. 99; Re Chandler (1906) 102 Me. 72, 66 Atl. 215; Stone v. Damon (1815) 12 Mass. 487; Breed v. Pratt (1836) 18 Pick. (Mass.) 115; Crowninshield v. Crowninshield (1854) 2 Gray (Mass.) 524; Collins v. Long

The presumption of unsoundness of mind arising from the appointment of a guardian may be overcome by evidence showing testamentary capacity. Linkmeyer v. Brandt (1898) 107 Iowa, 750, 77 N. W. 493.

In Re Pendleton (1889) 1 Connoly, 480, 5 N. Y. Supp. 849, holding a will valid, though made at a time when the testatrix was under the control of a committee in lunacy, the court said: "Were it not for the appointment of a committee in lunacy, there could have been very little ground for the claim that she was not competent to make a testamentary disposition of her estate. The force of such adjudication cannot be considered strong when we bear in mind that, ordinarily, the main object in appointing a committee is to deprive the party of managing his own estate, because he is incompetent to have the care of it, and would be likely to squander it."

In Hamilton v. Hamilton (R. I.) supra, it was held that a person under guardianship 'as non compos mentis' was prima facie incapable of making a will, even pending an appeal from the decree appointing the guardian.

It was held in Williams v. Robinson (1867) 39 Vt. 267, that the appointment of a guardian is not conclusive of the incompetency of the ward to make a will, where it does not appear but that the guardianship may have been imposed on the sole ground of weakness of capacity, and not for insanity, but the court intimated that it would hold the same even if the guardianship was imposed for insanity.

And in Jenckes v. Probate Ct. (1852) 2 R. I. 255, under an act providing that lunatics, and persons who, for want of discretion in managing their estates, may become charges upon the county, may be placed under guardianship, and that all conveyances made by any person under guardianship shall be void, it was held that the issuing of letters of guardianship for one as wanting discretion in the management of her estate did not avoid a will subsequently made by her, upon the ground that a will was not a conveyance within the meaning of the act.

An adjudication that a person is mentally incapable of taking care of himself or his property, under a statute providing for the appointment of a guardian of such person, is not prima facie evidence of the ward's incapacity subsequently to make a will. Re Cowdry (1905) 77 Vt. 359, 60 Atl. 141, 3 Ann. Cas. 70.

In Boston Safe Deposit & T. Co. v. Bacon (1918) 229 Mass. 585, 118 N. E. 906, an appeal from the probate of the will of an alleged lunatic, holding inadmissible a decree of a probate court appointing a guardian for an uncle of the testatrix as an insane person, the court said that such a decree unreversed was prima facie evidence of the actual insanity of the person thereby placed under guardianship, and established a status of that individual which was notice of the incapacity of the ward to all the world.

The appointment of a guardian ad litem for a party to an action, on the ground of insanity, is prima facie evidence of the fact in any subsequent stage of the case. Little v. Little (1859) 13 Gray (Mass.) 264.

An appointment of a guardian for one as an insane person is but prima facie evidence of actual insanity, in a subsequent suit for divorce. Garnett v. Garnett (1874) 114 Mass. 379, 19 Am. Rep. 369.

The finding upon inquisition that one is an idiot and incompetent to manage his own affairs, and the appointment of a committee for him, are not conclusive that he is not a competent witness at a time several years later, but he may be permitted to testify if, upon questioning, he appears to be competent to do so. Barker v. Washburn (1911) 200 N. Y. 280, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 159, 140 Am. St. Rep. 640, 93 N. E. 958.

A judgment in proceedings for the appointment of a guardian of an incompetent person is not conclusive of his incompetency at a prior time. McAllister v. Rowland (1913) 124 Minn.

In Ames's Will (1902) 40 Or. 495, 67 Pac. 737, it was held that the appointment of a guardian for a person as an incompetent on the same day, but after the execution of a will by him, was presumptive, but not conclusive, evidence of his testamentary incapacity, and that such presumption could be overcome by evidence proving that he was at the time he executed the will, in fact, of sound and disposing mind and memory.

It was held in Spiers v. Hendershott (1909) 142 Iowa, 446, 120 N. W. 1058, and in Re Clogston (1919) — Vt. —, 106 Atl. 594, that the subsequent appointment of a guardian created no presumption of mental incapacity on the part of a testatrix.

An adjudication that the grantor was of unsound mind at the time of the execution of a deed is not conclusive as against the grantee because he was the petitioner in the lunacy proceedings, but he may show that the grantor at the time of the conveyance was of sound mind. Hughes v. Jones (1889) 116 N. Y. 67, 5 L.R.A. 632, 15 Am. St. Rep. 386, 22 N. E. 446.

An inquisition finding one to have been a lunatic at the time of the destruction by him, with the assent of his wife, of an inadequate marriage settlement, is only prima facie, and not conclusive, evidence of his incapacity at that time, even as against his wife, the petitioner in the lunacy proceedings, and she may show that he had a lucid interval at the time of the destruction of such settlement. Re Gangwere (1850) 14 Pa. 417, 53 Am. Dec. 554.

An inquisition finding prior lunacy with lucid intervals is prima facie evidence only of the lunatic's incapacity to make a will during such prior period, as against even the executor named in the will, who was the petitioner in the lunacy proceedings and was subsequently appointed the committee of the lunatic, and he may show that the will was executed by the lunatic during a lucid interval. Titlow v. Titlow (1867) 54 Pa. 216, 93 Am. Dec. 691.

In Mulholland's Estate (1907) 217 Pa. 65, 66 Atl. 150, the court said, in relation to the force of an adjudication of weakmindedness, that apart from the fact that such weakmindedness as might lead to improvidence in the care of property was not necessarily inconsistent with testamentary capacity, the adjudication was entitled to very little weight in view of the fact that it was procured at the sole instance of the contestant of the will, who was the sole beneficiary in a prior will which was concealed from the court by such contestant.

f. As against persons not parties or privies to, or without notice of, lunacy proceedings.

The question of notice of the lunacy proceedings to those against whom the adjudication of insanity is received in evidence does not enter into the decision of most of the cases upon the weight of the adjudication, but want of notice is made a point in a few of the cases.

An adjudication of insanity is not conclusive, but only presumptive evidence, as against persons not parties or privies to the lunacy proceedings. Blandy v. Blandy (1902) 20 App. D. C. 535; Field v. Lucas (1857) 21 Ga. 447, 68 Am. Dec. 465; HOLLIDAY v. SHEPHERD (reported herewith) ante, 558; Armstrong v. Short (1820) 8 N. C. (1 Hawks) 11; Rippy v. Gant (1847) 39 N. C. (4 Ired. Eq.) 443; Cathcart v. Matthews (1916) 105 S. C. 329, 89 S. E. 1021.

An inquisition of lunacy is not, as against the mortgagee who was not a party to the inquisition, conclusive as to the incapacity of the lunatic to execute a mortgage during the period in which he has, by the inquisition, been found to have been of unsound mind, but the mortgagee may introduce proof that the alleged lunatic was of sound mind at the time of the execution of the mortgage. Den ex dem. Aber v. Clark (1828) 10 N. J. L. 217, 18 Am. Dec. 417.

cery, are purely ex parte, and are conclusive only upon parties or privies, but as against strangers, where the inquiry is with regard to prior acts, a finding is prima facie only. Drap-er's Estate (1890) 26 W. N. C. (Pa.) 218.

In Sprinkle v. Wellborn (1905) 140 N. C. 163, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 174, 111 Am. St. Rep. 827, 52 S. E. 666, the court, in relation to the records of an ex parte inquisition of lunacy made after the date of the execution of the deed in question, said: "If made before that time, they might have been competent, but not conclusive, as to the insanity of Nancy Sprinkle. The presumption arising from them in such a case could be rebutted, and the very truth be made to appear, that is, that while they showed insanity, it did not in fact exist at the time the deed was executed. This is at least true as to all persons not parties or privies to the inquisition, as, for example, a grantee of the lunatic, who, being a stranger to the inquisition, could not traverse it, which was formerly done by scire facias."

In Hall v. Warren (1804) 9 Ves. Jr. 605, 32 Eng. Reprint, 738, directing an issue whether the defendant was a lunatic at the execution of a contract overreached by a commission of lunacy, upon a bill for specific performance, the court said: "The principal objection to the performance is, that the defendant was not competent, having been insane at the time the contract bears date. That is matter of fact. In support of that fact alleged, the inquisition is produced by which the defendant is found a lunatic from a period long antecedent, but with lucid intervals. That inquisition, having been taken in the absence of the plaintiff, is not conclusive upon him, but it is evidence prima facie of the lunacy. It is, however, competent to third parties to dispute the fact and to maintain that, notwithstanding the inquisition, the object of it was of sound mind at any period of the time which it covers."

But in New York the question of notice of the lunacy proceedings to the party against whom the adjudication is received in evidence is immaterial upon the weight of the adjudication which is notice to all the world. Banker v. Banker (1875) 63 N. Y. 409; Hughes v. Jones (1889) 116 N. Y. 67, 5 L.R.A. 632, 22 N. E. 446; Fitzhugh v. Wilcox (1851) 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 235; Griswold v. Miller (1851) 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 520; Hoyt v. Adeo (1870) 3 Lans. (N. Y.) 178.

It was held, however, in Hirsch v. Trainer (1877) 3 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 274, that a subsequent adjudication of the insanity of the mortgagor was not conclusive, but only presumptive evidence, as against the assignee of the mortgage who was not a party to the lunacy proceedings.

In Musselman v. Cravens (1874) 47 Ind. 1, the court stated that an inquisition and appointment of a guardian were conclusive evidence that the ward was incapable of contracting, and were notice to all the world.

And the court said, in Boston Safe Deposit & T. Co. v. Bacon (1918) 229 Mass. 585, 118 N. E. 906, that a decree of a probate court appointing a guardian for one as an insane person was prima facie evidence of the actual insanity of the person thereby placed under guardianship, and established a status of that individual which was notice of the incapacity of the ward to all the world.

g. Incapacity to contract.

The cases under this subdivision are simply given as illustrations of the probative force of an adjudication of insanity as applied to different kinds of contracts, and for the rule in the different jurisdictions, as to incapacity to contract, see supra, II. a.

1. Conveyances.

Capacity to dispose of property and to execute proper conveyances therefor is not necessarily disproved by the prior determination of the probate court that a person is, by reason of mental infirmity, incompetent to have the charge and management of his estate. Chase v. Spencer (1907) 150 Mich. 99, 113 N. W. 578.

An adjudication of insanity is not conclusive, but is prima facie determinative, of subsequent incapacity to execute deeds. Barkheimer v. Lockhart (1919) — Ark. —, 213 S. W. 381.

A subsequent inquisition of lunacy is not conclusive, but only presumptive evidence of the lunatic's incapacity to execute a deed. Hunt v. Hunt (1860) 13 N. J. Eq. 161; Van Deusen v. Sweet (1873) 51 N. Y. 378; Hughes v. Jones (1889) 116 N. Y. 67, 5 L.R.A. 632, 15 Am. St. Rep. 386, 22 N. E. 446; Rogers v. Walker (1847) 6 Pa. 371, 47 Am. Dec. 470; Hutchinson v. Sandt (1833) 4 Rawle (Pa.) 234, 26 Am. Dec. 127; Frank v. Mainwaring (1839) 2 Beav. 116, 48 Eng. Reprint, 1123.

In Mott v. Mott (1891) 49 N. J. Eq. 192, 22 Atl. 997, it was held that an inquisition finding the grantor to have been of unsound mind, with lucid moments, from a time anterior to the conveyance attacked, simply made a prima facie case, and was not conclusive against the grantee even as to the point of time when it was taken.

It was held in Wathens v. Skaggs (1914) 161 Ky. 600, 171 S. W. 193, that an adjudication of incompetency, made a few days after the execution of a deed by the incompetent, did not relieve the plaintiff, in an action to cancel the deed, of the burden of establishing the grantor's incapacity at the date of the deed.

But in Schindler v. Parzoo (1908) 52 Or. 452, 97 Pac. 755, an action to avoid a deed on the ground of the grantor's mental incapacity where it appeared that the deed in question was executed when the grantor was confined to her bed suffering from a dangerous illness, that the subject-matter of the conveyance was her home and practically all of her worldly possessions, that the adjudication of her incompetency took place ten days after the execution of the deed and when she had so far recovered from her illness as to be around, and was in about the same condition of health that she had enjoyed for more than one year prior thereto, and that she was about seventy years of age, and there was abundant evidence that for some time prior to the execution of the deed she had been suffering mental and physical decline, it was held that an admission in the answer to the adjudication that the grantor was an incompetent person shifted the burden upon the grantee to show the grantor's competency at the execution of the deed.

An adjudication of lunacy is only prima facie evidence of the lunatic's incapacity to execute a deed pending an appeal, as against the grantee, in an action for the recovery of the land. Grimes v. Shaw (1893) 2 Tex. Civ. App. 20, 21 S. W. 718.

An inquisition of lunacy is not conclusive evidence of the lunacy against persons claiming title under the alleged lunatic. Yauger v. Skinner (1862) 14 N. J. Eq. 389.

It was held in Cathcart v. Matthews (1916) 105 S. C. 329, 89 S. E. 1021, that a subsequent adjudication of insanity was not conclusive evidence of the lunatic's incapacity to direct a conveyance of his land by his trustee.

In a note to Frank v. Frank (1840) 2 Moody & R. (Eng.) 314, the direction by the master of the rolls of an issue to ascertain whether the defendant was of sound mind at the time of the execution of the deed in question, it is stated that it had been shown in the proceedings in chancery, from which the issue had been directed, that the defendant had been adjudged to have been a lunatic from a time prior to the execution of the deed, and the master of the rolls, when the issue was directed, expressed his opinion that the inquisition raised a presumption against the sanity of the grantor at the time of the execution of the deed. It is further stated that there appears to be no doubt that the effect of an inquisition on a writ de lunatico inquirendo, when received in evidence on a trial between third parties touching the sanity of the supposed lunatic, is to raise a presumption that the party was a lunatic at the time stated by the inquisition, and that he continued to be a lunatic afterwards, but that the presumption of insanity, from the fact of the inquisition having found a party to be in that state, is, as stated by the master of the rolls in the principal case, a very slight presumption, though sufficient to shift the burden of proof to those who dispute the insanity.

Commitment to an insane asylum is not conclusive evidence of prior incapacity to execute a deed. Avery v. Avery (1919) — Cal. App. —, 183 Pac. 453.

The deed of an insane person, after being placed under guardianship, is absolutely void, and guardianship is conclusive respecting the disability of the ward. Rannells v. Gerner (1883) 80 Mo. 474.

The appointment of a guardian for one as an imbecile is conclusive evidence of his incapacity to ratify transfers by him of his property. Jordan v. Dickson (1888) 19 Ohio L. J. 64.

And in Wait v. Maxwell (1827) 22 Mass. 217, 16 Am. Dec. 391, holding a decree granting letters of guardianship of an incompetent inadmissible, because void, the court stated in effect that had the decree been valid it would have been conclusive evidence of the incompetent's incapacity to subsequently execute a deed.

In Fitzhugh v. Wilcox (1851) 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 235, a contract for the sale of realty by a person who had been found to be a lunatic was held void.

An adjudication that a person is a person of unsound mind is prima facie evidence of his subsequent incapacity to execute a trust deed. Miller v. Rutledge (1887) 82 Va. 863, 1 S. E. 202.

An inquisition of lunacy is only presumptive evidence of the incapacity of the lunatic to execute a mortgage during the previous time referred to in the finding. Hardy v. Berger (1902) 76 App. Div. 393, 78 N. Y. Supp. 709; Hirsch v. Trainer (1877) 3 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 274.

An inquisition has no force as evidence of the lunatic's incapacity at the time of his execution of a prior mortgage, as against one who has paid, in good faith, such mortgage, after his purchase of the mortgaged property from the lunatic's committee under a void deed, and who is entitled to be reimbursed for such payment. Reals v. Weston (1899) 28 Misc. 67, 59 N. Y. Supp. 807.

An inquisition, after a bill to foreclose, finding the mortgagor to have been a lunatic from a time prior to the execution of the mortgage, casts the burden on the mortgagee of proving the mortgagor's sanity. Snook v. Watts (1848) 11 Beav. 105, 50 Eng. Reprint, 757.

In Thorpe v. Hanscom (1896) 64 Minn. 201, 66 N. W. 1, holding valid a mortgage made by one under guardianship, because executed after the practical abandonment of the guardianship and when the mortgagor was in fact of sound mind, the court said: "The deed of an insane person not under guardianship is not void, but only voidable, but while he is under actual and subsisting guardianship he is conclusively presumed incompetent to make a valid contract concerning his property, though in fact he is sane at the time of making the same."

An adjudication of lunacy creates no presumption of incapacity to execute an assignment of a mortgage in the period overreached by the finding. Schanck v. Hooper (1916) 160 N. Y. Supp. 627.

In Hill v. Day (1881) 34 N. J. Eq. 150, a suit to set aside an assignment of a mortgage on the ground of the assignor's mental incapacity, it was held that an inquisition finding the assignor to have been of unsound mind antedating the assignment, but with lucid intervals, simply made a prima facie case, and that as to the assignee it was not conclusive even as to the point of time when taken, and that much less could it have that effect against him for the retrospective period of two years.

An inquisition is prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence of the incapacity of the lunatic to execute a lease within the period overreached by the finding of lunacy. Hassard v. Smith (1872) Ir. Rep. 6 Eq. 429.

In Dane v. Kirkwall (1838) 8 Car. & P. (Eng.) 679, an action for use and occupation, it was held that an inquisition of lunacy finding the alleged lunatic to have been so prior to the making of the lease in question was prima facie evidence of the lessee's incapacity.

In Sbarbero v. Miller (1907) 72 N. J. Eq. 248, 65 Atl. 472, affirmed without opinion in (1908) 74 N. J. Eq. 453, 77 Atl. 1088, an action to set aside an assignment of a lease because of the mental incapacity of the assignor, it was held that the finding of a commission in lunacy less than three months after the execution of the assignment was only prima facie evidence of his incapacity. The court in this case said: "I will not further discuss the weight of this finding because, while in a doubtful case I should give great weight to the determination of commissioners and a jury, I do not see that it is entitled to any more than prima facie effect in the face of a fully tried issue in this court. Particularly would I be inclined to treat it in the way indicated when, as in this case, the alleged lunatic was not served with notice of the commission, and was not present, and was not seen or examined by the commissioners or the jury."

In a suit for the reconveyance of personal property upon the ground of the vendor's mental incapacity, a subsequent inquisition is only prima facie proof of his incapacity. Rippy v. Gant (1847) 39 N. C. (4 Ired. Eq.) 443.

2. Bills and notes.

An adjudication of lunacy is conclusive as to the lunatic's incapacity to subsequently execute a promissory note, and such presumption, in the absence of a decree of restoration, cannot be overcome by proof that he has meanwhile become capable of managing his own affairs. Kiehne v. Wessell (1893) 53 Mo. App. 667.

An inquisition is conclusive evidence of the incapacity of one found to be an habitual drunkard to waive protest of a bill of exchange indorsed by him as against a bona fide holder of the bill without notice of the inquisition. Wadsworth v. Sharpsteen (1853) 8 N. Y. 388, 59 Am. Dec. 499.

It was held in Stitzel v. Farley (1909) 148 Ill. 635, that the burden was upon the holder, in an action on a note, to establish the maker's sanity at the time of its execution, where it appeared that the maker had been adjudged insane before the execution of the note, although he had been released from the insane asylum, and was without a conservator when he made the note.

An inquisition of lunacy is not conclusive, but is prima facie, evidence of the incompetency of the lunatic to make a promissory note during the retrospective period covered by the finding. Hicks v. Marshall (1876) 8 Hun (N. Y.) 327; Richie v. Shepard (1913) 153 App. Div. 192, 143 N. Y. Supp. 19; Willis v. Willis (1849) 12 Pa. 159; Noel v. Karper (1866) 53 Pa. 97; Lancaster County Nat. Bank v. Moore (1875) 78 Pa. 407, 21 Am. Rep. 24; Hottle v. Weaver (1903) 206 Pa. 87, 55 Atl. 838; Knox v. Knox (1888) 80 S. C. 377, 9 S. E. 353.

3. Marriage contracts.

An adjudication of lunacy is conclusive evidence of the lunatic's incapacity to subsequently make a promise of marriage. O'Reilly v. Sweeney (1907) 54 Misc. 408, 105 N. Y. Supp. 1033.

An inquisition of lunacy is only prima facie evidence of the subsequent incapacity of the lunatic to contract a marriage, and may be rebutted by the other party to the marriage. Johnson v. Kincade (1843) 37 N. C. (2 Ired. Eq.) 470; Goodheart v. Ransley (1892) 11 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 655.

The judgment of a probate court in adjudging a person insane and appointing a guardian is not conclusive of such person's incapacity to contract a valid marriage. Payne v. Burdette (1900) 84 Mo. App. 332.

In Castor v. Davis (1889) 120 Ind. 231, 22 N. E. 110, it is held that the presumption in favor of the legality of a marriage will prevail over the presumption that one who has been adjudged insane continues insane until duly adjudged sane.

An inquisition of lunacy is only presumptive evidence of the incapacity of the lunatic to contract a marriage solemnized within a period retrospectively included in the finding of insanity, and the fact that the other party to the marriage, the defendant in an action to annul it, had notice of the commencement of the lunacy proceedings before the marriage, does not affect the question. Banker v. Banker (1875) 63 N. Y. 409.

In Portsmouth v. Portsmouth (1828) 1 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 355, 162 Eng. Reprint, 611, an action to annul a marriage solemnized within the retrospective period of the finding of an inquisition of lunacy, the court said that the finding was no more than a circumstance, and a part of the evidence in support of unsoundness of mind at the time of the marriage.

An inquisition finding one to have been a lunatic at the time of the destruction by him of a marriage settlement is only prima facie, and not conclusive, evidence of his incapacity at that time. Re Gangwere (1850) 14 Pa. 417, 53 Am. Dec. 554.

An inquisition of habitual drunkenness is conclusive evidence of the subsequent incapacity of the drunkard to make a bond in the nature of an antenuptial settlement. Imhoff v. Witmer (1858) 31 Pa. 248.

4. Miscellaneous.

In an action of debt on a bond executed by one who had been adjudged a lunatic, the inquisition is only presumptive evidence of his incapacity, and may be rebutted by proof. Armstrong v. Short (1820) 8 N. C. (1 Hawks) 11.

And a subsequent inquisition is not conclusive, in such an action, as to the obligor's incapacity. Hart v. Deamer (1831) 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 497.

In an action of debt on a bond executed by one subsequently found to be insane, without lucid intervals, from a time antedating its execution, the inquisition is not conclusive evidence of his incapacity, and its weight is to be determined by the jury, after comparing it with the other facts of the case. Faulder v. Silk (1811) 3 Campb. (Eng.) 126, 13 Revised Rep. 771.

As to the execution of a judgment bond by a lunatic before the issuing of a commission, and which is overreached by the retrospective finding of the jury, the inquisition is only presumptive, but not conclusive, evidence of incapacity. L'Amoureux v. Crosby (1831) 2 Paige (N. Y.) 422, 22 Am. Dec. 655.

A finding of lunacy at an inquest is prima facie evidence of incapacity to confess judgment, where the judgment was confessed prior to the holding of the inquest (as digested in the Century Digest). Koons v. Benscoter (1873) 2 Kulp (Pa.) 451.

In Parker v. Davis (1862) 53 N. C. (8 Jones, L.) 460, an action to recover the price of goods sold and delivered to a lunatic, it was held that the inquisition of lunacy was not conclusive evidence of his insanity.

And in a similar action it was held that an adjudication of insanity, made subsequently to the execution of the contract of sale, did not establish insanity at the time of the making of the contract. Shores-Mueller Co. v. Palmer (1919) — Ark. —, 216 S. W. 295.

It was held in Thomasson v. Kercheval (1849) 10 Humph. (Tenn.) 322, an action on the case to recover moneys expended for the benefit of the defendant's intestate, in pursuance of a contract made with her, through her agent, that an adjudication of the insanity of the intestate was prima facie evidence of her incapacity to make the contract.

The presumption of insanity during the life of the inquisition is conclusive, and the actual sanity of the adjudged incompetent cannot be shown by the defendant, in an action by the incompetent's committee, in support of the defendant's settlement with the lunatic pending the action. Wallace v. Frey (1899) 27 Misc. 29, 56 N. Y. Supp. 1051.

An inquisition, so far as a finding of prior insanity is concerned, has no force as evidence of the incapacity of the lunatic to previously change the beneficiary in his benefit certificate, but it is conclusive evidence of his incapacity to subsequently change the beneficiary, except where no committee for the lunatic has qualified or acted, and the subsequently designated beneficiary may show his restoration to reason at the time of the subsequent designation of a new beneficiary. Southern Tier Masonic Relief Asso. v. Laudenschach (1889) 5 N. Y. Supp. 901.

h. Testamentary incapacity.

An adjudication of insanity is not conclusive, but only presumptive, evidence of testamentary incapacity, whether made before or after the execution of the will.

In Wadsworth v. Sharpsteen (1853) 8 N. Y. 388, 59 Am. Dec. 499, the court said: "It has been adjudged, however, that the inquisition is not conclusive evidence of the lunatic's incapacity to make a will. This is an exception to the general rule, and the reason given for it in the case of Leonard v. Leon- ard (1832) 14 Pick. (Mass.) 284, is that this is an act which the guardian cannot do for him. And, in another case, that the making of a will is an act manifestly distinguishable from contracts and other acts done inter vivos, and involves no conflict of authority with the guardian, because the will cannot operate to any purpose till the death of the testator, and by that same event the authority of the guardian is determined. Breed v. Pratt (1836) 18 Pick. (Mass.) 116. To these may be added, as especially applicable to the case of an habitual drunkard, that the chief object of the proceeding by inquisition is the preservation of his property during his lifetime for the benefit of himself and his family, and that the motives which might induce him to make an improper disposition of it during his lifetime do not exist in relation to a disposition to take effect after his death."

Under a statute providing that, after his incapacity has been judicially determined, a person of unsound mind can make no conveyance or other contract, nor delegate any power, nor waive any right, until his restoration to capacity is judicially determined, but if actually restored to capacity he may make a will, though his restoration is not thus determined, an adjudication of incompetency is, as to lack of testamentary capacity, prima facie evidence only. Re Johnson (1881) 57 Cal. 529.

A finding upon an inquest of lunacy that the subject thereof is a distracted or feeble-minded person, and by reason of this condition incapable of managing and caring for his estate, is not sufficient to establish want of testamentary capacity. Re Weedman (1912) 254 Ill. 504, 98 N. E. 956.

It was held in Schmidt's Succession (1910) 125 La. 1065, 52 So. 160, that the interdiction of a testatrix and her commitment to an insane asylum about a year and a half after the making of her will, and the fact that she had given signs of senile dementia within a period varying from five to ten months after the making of the will, were insufficient to support an attack upon the validity of the will, where the evidence failed to show that she was insane before or at the time of the making of the will, and there was nothing unreasonable therein.

A finding by the probate court that a person is insane and incompetent to manage his property, although made a little later in the day on which his will was executed, is not conclusive of his want of testamentary capacity. Rice v. Rice (1884) 53 Mich. 432, 19 N. W. 132; Rice v. Rice (1883) 50 Mich. 448, 15 N. W. 545.

In Whitenack v. Stryker (1838) 2 N. J. Eq. 8, admitting two codicils to probate, where two inquisitions were admitted in evidence, one, dated between the dates of the codicils, finding the testator to be of unsound mind, but enjoying lucid intervals, and the other dated after the second codicil and finding the testator to be of unsound mind and mentally incapable of managing his affairs, it was held that these inquisitions were not conclusive as to the testator's capacity, but were only entitled to the respect which was due to the opinions expressed in their verdict of the jurors on the inquisitions.

In Brady v. McBride (1885) 39 N. J. Eq. 495, it was held that an inquisition, dated nearly three years after the will admitted to probate was made, finding that the lunacy had existed for three years, was not conclusive, but that any presumption which it raised was rebutted by the testimony of witnesses that the testatrix had testamentary capacity at the time of the making of the will.

A finding of insanity, confirmed after the execution of a will by the incompetent, is presumptive evidence of his testamentary incapacity and, unless overcome by satisfactory evidence, requires a denial of probate. Re Widmayer (1902) 74 App. Div. 336, 77 N. Y. Supp. 663.

In Russell v. Lefrancois (1883) 8 Can. S. C. 335, an action by the executor of the will of an alleged lunatic to compel the latter's curator to turn over the deceased's property to him as executor, the adjudication of the testator's insanity made about five weeks after the execution of the will, being in evidence, was apparently given very slight weight in determining the incapacity of the testator.

In Rodd v. Lewis (1755) 2 Lee, Eccl. Rep. 176, 161 Eng. Reprint, 304, an inquisition finding insanity from a period prior to the execution of a will was held not strong enough to set aside the positive evidence of sanity of the testator at the time of making the will.

A decree of guardianship is not conclusive, but merely prima facie, evidence of testamentary incapacity. Harrison v. Bishop (1891) 131 Ind. 161, 31 Am. St. Rep. 422, 30 N. E. 1069; Re Fenton (1896) 97 Iowa, 192, 66 N. W. 99; Linkmeyer v. Brandt (1898) 107 Iowa, 750, 77 N. W. 493; Re Chandler (1906) 102 Me. 72, 66 Atl. 215; Stone v. Damon (1815) 12 Mass. 488; Breed v. Pratt (1836) 18 Pick. (Mass.) 115; Crowninshield v. Crowninshield (1854) 2 Gray (Mass.) 524; Boston Safe Deposit & T. Co. v. Bacon (1918) 229 Mass. 585, 118 N. E. 906; Collins v. Long (1920) — Or. —, 186 Pac. 1038; Hamilton v. Hamilton (1873) 10 R. I. 538.

The court held in Hamilton v. Hamilton (R. I.) supra, that it made no difference that the will was executed pending an appeal which affirmed the decree establishing the guardianship.

In Williams v. Robinson (1867) 39 Vt. 267, holding that the appointment of a guardian is not conclusive evidence of testamentary incapacity, where it does not appear but that the guardianship may have been imposed on the sole ground of weakness of mind, and not for insanity, the court intimated that it would hold the same even if the guardianship was imposed for insanity.

Letters of guardianship issued upon the ground that the ward wanted discretion in the management of her estate, under an act providing that idiots, lunatics, or persons non compos mentis, and persons who for want of discretion in managing their estates would be likely to bring themselves and family to want and thereby render themselves chargeable upon the county, may be placed under guardianship, do not avoid a will subsequently made by the ward, under another section of the same act declaring that all contracts, bargains, and conveyances made by any person under guardianship shall be utterly void, since a will is not a conveyance within the meaning of such section. The court further held that such letters did not have any effect because of the invalidity of the order of the probate court, but, in this connection, said that if a proper case had been stated and a valid order made, they did not think it should have any effect on the present case, because such a want of discretion did not imply that the party was not of a sane mind, but that if the appointment had been made because of idiocy, lunacy, or because the person was non compos mentis, the case would have been different. Jenckes v. Probate Ct. (1852) 2 R. I. 255.

In Breed v. Pratt (1836) 18 Pick. (Mass.) 115, it was said with reference to the making of a will by a person under guardianship: "It is an act manifestly distinguishable from contracts and other acts to be done inter vivos, and involves no conflict of authority with the guardian in this respect, because the will cannot operate to any purpose until the death of the testator, and by that same event the authority of the guardian is determined."

It was held in Re Cowdry (1905) 77 Vt. 359, 60 Atl. 141, 3 Ann. Cas. 70, that the appointment of a guardian for one, under a statute providing for the appointment of guardians for persons mentally incapable of taking care of themselves or their property, was not even prima facie evidence of testamentary incapacity.

The court said, in Re Pendleton (1889) 1 Connolly, 480, 5 N. Y. Supp. 849, in upholding a will made by one under the control of a committee in lunacy: "Were it not for the appointment of the committee in lunacy, there could have been very little ground for the claim that she [testatrix] was not competent to make a testamentary disposition of her estate. The force of such adjudication cannot be considered strong when we bear in mind that, ordinarily, the main object in appointing a committee is to deprive the party of managing his own estate, because he is incompetent to have the care of it, and would be likely to squander it."

The subsequent appointment of a guardian creates no presumption of mental incapacity on the part of a testatrix at the time of the making of the will. Spiers v. Hendershott (1909) 142 Iowa, 446, 120 N. W. 1058; Re Clogston (1919) — Vt. —, 106 Atl. 594.

But it was held in Ames's Will (1902) 40 Or. 495, 67 Pac. 737, that the appointment of a guardian on the same day, but after the execution of a will by the ward, was presumptive, but not conclusive, evidence of his testamentary incapacity.

An inquisition of habitual drunkenness is only prima facie evidence of subsequent testamentary incapacity. Lewis v. Jones (1868) 50 Barb. (N. Y.) 645; Leckey v. Cunningham (1867) 56 Pa. 370.

But it was held in Re Patterson (1849) 4 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 34, that such an inquisition was conclusive evidence of the incapacity of the drunkard to make a valid will without permission of the court. The court said that the existence of the commission presented a technical objection which it was necessary to remove, and affirmed an order denying a motion to set aside an ex parte order, made at chambers, suspending the inquisition so far as to permit the drunkard to make a will.

1. Criminal irresponsibility.

An adjudication of insanity is only prima facie and not conclusive evidence, on a prosecution for murder, of the mental condition of the accused at the time of the commission of the crime within the period overreached by the finding of insanity. Witty v. State (1913) 69 Tex. Crim. Rep. 125, 153 S. W. 1146.

It was held in Hempton v. State (1901) 111 Wis. 127, 86 N. W. 596, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 657, on a prosecution for homicide, that a prior adjudication of insanity and commitment to an insane asylum were not conclusive in favor of the accused, except that he was insane when it was made.

The weight of a record of a probate court showing commitment to an insane asylum is, in a criminal prosecution, for the jury. McCully v. State (1920) — Ark. —, 217 S. W. 453.

In Wheeler v. State (1878) 34 Ohio St. 394, 32 Am. Rep. 372, where a record of a probate court of an adjudication of lunacy and of confinement in an asylum was admitted on a subsequent prosecution of the lunatic for burglary and larceny, the court said: "Ordinarily, such inquisitions are not conclusive, but only prima facie evidence of incapacity, as will be seen from the authorities cited; but, on a question like that in issue here, it is manifest they cannot be regarded as even prima facie evidence. A person who is a fit subject for confinement in an insane asylum does not necessarily have immunity from punishment for crime; and the length of time between confinement in the asylum and the commission of the act charged, the nature of the crime, and other facts, may render such inquisition of little weight as evidence; but its weight is for the jury in each case."

The presumption of insanity created by an acquittal, on the ground of insanity of one tried for murder, continues until overthrown by proof of restoration to sanity. State ex rel. Thompson v. Snell (1907) 46 Wash. 327, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1191, 89 Pac. 931.

It was held in Reeves v. State (1914) 186 Ala. 14, 65 So. 160, that an ex parte order committing one to an insane asylum was not conclusive evidence of his insanity, on his prosecution for murder.

The fact that he had been confined in a lunatic asylum is not conclusive on the question of the mental condition of one accused of assault a few years later. Meyer v. People (1895) 156 Ill. 126, 40 N. E. 490.

But it was held in State v. Davis (1887) 27 S. C. 609, 4 S. E. 567, on a prosecution for murder, that where insanity has been established by proof of commitment to an insane asylum, it is presumed to continue until the contrary is shown.

It was held in Langdon v. People (1890) 133 Ill. 382, 24 N. E. 874, that the transfer from the penitentiary to an insane asylum of one convicted of forgery was not conclusive evidence of his insanity.

The fact that one on trial for homicide had been ordered committed to the state hospital for the insane immediately prior to the homicide does not conclusively establish that he was not responsible for the killing, since he might have been suffering from partial insanity such as would justify his detention in the asylum for care and treatment, and still not be insane to such an extent as to be deemed irresponsible in law for his conduct. People v. Willard (1907) 150 Cal. 543, 89 Pac. 124.

It was held in Goodwin v. State (1884) 96 Ind. 550, on a prosecution for homicide, that proceedings for the commitment of the accused to a hospital for the insane were not conclusive, where they were instituted under a statute which did not contemplate that such proceedings should be a conclusive adjudication of insanity, but merely an adjudication of propriety of treatment in the hospital.

It is not conclusive evidence of the irresponsibility of one accused of murder that he had previously been adjudged a fit subject for treatment in a hospital for the insane. Pfueger v. State (1895) 46 Neb. 493, 64 N. W. 1094.

Proof of confinement in a hospital for the insane for a few months is not conclusive evidence of the criminal irresponsibility of one accused of murder some twenty-five years afterwards. Blue v. Com. (1916) 171 Ky. 165, 188 S. W. 329.

j. Mental unfitness for trial.

Where a probate court, acting under its statutory authority to examine into the mental condition of persons and adjudge whether they are insane or not, has duly adjudged to be insane one in custody on a criminal charge, the examining magistrate, in the absence of any other showing or adjudication upon the question of the defendant's mental condition, cannot proceed with such examination or hold the defendant to bail to answer for such crime. Re Wright (1906) 74 Kan. 406, 86 Pac. 460, 89 Pac. 678.

In Reeves v. State (1914) 186 Ala. 14, 65 So. 160, where it was suggested to the court that the defendant was insane, and ought not to be placed on trial for that reason, and the defendant apparently relied solely upon an order, made while he was in jail, committing him to the state insane asylum, it was held that such an order was not conclusive as to the question of insanity.

A finding of insanity, on an inquiry instituted for the purpose of determining whether a person under confinement on a criminal charge should be brought to trial, is not conclusive on the question of his mental condition at the time of the offense. State v. Grendahl (1906) 181 Iowa, 602, 109 N. W. 121.

And in Davidson v. Com. (1916) 171 Ky. 488, 188 S. W. 631, where a lunacy inquiry into the mental condition of one under confinement on a criminal charge was held under a statute authorizing the jury to find when the insanity began, and providing that his trial should be postponed until the condition of his mind could be determined, and, if unsound, that he should be confined until he was restored, it was held that a verdict finding that his insanity began before the commission of the crime was not conclusive evidence of his insanity at that time, and was not a bar to his further prosecution, but that, as the verdict was conclusive of his mental condition only at the time of the inquest, and as there was no rule of law or statute requiring a second inquest to rebut the presumption of continuance of insanity, it might be rebutted by oral evidence upon his subsequent prosecution.

k. Disqualification as witness.

An adjudication of insanity is prima facie evidence of the lunatic's incompetency as a witness. Hoyt v. Adeo (1870) 3 Lans. (N. Y.) 173.

And in Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v.

Thompson (1877) 27 C. C. A. 333, 54 U. S. App. 222, 82 Fed. 720, it was held that such an adjudication and confinement in a lunatic asylum were prima facie evidence of the lunatic's unsoundness of mind, under a statute disqualifying persons of unsound mind as witnesses.

But in Covington v. O'Meara (1909) 133 Ky. 763, 119 S. W. 187, it was held that the rule that one adjudged insane is presumed to continue so did not apply to one offered as a witness, unless he was still confined in the insane asylum, or the adjudication was so recent as to raise the presumption of fact that his mental condition had not materially changed.

And it was held in Barker v. Washburn (1911) 200 N. Y. 280, 84 L.R.A. (N.S.) 159, 140 Am. St. Rep. 640, 93 N. E. 958, that an inquisition of idiocy and the appointment of a committee for the idiot were not conclusive evidence of his incompetency to testify several years later, but that he might be allowed to testify, if an examination showed his competency to do so.

And in Breedlove v. Bundy (1884) 96 Ind. 319, it was held that a certificate by two justices of the peace that a person was insane and should be placed in a hospital for the curable insane, and his commitment thereto, was not sufficient to establish his incompetency as a witness nine years afterwards.

1. Miscellaneous.

An inquisition of lunacy taken prior to an alleged adultery is only presumptive evidence, in an action for divorce, of the defendant's insanity at the time of the commission of the adultery. Cook v. Cook (1869) 53 Barb. (N. Y.) 180.

It was held in Donnelly v. Chicago City R. Co. (1911) 163 Ill. App. 7, that a subsequent adjudication of lunacy was not conclusive of the fact of insanity, in an action for personal injuries in which it was claimed that the insanity was due to the injuries received.

An adjudication of insanity, where no committee is appointed, is not conclusive evidence of the lunatic's incapacity to subsequently choose a new domicil. Re Fidelity Trust Co. (1899) 27 Misc. 118, 57 N. Y. Supp. 361.

The same holding was made in Lucas v. Parsons (1857) 23 Ga. 267, where a guardian had been appointed, and was acting.

In Demelt v. Leonard (1860) 19 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 140, an action by his committee to set aside a judgment previously rendered against a lunatic during the period overreached by the findings in the lunacy proceedings, it was held that the inquisition was presumptive evidence that the judgment debtor was insane at the time the judgment was obtained.

An inquisition of lunacy is only prima facie evidence upon the question whether the lunatic comes within the exception of the Statute of Limitations as to persons non compos mentis. Christmas v. Mitchell (1845) 38 N. C. (3 Ired. Eq.) 464.

An inquisition of lunacy is conclusive evidence of the insanity of the alleged lunatic at the time of the finding, in an action of trespass by the lunatic, against those who instituted the lunacy proceedings, for conspiracy in causing the plaintiff to be placed in an insane asylum. Johnston v. Given (1884) 4 Walk. (Pa.) 341.

A decree of the probate court upon an inquisition of lunacy must be considered, at least, as prima facie evidence that the assignment of the guardian was rightly made, and that the ward was a person non compos mentis. White v. Palmer (1808) 4 Mass. 147.

In Chaloner v. New York Evening Post Co. (1919) 260 Fed. 335, an action for libel in a Federal court for New York, by a resident of Virginia who had been adjudged insane by a New York court, and subsequently found sane by a Virginia court before the commencement of the action, it was held, upon the question of the plaintiff's capacity to sue under the section of the New York Code denying capacity to one who has been judicially declared to be incompetent, that the New York decree, in the absence of countervailing evidence of equal dignity, should be accepted as conclusively establishing the plaintiff's present mental status, but that the later Virginia decree was competent evidence of the plaintiff's mental status, and neutralized the probative effect of the New York decree.

An adjudication of insanity of a referee, made on the date on which he signed his decision, is only prima facie or presumptive evidence of his insanity on such date, on a motion to set aside the judgment rendered upon his decision. R. A. Schoenberg & Co. v. Ulman (1906) 51 Misc. 83, 99 N. Y. Supp. 650.

In Newton v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. (1879) 76 N. Y. 426, 32 Am. Rep. 835, an action on a policy of life insurance by the administrator of the insured, where the defendant, in support of the defense that the insured falsely stated in his application for the policy that his father had not died of, or been afflicted with, insanity, introduced in evidence the record of a probate court holding his father to be an insane person and ordering him to be sent to a lunatic asylum, and the record of the asylum showing his admission thereto, it was held that they were not conclusive evidence against the plaintiff of the insanity of the insured's father.

In Re Linton (1892) 29 W. N. C. (Pa.) 550, a committee was appointed for a person on proof of his lunacy by an adjudication of lunacy in another state.

In passing upon the question of the validity of the sale of a lunatic's real estate by his committee, the court, in Mitchell v. Spaulding (1902) 20 Pa. Super Ct. 296, said that the finding of the inquisition, after its return, was conclusive of the question of the capacity of the alleged lunatic until revoked. G. V. L.

Tax — stamp — share in trust.

1. The provision of the Act of Congress of October 22, 1914, imposing a stamp tax upon the issues of shares of stock, applies to certificates of shares issued by a common-law trust which carry certain rights while the trust is a going concern and in its winding up.

Definition — certificate of stock.

2. A certificate evidencing a transferable share or shares in the share capital of a manufacturing company whether incorporated, quasi incorporated, or wholly unincorporated, is properly described as a "certificate of stock."

Constitutional law — stamp tax — discrimination between companies.

3. A statute imposing a stamp tax upon the issuance of certificates of stock does not unconstitutionally or unreasonably discriminate between associations which do and those which do not issue certificates of stock.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts (Bingham, Dist. J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the amount of a stamp tax on stock certificates paid by plaintiffs to defendant under protest. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Thomas J. Boynton and Francis G. Goodale, for plaintiff in error:

The Pepperell Manufacturing Company is an "association" within the meaning of the statute.

Williams v. Milton, 215 Mass. 1, 102 N. E. 355; Crocker v. Malley, 163 C. C. A. 131, 250 Fed. 817.

The shareholders' certificates of Pepperell Manufacturing Company are "certificates of stock."

Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 679, 686, 24 L. ed. 558, 560; Eliot v. Freeman, 220 U. S. 178, 55 L. ed. 424, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 360; Crocker v. Malley, 163 C. C. A. 131, 250 Fed. 817; Roberts v. Anderson, 141 C. C. A. 121, 226 Fed. 9; Minot v. Burroughs, 223 Mass. 595, 112 N. E. 620; Hightower v. Thornton, 8 Ga. 486, 52 Am. Dec. 412; State ex rel. Batz v. Lewis, 118 Wis. 432, 95 N. W. 388; Dana v. Treasurer, 227 Mass. 562, 116 N. E. 941; Bartlett v. Gill, 221 Fed. 476, 140 C. C. A. 405, 224 Fed. 927; Com. v. Pennsylvania Coal Co. 197 Pa. 551, 47 Atl. 740.

Certificates of beneficial interest in a trust are not "certificates of stock" within either the ordinary and recognized meaning, or the technical meaning, of that term.

Certificates of beneficial interest in a trust represent an interest or property fundamentally different in its nature from that represented by "certificates of stock."

The ownership of certificates of beneficial interest in a trust involves very different rights and obligations from those involved in ownership of "certificates of stock."

Hoadley v. Essex County, 105 Mass. 519; Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 45, 23 L. ed. 208; Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 60, 23 L. ed. 222; Phillips v. Blatchford, 137 Mass. 510; Morris Bank v. Gorham, 169 Mass. 519, 48 N. E. 341.

Suits may be brought by or against a corporation in the corporate name, but a trust cannot sue or be sued as an entity.

Carey v. Brown, 92 U. S. 171, 172, 23 L. ed. 469, 470; Kerrison v. Stewart, 93 U. S. 155, 160, 23 L. ed. 843, 845; Dodge v. Tulleys, 144 U. S. 451, 36 L. ed. 501, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 728; Ashton v. Atlantic Bank, 3 Allen, 217; Williams v. Boston, 208 Mass. 497, 94 N. E. 808; Williams v. Milton, 215 Mass. 1, 102 N. E. 355; Elm City Club v. Howes, 92 Me. 211, 42 Atl. 392; Coombs v. Harford, 99 Me. 426, 59 Atl. 529.

The construction of the statute under which these certificates of beneficial interest are clearly distinguished from "certificates of stock" is in accordance with the decisions under the Corporation Tax Law, and is the only construction which avoids the danger of unconstitutionality.

Brown, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

We are of the opinion that, on the original issue of the certificates of shares of the Pepperell Manufacturing Company, a manufacturing company organized in the form of a trust under the common law, and share in trust.

deriving none of its rights, qualities, or benefits from any statute, there was required by the provisions of § 5, schedule A, of the War Tax Law, so-called, approved October 22, 1914 (38 Stat. at L. 745, 753, 759, chap. 331, Comp. Stat. §§ 2013, 2643, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 185, 284, 296), a stamp tax of 5 cents on each $100 of face value or fraction thereof.

By the agreement and declaration of trust it was provided: "The capital of this trust shall be seven million six hundred and sixty-eight thousand dollars ($7,668,000), divided for the purpose of issuing certificates into 76,680 shares, of the par value of one hundred dollars ($100) each."

There was thus provided a share capital as a basis for the issue of transferable certificates evidencing a proportional interest therein and carrying with them certain rights while the company is a going concern and in its winding up.

The defendants in error, the trustees, contend that these certificates are not "certificates of stock."

The word "stock," however, is to be interpreted in connection with the accompanying words of the statute, "association, company, or corporation." It is a term not peculiar to corporations, but a term equally applicable to the share capital or fund created by or in accordance with an agreement for the formation of an unincorporated association or company.

The contention of the trustees, that "legislative action is essential to the creation of 'capital stock,'" is erroneous. If there is a distinction between the "capital" and the "capital stock" of corporations, in that the capital stock is fixed by the charter of a corporation, but that the capital used in its business may be either larger or smaller, there may be a like distinction between the joint stock or share capital of a partnership or association, as fixed by the agreement of the partners, and the full amount of its property. Lindley, Partn. 8th Eng. ed. 382 et seq.

In Bankruptcy Act August 19, 1841, chap. 9, § 14, 5 Stat. at L. 448, and Act March 2, 1867, chap. 176, § 36, 14 Stat. at L. 534, the term "joint stock" was used to describe partnership assets. Collier, Bankr. 11th ed. pp. 1550, 1535. In Berthold v. Goldsmith, 24 How. 541, 16 L. ed. 764, the term "capital stock" was used in the same sense.

An "association" or "company," equally with a corporation, may have a share capital distinct from its actual capital or property, irrespective of whether it is formed in a state without regulating statutes, or in a state where by statute it is regulated and given some of the characteristics of a corporation. The present statute, by the use of the terms "association" and "company," covers those formed under the common law as well as those formed under or regulated by statute.

It seems to us clear that the words, "certificates of stock," contain no implication of an intent to exclude common-law associations or companies.

A certificate evidencing a transferable share or shares in the share capital of a manufacturing company, whether incorporated, quasi incorporated, or wholly unincorporated, is properly described as a "certificate of stock."

Definition—certificate of stock.

By agreement the certificates in question were issued as evidence of shares of a fixed capital, divided into a fixed number of shares, of the par value of $100 each.

We are called upon to apply a statute imposing stamp taxes on documents of a certain class, and which assumes that these documents may be issued, not only by corporations, but by associations and companies. These may have this in common,—a share capital of fixed amount. Whether the share capital is fixed by agreement or under statutory authority seems immaterial; for the tax is not a franchise tax or a corporation tax, but a stamp tax or document tax.

The differences between corporations and unincorporated associations being considered immaterial to the imposition of a stamp tax on documents, the different modes of realizing upon the shares of incorporated or unincorporated companies by the certificate holders must also be regarded as immaterial. Having that feature of resemblance which the statute fixes upon as the test of the imposition of a stamp tax, the difference between these different bodies which are named in the statute has become immaterial to the question before us.

The suggestion of constitutional difficulties in adopting the construction for which the collector contends, and which we think right, does not seem of weight. It involves "no distinction founded upon an immaterial difference between two kinds of partnerships," since the stamp tax is contingent upon the original issue of "certificates of stock," just as a stamp tax on checks is contingent upon the issuing of checks.

A stamp tax on documents discriminates between those who do and those who do not issue documents; and a distinction between unincorporated companies and associations which do and those which do not issue certificates of shares of stock is not unreasonable, nor founded upon an immaterial difference between two kinds of partnerships.

The Massachusetts cases cited (Gleason v. McKay, 134 Mass. 419; Minot v. Winthrop, 162 Mass. 113, 26 L.R.A. 259, 38 N. E. 512; Opinion of Justices, 196 Mass. 603, 85 N. E. 545) in our opinion do not give rise to any constitutional difficulty. The opinion of Chief Justice Rugg (196 Mass. 619, 620) tends to support the view that the words, "association" and "company," include organizations not regulated by statute, and that a statute including these in an excise tax does not involve a discrimination founded on an immaterial difference.

Nor do we regard it useful to consider whether the right of the certificate holder or shareholder is a chose in action or in the nature of a chose in action, or an equitable interest in property.

The certificate is but a muniment of title,—documentary evidence of ownership,—and not the share itself.

The thing taxed is not a chose in action, though it may be evidence of it. In a remote sense both a share of corporate stock and a certificate of a share in an unincorporated company may be said to represent an interest in property. It is equally true that both may represent an interest in a share of a capital fixed in amount, whether fixed by statute or by agreement.

In Eliot v. Freeman, 220 U. S. 178, 55 L. ed. 424, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 360, construing the Corporation Tax Law (Act Aug. 5, 1909, chap. 6, 36 Stat. at L. 11), it was held that the tax was imposed upon doing business in a corporate or quasi corporate capacity. But that case is clearly distinguishable from the present case, since the present statute does not impose a franchise tax, but imposes a stamp tax upon various kinds of documents, which may be issued by companies neither incorporated nor quasi incorporated, "or for or in respect of the vellum, parchment, or paper upon which such instruments, matters, or things, or any of them are written or printed," etc. See § 5, 38 Stat. 753, chap. 331, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 284. In interpreting the statute we find no sufficient reason for limiting the terms, "association" and "company," to those which derive their powers from legislation.

We have examined, also, the opinion of the Supreme Court in Crocker v. Malley, March 17, 1919, 249 U. S. 223, 63 L. ed. 573, 2 A.L.R. 1601, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 270, reversing the judgment of this court. In that case the Supreme Court found that "the declaration of trust on its face is an ordinary real estate trust of the kind familiar in Massachusetts, unless in the particular that the trustees' receipt provides that the holder has no interest in any specific property and that it purports only to declare the holder entitled to a certain fraction of the net proceeds of the property when converted into cash 'and meantime to income.'"

It was stated, however, in that case: "The function of the trustees is not to manage the mills, but simply to collect the rents and income of such property as may be in their hands," etc.

Under the present declaration of trust it is provided that the name of the trust shall be Pepperell Manufacturing Company, and the trustees may be so designated, and in that name the trustees shall, so far as practicable, conduct the business of the trust; that the trustees shall employ and use the trust property and assets in the carrying on of the business of manufacturing textile or other fabrics, etc. This is essentially different from an ordinary real estate trust of the kind familiar in Massachusetts. If, under the decision of the Supreme Court, there may be doubt whether the term "association" is applicable, there seems no ground for serious doubt of the applicability of the term "company," used in the statute and made a part of the name and description of those persons who are to conduct the manufacturing business of the organization.

In applying this stamp tax we find no substantial reason for a distinction between this textile manufacturing company and other textile manufacturing companies.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the case will be remanded to that court, with direction to enter judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff in error recovers costs in both courts.

untary common-law trusts formed for the purpose of carrying on a business for profit, and not deriving any powers or benefits from statutory regulation. This, of course, excludes cases involving strict partnerships, joint stock associations, or companies when there is no express trust, and all decisions determining questions as to any association, organization, company, or corporation formed under, or deriving any rights and powers from, either statutory or constitutional provisions, as well as all cases where the association was not formed for pecuniary profit, as distinguished from one whose object was pecuniary profit.

II. Validity.

It seems to be almost universally conceded, at least in the absence of prohibitory or controlling statute, that business trusts of the character known as "Massachusetts trusts," and which in the great majority of the cases are in fact nothing more than common-law partnerships, or joint stock companies or associations formed or organized in the nature of a trust, with the capital dividend into certificates or shares and usually represented by stock, to carry on a business for profit and in the interest and for the benefit of the certificate or share holders,—are, generally speaking, legal and valid. For instance, in a considerable number of cases the courts have either expressly or impliedly upheld the validity, fundamentally at least, of business trusts of the character under consideration. The following cases are illustrative of those which have involved apparently valid common-law business trusts:

In Walburn v. Ingilby (1832) 1 Myl. & K. 61, 39 Eng. Reprint, 604, where it was contended that a common-law joint stock association was illegal, Lord Chancellor Brougham said: "To hold such a company illegal would be to say that every joint stock company not incorporated by charter or act of Parliament is unlawful, and, indeed, indictable as a nuisance, and to decide this for the first time, no authority of a decided case being produced for such a doctrine."

Cross v. Jackson (1843) 5 Hill (N. Y.) 478, also seems to directly uphold the validity of a common-law joint stock association in the nature of a trust, it having been held that where, by the articles of agreement, all the property was to be vested in trustees thereafter to be elected and to whom the subscribers were to pay their subscriptions, an action to recover such subscriptions could be brought and maintained in the names of the trustees so elected. The validity of a business trust in the nature of an association or corporation also finds support in the case of Clagett v. Kilbourne (1861) 1 Black (U. S.) 346, 17 L. ed. 213. Here several persons formed an unincorporated association or joint stock company for the purpose of dealing in land which by the articles were to be conveyed to certain persons as trustee to hold as joint tenants in trust for the members of the association, and the capital was divided into shares and distributed among the members in proportion to the sums contributed by them. Subsequently a creditor of one of the shareholders sought to sell his interest in the land which had been purchased and was held by the trustees, as the individual property of his debtor member of the trust; but the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Nelson, held that this could not be done, as the law was otherwise. Among other things he said: "The legal title is in the trustees, who are bound to account to the stockholders, the cestuis que trust, according to their respective shares, after all debts of the association have been discharged. The equity of the judgment creditor is the interest in the land, after a sufficient portion of it has been disposed of for this purpose." And, as further tending to show that the court regarded the trust as a valid one, it was said: "It is quite clear the plaintiff [debtor member of the association who had brought action to regain possession of the land from his creditor, to whom the sheriff had sold it on execution] has mistaken his remedy, as he obtained no title, legal or equitable, to the particular lots in question."

However, in Minnesota, it has been held that an unincorporated land association cannot hold property in trust, and that a deed to its trustees in trust for the association is void; at least where it does not state who the members are. German Land Asso. v. Scholler (1865) 10 Minn. 331, Gil. 260. This was an action to enforce a trust inter vivos by a conveyance of real estate to the plaintiff unincorporated "German Land Association," which had been formed for the purpose of securing to its members, homesteads upon public land in the Northwest. The deed in question was to named persons in trust for the "German Land Association," and "for the use and benefit of the several members thereof, according to their respective interests," as the same might thereafter be determined by division or otherwise. The court said that the association itself had no capacity to take or hold real estate, that a grant to such an association eo nomine would pass no legal title, and then held that, even though the deed was to trustees for the association, equity could not enforce the trust because, since the members of the association were not named, it was too uncertain as to the beneficiaries. Wilson, Ch. J., said: "Courts of equity carry trusts into effect only when they are of a certain and definite character. If, therefore, a trust is clearly created in a party, but the terms by which it is created are so vague and indefinite that courts of equity cannot clearly ascertain either the objects or the persons who are to take them, the trust will be held entirely to fail. . . . The German Land Association was not by the law invested with any legal existence, and the trust deed gives no intimation as to who the persons were, associated under that name. The deed was, therefore, void." In connection with this decision it is worthy of note that the court applied reasoning usual in connection with deeds to associations themselves, where the question is the validity as affected by uncertainty of beneficiary; and that the association, perhaps, should be regarded as an association formed for other than pecuniary profit. It is also of interest that Sears, in his valuable book on "Trust Estates as Business Companies," points out, on page 15, that "this case, however, seems to confirm, by its very exception, claim for the legality of establishing a trust as to any number of persons in their own interest, if the proper indicia for identification of beneficiaries appear."

And in Van Sandau v. Moore (1826) 1 Russ. 441, 38 Eng. Reprint, 171, 4 L. J. Ch. 177, 25 Revised Rep. 101, reversing (1826) 2 Sim. & Stu. 509, 57 Eng. Reprint, 440, Lord Eldon, in the course of a review of the history of joint stock associations, seems to have been of the opinion that such associations were illegal in the absence of statutory creation or regulation giving effect to legal proceedings in which they were parties. For instance, he implied that when such an association had a great many members, the jurisdiction of the court ought not to be employed because it could not give justice by attending to all the necessary parties, and consequently that the members of such an association could neither effectually demand what they had to demand, nor be effectually sued for that for which they were liable, one shareholder not being allowed to either sue or be sued so as to bind other shareholders not actually made parties. However, as elsewhere shown, Lord Eldon's opinion does not represent the true status of the law of England.

Of course if a company or association organized as a business trust conflicts with a statute regulating such enterprises, it is an illegal association. Such a statute was the English Companies Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. chap. 89) which provided in § 4 that "no company, association, or partnership consisting of more than twenty persons shall be formed . . . for the purpose of carrying on any other business [than banking] that has for its object, the acquisition of gain by the company, association, or partnership, or by the individual members thereof, unless it is registered" under the act. An organization falling within a statute of this character is illustrated by the case of Re Thomas (1885) L. R. 14 Q. B. Div. (Eng.) 379, 54 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 336, 51 L. T. N. S. 602, 33 Week. Rep. 583, wherein it was held that an unincorporated and unregistered building and loan association was an illegal organization from the time it acquired more than twenty members, within § 4 of the Companies Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. chap. 89), although in its conception it comprised less than twenty members. And again in Smith v. Anderson (1880) L. R. 15 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 247, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 247, 43 L. T. N. S. 329, 29 Week. Rep. 21, the Master of the Rolls held that the "Submarine Cables Trust," which had been formed by a deed providing for the purchase by trustees of shares of the stock of several submarine telegraph companies with money furnished by subscribers for the trust certificates, was a company or association formed for the purpose of carrying on a business for gain within the meaning of the Companies Act and therefore illegal, since it had over twenty members. This judgment, however, was reversed by the court of appeal on the theory that, since the certificate holders retained no control over the trustees, they were not really associated in the business, and, therefore, that the association was a pure trust rather than a company, association, or partnership, so that it did not have to be registered under the act. (For a further treatment of the question of the difference between pure business trusts and trusts in the nature of a partnership or joint stock company, see infra, III. b, 1.)

It has been in effect declared that the mere fact that an association or partnership in the form of a trust has shares and capital stock does not render it illegal at common law. Phillips v. Blatchford (1884) 137 Mass. 510; Howe v. Morse (1899) 174 Mass. 491, 55 N. E. 213; Garrard v. Hardy (1843) 5 Mann. & G. 471, 134 Eng. Reprint, 648, 1 Dowl. & L. 51, 12 L. J. C. P. N. S. 205, 6 Scott, N. R. 450, 7 Jur. 200; Harrison v. Heathorn (1843) 6 Mann. & G. 81, 134 Eng. Reprint, 817, 12 L. J. C. P. N. S. 282, 6 Scott, N. R. 735; Re Mexican & South American Co. (1859) 27 Beav. 474, 54 Eng. Reprint, 188, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 631, 5 Jur. (N. S.) 615, 7 Week. Rep. 509, affirmed in (1859) 4 DeG. & J. 320, 45 Eng. Reprint, 124, 5 Jur. (N. S.) 719. And it has been said that this is especially true if the organization does not attempt to act as a corporation. Re Mexican & South American Co. (Eng.) supra. And in fact it seems to be fairly well settled that joint stock companies not sanctioned by affirmative legislative action, but existing purely as common-law organizations and which are in character merely business trusts, are generally valid. The following cases support this rule: Spotswood v. Morris (1906) 12 Idaho, 360, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 665, 85 Pac. 1094 (holding that the joint stock association under consideration was "clearly legal under the common law"); Phillips v. Blatchford (1884) 137 Mass. 510 (holding that the Act of 6 Geo. I. chap. 18, known as "The Bubble Act," and restraining the formation of common-law joint stock companies, has not been adopted in this country); Walburn v. Ingilby (1832) 1 Myl. & K. 61, 39 Eng. Reprint, 604, 3 L. J. Ch. N. S. 21, Coop. t. Brougham, 270 (holding joint stock companies valid at common law). In Spotswood v. Morris (Idaho) supra, it was held that a joint stock company voluntarily organized to deal in real estate, and which derived no rights or powers from any statute, was not violative of a constitutional provision that joint stock companies shall not exercise any of the powers or privileges of corporations not possessed by individuals or partnerships, since "to possess or exercise powers or privileges of corporations requires a sovereign grant, — a franchise which said association has not and does not profess to possess."

And it has been expressly held that Massachusetts business trusts are not rendered illegal because intended to avoid having a paid-up capital, which would be necessary if a corporation were formed, and to escape taxation. Phillips v. Blatchford (Mass.) supra. Holmes, J., said that "an association does not become illegal simply because another very like it is taxed. We perceive no wrong to the public, and as to the shareholders, if they choose to purchase stock in a partnership with unlimited personal liability, it is their own lookout."

Nor, it has been held, is the trust character of a so-called "Massachusetts real estate trust" affected by the fact that the parties to the agreement were to acquire a beneficial interest in proportion to the amount contributed by each, and that no provision was made for muniments of title. Mallory v. Russell (1887) 71 Iowa, 63, 60 Am. Rep. 776, 32 N. W. 102.

And the fact that a joint stock company in the nature of a trust association raises and has "transferable" stock has been held not to render the association a nuisance at common law.

Garrard v. Hardey (1843) 5 Mann. & G. 471, 134 Eng. Reprint, 648, 1 Dowl. & L. 51, 12 L. J. C. P. N. S. 205, 6 Scott, N. R. 450, 7 Jur. 200; Harrison v. Heathorn (1843) 6 Mann. & G. 81, 134 Eng. Reprint, 817, 12 L. J. C. P. N. S. 282, 6 Scott, N. R. 735; Re Mexican & South American Co. (1859) 27 Beav. 474, 54 Eng. Reprint, 188, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 631, 5 Jur. (N. S.) 615, 7 Week. Rep. 509, affirmed in (1859) 4 DeG. & J. 320, 45 Eng. Reprint, 124, 5 Jur. (N. S.) 779. In Garrard v. Hardey (Eng.) supra, it was held that the formation of a joint stock company or partnership in the nature of a trust, and the raising and transferring of stock therein, did not render the company an illegal one. In this case it was alleged that the defendant and others did illegally associate themselves together in an illegal undertaking tending to the common nuisance, prejudice, and inconvenience of the Queen's subjects in trade and commerce, in that they did act as a corporate body and pretend to be a trading corporation and did pretend to raise and transfer stock in such company without legal authority by act of Parliament, charter from the Crown, or letters patent under the great seal or by any legal authority whatever; but Tindal, Ch. J., held otherwise. He said: "The raising and transferring of stock in a company cannot be held, in itself, an offense at common law; such species of property was altogether unknown to the law in ancient times; . . . we find no authority for holding that an allegation that the parties raised and transferred stock is simply, and per se, without any statement of the mode by which it injures or defrauds the public, an indictable offense at common law. And, laying that allegation out of the way, the plea really states no more, in substance, than that the plaintiff and the defendant 'and other persons' (which allegation would be satisfied if there were two only in addition to themselves), pretended to act as a trading corporation, under the name and style of 'The Limerick Marble & Stone Company.' The plea states no illegal mode or means by which they pretended to act as a company, as, by usurping a common seal, or the like; nothing more is stated than their assuming the style and firm of a company."

So, it has been held that partnerships organized in the form of business trusts are not rendered illegal by the fact that their capital is divided into "transferable" shares. Phillips v. Blatchford (1884) 137 Mass. 510; Howe v. Morse (1899) 174 Mass. 491, 55 N. E. 213; Re Mexican & South American Co. (1859) 27 Beav. 474, 54 Eng. Reprint, 188, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 631, 5 Jur. N. S. 615, 7 Week. Rep. 509, affirmed in (1859) 4 DeG. & J. 320, 45 Eng. Reprint, 124, 5 Jur. N. S. 779. And see Hoadley v. Essex County (1870) 105 Mass. 519; Whitman v. Porter (1871) 107 Mass. 522; Ricker v. American Loan & T. Co. (1885) 140 Mass. 346, 5 N. E. 284; Williams v. Boston (1911) 208 Mass. 497, 94 N. E. 808; Williams v. Milton (1913) 215 Mass. 1, 102 N. E. 355, followed and relied upon in Foster v. Boston (1913) 215 Mass. 31, 102 N. E. 359; and Frost v. Thompson (1914) 219 Mass. 360, 106 N. E. 1009. In Re Mexican & South American Co. 27 Beav. 474, 54 Eng. Reprint, 188, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 631, 5 Jur. N. S. 615, 7 Week. Rep. 509, affirmed in (1859) 4 DeG. & J. 320, 45 Eng. Reprint, 124, 5 Jur. N. S. 779, supra, the Master of the Rolls said: "The other ground [of alleged illegality] is, that there is an indefinite assignment of shares. I have listened in vain for any case, or, indeed for the statement of any principle, whereby at common law, and independent of any statute, a partnership between persons who agree among themselves that their shares shall be legally assignable in perpetuum, or indefinitely assignable, is absolutely void and illegal. I find no case which determines it, and no principle on which it can rest, nor am I able to conjecture why such an association should be void at common law. It does not appear to me to offend against society, or to injure any class of individuals."

c. Provisions limiting liability.

Under an unincorporated business trust of the character under consideration it has been held that the trustees may lawfully be so limited by the agreement as to incurring indebtedness as not to bind the beneficiaries personally. Thus, in Bank of Topeka v. Eaton (1901) 100 Fed. 8, affirmed without opinion in (1901) 47 C. C. A. 140, 107 Fed. 1003, where the articles of association provided that any debt incurred by the trustees for the association should be a lien upon the trust property, but that they had no power to bind the shareholders personally, it was held that one who took a note from the trustees containing an express statement that it was given under the articles of association, and not otherwise, would be limited to a proceeding against the trust property so that he could not maintain an action against the shareholders individually. And that a provision exempting the stock or certificate holders from personal liability for debts does not prevent the trust being classified as a partnership, see Williams v. Boston (1911) 208 Mass. 497, 94 N. E. 808.

And the fact that the liability of each member is expressly limited to his share has been held not enough to make a joint stock company in its nature a business trust, illegal. Walburn v. Ingilby (1832) 1 Myl. & K. 61, 39 Eng. Reprint, 604. In this connection Lord Chancellor Brougham said: "The clause intimating that each subscriber is only to be liable to the extent of his share is not enough to make the association illegal; such a regulation is wholly nugatory, indeed, as between the company and strangers, and can serve no purpose whatever, unless to give notice. In that light it is not to be viewed as criminal or as a means of deception; for the publicity of it may tend to inform such as deal with the company, and a proof of that publicity in the neighborhood of parties so dealing might go to fix them with notice. For any other purpose, for the purpose of restricting the liability of the shareholders, it would plainly be of no avail; and whosoever became a subscriber upon the faith of the restricting clause, or of the limited responsibility which that holds out, would

And the trustees may themselves avoid personal liability on any contract entered into by them by express provision to that effect. For instance, in Shoe & Leather Nat. Bank v. Dix (1877) 123 Mass. 148, the trustees of a common-law land association were held to have avoided personal liability on a note given for a trust purpose by virtue of the provision, "We as trustees, but not individually, promise to pay," etc. Again, in Hussey v. Arnold (1904) 185 Mass. 202, 70 N. E. 87, where the trustees of a business trust made a contract which by its terms was enforceable only against the trust property, it was held that the trustees incurred no personal liability on the contract and, therefore, that an attachment in an action on the contract brought against the trustees personally created no enforceable lien.

It has been held that the rule against perpetuities is not violated by a business trust organized for an indefinite term, at least where the trust real estate was to be conveyed to the trustees to be held by them until they exercised their discretion to sell the same. Hart v. Seymour (1893) 147 Ill. 598, 35 N. E. 246. This was upon the theory that such a conveyance to the trustees to be disposed of at any time they saw fit did not cause any suspension of the power of alienation, without which there can, of course, be no violation of the rule against perpetuities.

And in Howe v. Morse (1899) 174 Mass. 491, 55 N. E. 213, in holding that a common-law building association trust was not illegal merely because no termination of the trust or sale of the corpus thereof would necessarily occur within the period of a life or lives in being at the time of the creation of the trust and twenty-one years, or because the certificate holders could not have partition of the land or compel its sale except by a three-fourths vote, so that there was an illegal restraint upon alienation, the court said: "The substance of the situation is that the shareholders for the time being have the whole equitable estate in the corpus of the trust, and can at all times sell and transfer their equitable estates at their own pleasure; and the trustees hold the legal title in fee in trust to do with the land whatever may be required by the owners of the equitable estate, which owners have full capacity, at all times and at their own option, to require a sale of the land discharged of the trust, or the immediate termination of the trust after a period of five years and a few days, the owners of the equitable estate being a voluntary association, the beneficial interests in which are represented by shares, and the association acting by vote of the shareholders. That the directions of the association to the trustees are to be given by three-fourths votes, rather than by majority votes, is immaterial, since it cannot be said that one is more improbable than the other; either is a reasonable way of declaring the will of the association, and there is no provision that a vote to sell or to end the trust must be passed within any stated period, or at all. Such a trust for the convenience of an unincorporated association in renting and selling land, under which the land is held for no other purpose, and where the income is not accumulated but is distributed as it accrues, and where the land is to be sold free of trusts at the will of the association, and where the whole equitable interest in the trust is at every moment vested absolutely in those who at that moment are shareholders, and never can become vested in any other person save by act of the absolute owners or by operation of law upon their property, and not by force of any limitation contained in the deed of trust, the equitable interests so vested being also constantly vendible by their several owners without let or hindrance, as well as subject to their debts and passing like other property upon death by virtue, not of the deed of trust, but of the general laws governing the disposition of the property of decedents,—withdraws no property from commerce, and is not within the reason or the terms of what is called 'the rule against perpetuities.' The trust involves no future limitations, no restraint upon alienation; and no accumulation either of income or of principal."

III. Purpose and legal nature.

a. Purposes for which business trust may be formed.

There seems to be no doubt that in jurisdictions where common-law business trusts may be formed at all, there is no limitation upon the purpose or object for which such a trust may be created, provided, of course, that the same is ordinarily legitimate and lawful. In fact such trusts have been formed to deal in various ways with both real and personal property.

Illustrative of the purposes for which common-law real estate trusts have been formed may be mentioned business trusts formed for the purpose of buying and selling land (Clagett v. Kilbourne (1861) 1 Black (U. S.) 346, 17 L. ed. 213; Bank of Topeka v. Eaton (1901) 100 Fed. 8, affirmed without opinion in (1901) 47 C. C. A. 140, 107 Fed. 1003; Spotswood v. Morris (1906) 12 Idaho, 360, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 665, 85 Pac. 1094; Mallory v. Russell (1887) 71 Iowa, 63, 60 Am. St. Rep. 776, 32 N. W. 103; Peabody v. Treasurer (1913) 215 Mass. 129, 102 N. E. 435); purchasing, improving, holding, and selling lands and buildings (Eliot v. Freeman (1911) 220 U. S. 178, 55 L. ed. 424, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 360); purchasing, improving, and managing real estate for gain (Williams v. Boston (1911) 208 Mass. 497, 94 N. E. 808; Ward v. Davis (1860) 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 502); holding, managing, improving, selling, and leasing real estate (Bartlett v. Gill (1915) 221 Fed. 476, affirmed in (1915) 140 C. C. A. 405, 224 Fed. 927); purchasing, selling, managing, and care, etc., of fruit-bearing lands (Frost v. Thompson (1914) 219 Mass. 360, 106 N. E. 1009); holding, maintaining, and acquiring lands, water power, paper manufacturing plants, tenements, etc., operating such plants, etc., with the power of owners, and finally converting the same into money and distributing the proceeds among the beneficiaries (Crocker v. Malley (1919) 249 U. S. 223, 63 L. ed. 573, 2 A.L.R. 1601, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 270); purchasing a certain real estate mortgage, etc. (Pittsburg Wagon Works' Estate (1903) 204 Pa. 432, 54 Atl. 316); formed to conduct a land or building association (Hart v. Seymour (1893) 147 Ill. 598, 35 N. E. 246; Shoe & Leather Nat. Bank v. Dix (1877) 123 Mass. 148, 25 Am. Rep. 49; Howe v. Morse (1899) 174 Mass. 491, 55 N. E. 213; King v. Townshend (1894) 141 N. Y. 358, 36 N. E. 513; Ward v. Davis (1850) 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 502; Willis v. Greiner (1894) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 26 S. W. 858); although a national bank cannot legally become a member of such a trust association (Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Wehrmann (1903) 69 Ohio St. 160, 68 N. E. 1004); to conduct a department store trust for the purpose of purchasing and holding certain land and erecting a building thereon suitable for a department store (Eliot v. Freeman (1911) 220 U. S. 178, 55 L. ed. 424, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 360); as well as for general investment, management, and use of real estate and to deal in stocks, bonds, and other similar securities (Hussey v. Arnold (1904) 185 Mass. 202, 70 N. E. 87). In Re Associated Trust (1914) 222 Fed. 1012, the organization in question was merely designated as a "Massachusetts real estate trust," without setting out the specific purpose of the association. And in Kinney v. Treasurer (Kinney v. Stevens) (1911) 207 Mass. 368, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 784, 93 N. E. 586, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 902, and Kennedy v. Hodges (1913) 215 Mass. 112, 102 N. E. 432, Massachusetts real estate trusts formed for unspecified purposes were also under consideration.

And business trusts other than the ordinary common-law real estate trusts have been formed and seemingly are regarded by the courts as valid. Illustrative of this class are the manufacturing companies organized in the form of common-law trusts which were under consideration in MALLEY v. BOWDITCH (reported herewith) ante, 608; Hoadley v. Essex County (1870)

105 Mass. 519; Gleason v. McKay (1883) 134 Mass. 419; and Phillips v. Blatchford (1884) 187 Mass. 510; the trust organized for the purpose of disposing of certain patent rights which was involved in Smith v. Moore (1880) 129 Mass. 222; the trust formed in Mayo v. Moritz (1890) 151 Mass. 481, 24 N. E. 1083, for the purpose of procuring patents on a certain invention, disposal thereof and distribution of the proceeds among the script holders; a collective body voluntarily associated and not of statutory origin for the purpose of carrying on an express business and known as the "Adams Express Company," which was treated in Hoey v. Coleman (1891) 46 Fed. 221, and Gregg v. Sanford (1895) 12 C. C. A. 525, 28 U. S. App. 313, 65 Fed. 151; the voluntary trust association dealt with in Whitman v. Porter (1871) 107 Mass. 522, which had been formed for the purpose of purchasing and running a ferryboat; the "Williamsburgh & New York Union Ferry Association," which was before the court in Cross v. Jackson (1843) 5 Hill (N. Y.) 478; the voluntary trust association formed for the purpose of buying, selling, and leasing railroad rolling stock, sometimes familiarly called the "Car Trust," which was construed in Ricker v. American Loan & T. Co. (1885) 140 Mass. 346, 5 N. E. 284; the trust to deal in stocks, bonds, securities, etc., and known as the "Boston Personal Property Trust," considered in Williams v. Milton (1913) 215 Mass. 1, 102 N. E. 355; a similar trust known as the "General Investment Trust," which was under consideration in Foster v. Boston (1913) 215 Mass. 31, 102 N. E. 359; a voluntary common-law trust to acquire and hold shares of the capital stock and securities of street railway and other companies for the benefit of the members, as in Gardiner v. Gardiner (1912) 212 Mass. 508, 99 N. E. 171 (but that in New York and Ohio there can be no partnership of separate and independent corporations, whether directly or indirectly, through the medium of a trust, see People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co. (1890) 121 N. Y. 582, 9 L.R.A. 33, 18 Am. St. Rep. 843, 24 N. E. 834, which involved what is known as the original "Sugar Trust," and State ex rel. Watson v. Standard Oil Co. (1892) 49 Ohio St. 137, 15 L.R.A. 145, 34 Am. St. Rep. 541, 30 N. E. 279, which had the original "Standard Oil Trust" under consideration, and in both of which the decision was upon the theory that participation in such a combination was inconsistent with the characters of the participants as incorporations); a trust to carry on a general mercantile business as is illustrated by Connally v. Lyons (1891) 82 Tex. 664, 27 Am. St. Rep. 935, 18 S. W. 799; a trust to hold, manage, and control a business building under a certain lease thereof, as in Falardeau v. Boston Art Students' Asso. (1903) 182 Mass. 405, 65 N. E. 797; a joint stock company in the nature of a trust to work mines of gold, silver, and other metals, as in Walburn v. Ingilby (1882) 1 Myl. & K. 61, 39 Eng. Reprint, 604, 3 L. J. Ch. N. S. 21, Coop. t. Brougham, 270; a partnership or joint stock company to work gold mines under the title "Anglo-American Gold Company Mining Association," as in Harrison v. Heathorn (1843) 6 Mann. & G. 81, 134 Eng. Reprint, 817, 12 L. J. C. P. N. S. 282, 6 Scott, N. R. 735; the trading company known as "The Limerick Marble & Stone Company," involved in Garrard v. Hardey (1843) 5 Mann. & G. 471, 134 Eng. Reprint, 648, 1 Dowl. & L. 51, 12 L. J. C. P. N. S. 205, 6 Scott, N. #### b. Legal nature of organization.

1. In general.

With reference to the legal character of trusts in the nature of voluntary unincorporated business organizations, various designations have been made.

For example, a business trust of the general character under consideration has as between members been referred to as a quasi corporation. Hoey v. Coleman (1891) 46 Fed. 221.

And in a number of instances joint stock companies or associations have been the designation made by the courts. See Clagett v. Kilbourne (1861) 1 Black (U. S.) 346, 17 L. ed. 218; Gregg v. Sanford (1895) 12 C. C. A. 525, 28 U. S. App. 313, 65 Fed. 151; Bank of Topeka v. Eaton (1901) 100 Fed. 8, affirmed without opinion in (1901) 47 C. C. A. 140, 107 Fed. 1003; Spotswood v. Morris (1906) 12 Idaho, 360, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 665, 85 Pac. 1094; Hart v. Seymour (1893) 147 Ill. 598, 35 N. E. 246; and Walburn v. Ingilby (1882) 1 Myl. & K. 61, 39 Eng. Reprint, 604, 3 L. J. Ch. N. S. 21, Coop. t. Brougham, 270. -

And business trusts have been referred to as partnerships where the certificate or shareholders retained control over the trustees and have had some authority as to the conducting of the business. See Clagett v. Kilbourne (U. S.) supra; Spotswood v. Morris (1906) 12 Idaho, 360, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 665, 85 Pac. 1094; Hoadley v. Essex County (1870) 105 Mass. 519 (holding that the fact that each member might sell and transfer his interest and thus introduce a new partner, though unusual, was not inconsistent with a contract of copartnership); Whitman v. Porter (1871) 107 Mass. 522 (holding same as preceding case); Smith v. Moore (1880) 129 Mass. 222; Gleason v. McKay (1883) 134 Mass. 419; Phillips v. Blatchford (1884) 137 Mass. 510; Ricker v. American Loan & T. Co. (1885) 140 Mass. 346, 5 N. E. 284; Howe v. Morse (1899) 174 Mass. 491, 55 N. E. 213; Williams v. Boston (1911) 208 Mass. 497, 94 N. E. 808 (holding same as Hoadley v. Essex County (1870) 105 Mass. 519, supra); Frost v. Thompson (1914) 219 Mass. 360, 106 N. E. 1009 (same); King v. Townshend (1894) 141 N. Y. 358, 36 N. E. 513; Inderwick v. Snell (1850) 2 Macn. & G. 216, 42 Eng. Reprint, 83, 2 Hall & Tw. 412, 19 L. J. Ch. N. S. 542, 14 Jur. 727. This is especially true with respect to third persons. Hoey v. Coleman (1891) 46 Fed. 221.

So, business trusts have been regarded as both joint stock companies and partnerships, the holders of the stock in joint stock companies generally being regarded as partners in fact. Clagett v. Kilbourne (1861) 1 Black (U. S.) 346, 17 L. ed. 213; Spotswood v. Morris (1906) 12 Idaho, 360, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 665, 85 Pac. 1094. This rule is perhaps subject to the limitation that, strictly speaking, any member of a partnership may generally bind the firm by acts in the course of the business, whereas in joint stock companies the management of the affairs of the companies may be intrusted to officers or trustees. For a case which discusses this particular phase of the question under annotation, see Willis v. Greiner (1894) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 26 S. W. 858.

And where the beneficiaries retain no control over the trustee, and are not in fact associated in the actual carrying on of the business, but are limited in interest to having the trust administered in their interest, it has been held that it should be regarded as a strict or pure trust. Crocker v. Malley (1919) 249 U. S. 223, 63 L. ed. 573, 2 A.L.R. 1601, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 270; Mayo v. Moritz (1890) 151 Mass. 481, 24 N. E. 1083; Williams v. Milton (1913) 215 Mass. 1, 102 N. E. 355; Foster v. Boston (1913) 215 Mass. 31, 102 N. E. 359; Connally v. Lyons (1891) 82 Tex. 664, 21 Am. St. Rep. 935, 18 S. W. 799; Smith v. Anderson (1880) L. R. 15 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 247, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 39, 43 L. T. N. S. 329, 29 Week. Rep. 21.

However, for many purposes, perhaps, it is not technically accurate to describe trusts such as are under consideration in this annotation either as partnerships, joint stock companies, or strict trusts. This is illustrated by some of the cases hereinafter set out and quoted, among which might be specifically mentioned, Re Associated Trust (1914) 222 Fed. 1012 (infra, III. b, 2). In fact as aptly stated by Wrightington in § 13 of his book on Unincorporated Associations, some of the associations organized under trust deeds "combine the elements of both partnership and trust, while others are essentially trusts, and not partnerships." Consequently it is frequently a difficult problem to determine whether a common-law business trust for legal purposes is of partnership character or is to be regarded as a pure trust. Then, of course, arises the practical question as to what distinguishes a business trust in the nature of a partnership from a strict trust formed to carry on a business enterprise.

Upon the latter phase of the general question it has been said that the distinction between business trusts which are regarded as partnerships and those which are regarded as ordinary trusts turns upon the provisions of the trust agreement or declaration, those trusts where the shareholders are given substantial control of the management of the trust property being regarded as partnerships, and those where the shareholders have no such control being regarded as an ordinary trust the same as the usual testamentary trust. Re Associated Trust (Fed.) supra. To the same effect is Mayo v. Moritz (1890) 151 Mass. 481, 24 N. E. 1083.

And in Williams v. Milton (1913) 215 Mass. 1, 102 N. E. 355, the court expressly pointed out the distinction between the two classes of cases by contrasting Hoadley v. Essex County (1870) 105 Mass. 519, supra, and similar cases with Mayo v. Moritz (Mass.) supra, saying that "in the former cases the certificate holders are associated together by the terms of the 'trust' and are the principals, whose instructions are to be obeyed by their agent [trustee], who, for their convenience, hold the legal title to their property; the property is their property, they are the masters; while in Mayo v. Moritz, on the other hand, there is no association between the certificate holders, the property is the property of the trustees and the trustees are the masters. All that the certificate holders in Mayo v. Moritz had was a right to have the property managed by the trustees for their benefit. They had no right to manage it themselves, nor to instruct the trustees how to manage it for them." Applying this rule it was further said: "In the Boston Personal Property Trust the property is the property of the trustees, to be managed for the benefit of the certificate holders. There is no association of or among the certificate holders. The rights of the certificate holders are limited to each receiving his share of the income of the trust investments during the continuance of the trust and his share of the corpus when the trust comes to an end. It is in every respect an investment trust, and nothing more.”

Again in Frost v. Thompson (1914) 219 Mass. 360, 106 N. E. 1009, the court said: “A declaration of trust or other instrument providing for the holding of property by trustees for the benefit of the owners of assignable certificates representing the beneficial interest in the property may create a trust or it may create a partnership. Whether it is one or the other depends upon the way in which the trustees are to conduct the affairs committed to their charge. If they act as principals and are free from the control of the certificate holders, a trust is created; but if they are subject to the control of the certificate holders, it is a partnership. . . . Tested by the principles there [referring to Williams v. Milton (Mass.) supra] laid down, the Buena Vista Fruit Company is a voluntary association organized under two instruments, one called a ‘declaration of trust’ and the other ‘by-laws.’ These two instruments provide that the shareholders representing two thirds in value of outstanding shares have power to remove either or all of the trustees at any time, without assigning any cause, and to appoint others to fill the vacancy; to terminate the trust at any time earlier than that limited for its duration in the declaration of trust, and to terminate it by requiring conveyance of the property to other trustees upon new trusts, or to a corporation. A majority of the shareholders at any time by vote may amend the declaration of trust. The by-laws may be ‘altered, amended, or repealed’ by vote of the majority of the shareholders. . . . These provisions demonstrate that this association is a partnership, and not a trust.”

Rep. 21, the distinction between pure trusts and business trusts in the nature of partnerships or joint stock companies where the members are associated in business and retain and exercise control of the trustees, and either directly or indirectly over the business, is pointed out with some clearness by Lord Justices James, Brett, and Cotton.

In connection with the preceding cases it is of interest that Wrightington in “Unincorporated Associations,” § 14, in answering the question, How much control by the beneficiaries over the trustee is needed to change a trust into a partnership? arrived at the seemingly logical conclusion that the power to change trustees at stated intervals or to fill vacancies as they occur should not be deemed sufficient to transfer such proprietorship to the shareholders as would make the trust a partnership, but that the power to remove at any time without cause and to fill vacancies as was the case in Frost v. Thompson (Mass.) supra, was totally different, since in such a case the trustee would not be independent. And in fact in Illinois it has been held that the fact that the shareholders in a real estate trust are empowered to remove and appoint trustees and direct the action of the existing trustees does not affect its character as a trust or the legal title of the trustees to the trust real estate, especially when no attempt has been made to exercise such reserve powers, the mere existence of unexercised power not affecting the trustees’ legal title. Hart v. Seymour (1893) 147 Ill. 598, 35 N. E. 246.

But the fact that the trustees of a real estate trust are limited to the contracting of debts to the value of the trust property, and that the trust agreement exempts the certificate holders from personal liability for debts, does not prevent the relation of such holders from being that of partners. Williams v. Boston (1911) 208 Mass. 497, 94 N. E. 808 (it was further held in this case that the certificate holders were not taxable as cestuis que trust—see case as set out infra, III. b, 3). And see Hussey v. Arnold

(1904) 185 Mass. 202, 70 N. E. 87. In the Williams Case the court said that "the limitations upon the power and liability of individual members and the attempt to avail themselves of many of the privileges of stockholders in corporations relate more to details and to the machinery of management than to the substantive purposes of the enterprise."

Of course it is what the parties do, and not what they say, that is decisive in determining the character of the trust. See Williams v. Boston (Mass.) supra, as set out infra, III. b, 3; and Williams v. Milton (1913) 215 Mass. 1, 102 N. E. 355 (holding that a declaration in the trust agreement was not conclusive. The latter case was followed and relied upon in Foster v. Boston (1913) 215 Mass. 31, 102 N. E. 359). In Williams v. Milton (Mass.) supra, the court in this connection said: "We have not alluded to the declaration in the indenture of trust here in question, that it was the intention of the parties to it to create a [strict] trust, and not a partnership [in the form of a business trust]. It is what the parties did that is decisive. If there had been doubt as to what they did, what they intended to do would have been a matter entitled to some consideration in determining what they did."

2. Under Bankruptcy Act.

In Re Associated Trust (1914) 222 Fed. 1012, a "Massachusetts real estate trust" created by an instrument giving the shareholders power to elect the trustee and amend the declaration and terminate the trust by a three-fourths vote was held to be an "unincorporated company" within the meaning of the provisions of the Federal Bankruptcy Act of 1898, which declare who may be declared bankrupt. In this connection the court said: "The character of the organization is to be gauged rather by the powers of the certificate holders, than by the extent to which those powers have as yet been exercised. The analogy between the respondent organization and a corporation is apparent. The certificate holders clearly possess many of the most characteristic powers of stockholders. If the expression 'unincorporated company' in the Bankruptcy Act does not describe such an organization as the respondent, it is difficult to see what meaning can be given to those words. To hold the respondent a partnership within the Bankruptcy Act would lead to results never contemplated by anybody, and would impose upon the certificate holders obligations which neither they nor the creditors of the trust supposed existed. It would be a very unjust result. To hold that the respondent is not an organization, and is nothing more than a strict trust, is almost as far from the fact as to hold it to be a partnership. These certificate holders voluntarily united into a business organization, in which they invested their money under a contract by which they acquired certain individual rights against the trustee, and certain other rights to be exercised by joint action of all the certificate holders. 'Unincorporated company' seems to me exactly to describe what the respondent is."

3. For purposes of taxation.

It has been held that the collective body known as the "Adams Express Company," which was constituted by written articles of association without reference to any statute or franchise, and whereby its capital was divided into transferable shares, its business was conducted by a board of managers, and all its property was vested in the exclusive possession of trustees, was not taxable under a New York statute subjecting to taxation the corporate stock of "all moneyed or stock corporations deriving an income or profit from their capital or otherwise." Hoey v. Coleman (1891) 46 Fed. 221. In this case the court first held that the association under consideration was not a corporation in legal definition, and then decided that the term "corporation" as used in the statute could not be interpreted to embrace "partnerships which masquerade as corporations." In reaching the conclusion that the association was not a legal corporation, the court said: "It is a quasi corporation as between the members by their voluntary contract. But the responsibility of the members for the obligations of the company is not limited, and each is liable for the whole. As to third persons, it is a partnership, having many of the characteristics of a corporation, but none of those immunities which are conferred by the state exclusively upon corporations, either by special charter or general laws. Inasmuch as a corporation is always created by a franchise, while this company is self-constituted, and a corporation is only known to the law as a legal entity, in which the members have lost their individuality, while this company is known to the law only as an aggregation of individuals, whose identity and personal responsibility are unchanged, the proposition that the Adams Express Company is not a corporation in legal definition is too self-evident for discussion."

Nor is the stock of a voluntary manufacturing association organized as a common-law trust, taxable as "stocks in a moneyed corporation" under Massachusetts Gen. Stat. chap. 11, § 4, it being impossible for an association not organized under statutory law to be regarded as a corporation. Hoadley v. Essex County (1870) 105 Mass. 519.

And upon similar reasoning it has also been held that the Adams Express Company, a New York common-law association, was not subject to taxation under Pennsylvania statutes imposing an annual tax upon the corporate stock of all companies "incorporated" by or under any law of the state of Pennsylvania and of every company "incorporated" by any other state and doing business in the state of Pennsylvania. Gregg v. Sanford (1895) 12 C. C. A. 525, 28 U. S. App. 313, 65 Fed. 151. In State v. Adams Exp. Co. (1895) 3 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 326, the Gregg Case was said to have been "not half considered" and to be "entitled to no consideration as a guide."

Likewise a common-law real estate trust is not a corporation, joint stock company, or association within the meaning of the Federal Corporation Tax Act of 1909. Thus, in Eliot v.

Freeman (1911) 220 U. S. 178, 55 L. ed. 424, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 360, real estate trusts created by deed for the buying, holding, and selling of lands and buildings for the benefit of the shareholders, which did not derive any benefit from and were not organized under any statute, were held not subject to the tax imposed by the Federal Excise Act of 1909 upon the doing of business by corporations, joint stock companies, or associations "now or hereafter organized under the laws of the United States or of any state or territory," Mr. Justice Day maintaining for the court that the tax in question was imposed upon doing business in a corporate or quasi corporate capacity, i. e., with the facility or advantage of corporate organization under statutes giving them certain powers and qualifications, and that trusts of the character under consideration could "hardly be said to be organized within the ordinary meaning of that term," and that "it [one of the two trusts under consideration] certainly is not organized under statutory laws as corporations are." He summarized as follows: "Entertaining the view that it was the intention of Congress to embrace within the Corporation Tax Statute only such corporations and joint stock companies as are organized under some statute, or derive from that source some quality or benefit not existing at common law, we are of opinion that the real estate trusts involved in these two cases are not within the terms of the act." And as a matter of fact it has been held that a statute which attempts to impose a strict excise tax, i. e., a tax on some franchise permitting the doing of business, is unconstitutional so far as it is made to apply to a common-law business trust in which the interest of each member may be transferred without the special assent of the other members. Gleason v. McKay (1883) 134 Mass. 419.

163 C. C. A. 131, 250 Fed. 817, it was held that the trustees of a common-law realty trust under which they were to collect the rents and income of the trust property, and to pay the same over to the holders of trust certificates in proportion to the amount of such certificates held by them, with the right to apply any funds for the repair or development of the property held by them, or the acquisition of more property, the certificate holders, by the terms of the trust, having no partnership interest in or control over the fund, were not an "association" within the meaning of § II. G (a) of the Federal Income Tax Act of October 3, 1913, which imposed a tax upon the income of every corporation, joint stock company, or association "no matter how created or organized," so that the income received by the trustees was not taxable in their hands without any deductions with respect to dividends received from a corporation that itself paid an income tax. In reaching this conclusion Mr. Justice Holmes, in delivering the opinion of the court, said that the declaration of trust on its face was an ordinary real estate trust of the kind familiar in Massachusetts, that in that state it undoubtedly would be held to create a trust, and nothing more, and that the trust in question would not fall under any familiar conception of a joint stock association, whether formed under a statute or not; and continued as follows: "If we assume that the words, 'no matter how created or organized,' apply to 'association' . . . still it would be a wide departure from normal usage to call the beneficiaries here a joint stock association when they are admitted not to be partners in any sense, and when they have no joint action or interest and no control over the fund. On the other hand, the trustees by themselves cannot be a joint stock association within the meaning of the act, unless all trustees with discretionary powers are such, and the special provision for trustees in D [provides that trustees and associations acting in a fiduciary capacity have the exemption that individual stockholders have from taxation upon dividends of a corporation that itself pays an income tax] is to be made meaningless. We perceive no ground for grouping the two—beneficiaries and trustees—together, in order to turn them into an association by uniting their contrasted functions and powers, although they are in no proper sense associated. It seems to be an unnatural perversion of a well-known institution of the law." In the circuit court of appeals (163 C. C. A. 131) the decision was upon the theory that, since the powers of the trustees resembled those of the directors of a corporation, and as the income could not be regarded as the individual property of the beneficiaries until received by them, it must be regarded as income accruing to a group or body of individuals collectively, so as to render them in effect an association within the meaning of the act; but the Supreme Court in reversing that decision declared that it was immaterial whether the individual receipt holders were entitled to the income of the fund subject to an unexercised power in the trustees, in their reasonable discretion, to divert it to the improvement of the capital, or whether they are not entitled to the income as such until they receive it.

On the other hand some tax statutes have been held broad enough to include common-law business trusts under terms ordinarily applicable to companies or associations formed under statutes. Thus, in the reported case (MALLEY v. BOWDITCH, ante, 608) it was held that certificates of shares issued by a manufacturing company organized in the form of a common-law trust and which derived none of its rights, benefits, or qualifications from any statute, were within the meaning of and taxable under § 5, schedule A, of the War Tax Law of October 22, 1914, which imposed a stamp tax on each $100 of "certificates of stock" issued by any "association," "company," or "corporation." This was upon the theory that the phrase "certificates of stock," as used in the act, disclosed no intention to exclude common-law associations, but rather evidenced a legislative purpose to impose the tax on certificates of stock as muniments of title; and that while the court regarded the term "association" as broad enough to include the trust in question, if there was any doubt, there was "no ground for serious doubt of the applicability of the term 'company' used in the statute and made a part of the name and description of those persons who are to conduct the manufacturing business of the organization." It was further held in this case that the statute was not invalid in its application on the theory that it was inapplicable to other associations which did not issue certificates of stock, since as the tax was merely on muniments of title, the statute would only apply to associations which had issued muniments of title. It should also be remembered that the court expressly distinguished the case from Eliot v. Freeman (1911) 220 U. S. 178, 55 L. ed. 424, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 360, supra, on the ground that the decision in that case turned upon the point that the tax was imposed upon doing business in a corporate or quasi corporate capacity, whereas in the present case it was merely a stamp tax on certificates of stock.

And in Opinion of Justices (1908) 196 Mass. 603, 85 N. E. 545, it was held by a court divided four to three that it was within the power of the Massachusetts legislature under a constitutional provision giving it power and authority to impose and levy reasonable duties and excises upon any "product, goods, wares, merchandise, and commodities whatsoever . . . within the commonwealth," to enact an excise tax upon sales of shares or certificates of stock in a voluntary trust association, the majority of the court maintaining that such a sale was within the meaning of the term "commodity" as used in the provision. However, it was also held in this case that a constitutional provision authorizing the legislature to impose proportional assessments and taxes did not grant power to impose a tax on sales of shares or certificates of stock in a business trust.

In Massachusetts it has been held that the holders of transferable certificates in a common-law real estate business trust, although not personally liable for debts, were partners within the meaning of Massachusetts Rev. Laws, chap. 12, § 27 (Stat. 1909, chap. 490, pt. 1, § 27), relating to the joint taxation of partners under the partnership name in the place where the partnership business is carried on, and were not to be treated merely as cestuis que trust, taxable in the different places where they resided, under § 23, chap. 5, of the act which provided that personal property held in trust for the payment of income to the beneficiary shall be assessed to the trustee in the place where such beneficiary lives, etc. Williams v. Boston (1911) 208 Mass. 497, 94 N. E. 808. The court said that "there are reasons of policy why the members should be held to be partners within the meaning of this section (27), for as such trusts are not regulated by statute, and no returns are required of them, interests in them held by nonresidents of the city or town where their business is conducted would be liable to escape taxation unless the property is taxed in the firm name. However, the contrary has been held where the business trust in question is a pure trust, as, for example, where the trust property is the property of the trustees, to be managed by them, and not by or under the direction of the certificate holders, whose rights are limited to each receiving his share of the income during continuation of the trust and of the corpus upon termination of the trust. Williams v. Milton (1913) 215 Mass. 1, 102 N. E. 355; Foster v. Boston (1913) 215 Mass. 31, 102 N. E. 359.

In Bartlett v. Gill (1915) 221 Fed. 476, affirmed in (1915) 140 C. C. A. 405, 224 Fed. 927, it was held that shares in real estate and personal property trusts were taxable under War Rev. Act June 13, 1898, chap. 448, § 29 (30 Stat. at L. 464), which provided that any person having any trust as administrator, executor, or trustee in "legacies or distributive shares arising from personal property," only so far as such shares actually represented personal property, and

In Kinney v. Treasurer (Kinney v. Stevens) (1911) 207 Mass. 368, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 784, 93 N. E. 586, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 902, it was held that a note held by a nonresident but secured by a certificate for shares in a Massachusetts real estate trust was subject to a succession tax under Mass. Stat. 1907, chap. 563, § 1, as amended by Stat. 1909, chap. 268, and chap. 527, § 1, as property within the jurisdiction of the commonwealth, although the testator held only an equitable interest in the real estate, an interest in which was represented by the certificate. So, in Peabody v. Treasurer (1913) 215 Mass. 129, 102 N. E. 435, it was held that shares of stock in Massachusetts real estate trusts were interests in property within the jurisdiction of the commonwealth and subject to an inheritance tax under the statute involved in the Kinney Case. Rugg, Ch. J., said: "It is not necessary to analyze with greater nicety the precise character of the property interest of a shareholder under each of the trusts. It is true of all of them that their rights are equitable interests in tangible property within the commonwealth. While the legal title is in the trustees their ownership is fiduciary, and the certificate holders are the ultimate proprietors of the property, which is held and managed for their ultimate benefit, and which must be divided among them at the termination of the trust. Their rights constitute not choses in action, but a substantial property right. In this respect the case is indistinguishable in principle from shareholders in a domestic corporation."

In Kennedy v. Hodges (1913) 215 Mass. 112, 102 N. E. 432, shares in a real estate trust, the home office of which was in Massachusetts, where alone the shares were transferable, were held to constitute property found within the commonwealth under a statute (Mass. Rev. Laws, chap. 143, § 1) providing that when administration is taken in the commonwealth on the estate of a nonresident, "his estate found here" should be administered here.

Where the trust agreement provides that the legal title to the trust real estate shall vest in the trustee, who has power to sell and convey the same and divide the proceeds among the members, and there is no provision for division at any time of the land itself among the members, it has been held that the real property held by the trustees must, for the purposes of the trust, be regarded as personal property so that the wife of a deceased member could not claim dower therein. Mallory v. Russell (1887) 71 Iowa, 63, 60 Am. Rep. 776, 32 N. W. 102.

So, it has been held that where a common-law association is formed for the purchase of certain real estate, the title to be in a trustee and the interest of each member to be determined according to the number of shares which he holds and which can change hands only by transfer on the books of the association, the real estate of the association must be regarded as personal property so that the interest of a member cannot be sold under execution as real estate. Pittsburg Wagon Works' Estate (1903) 204 Pa. 432, 54 Atl. 316.

In Gardiner v. Gardiner (1912) 212 Mass. 508, 99 N. E. 171, where a common-law business trust had outstanding both preferred and common stock, and was in arrears of dividends, and additional shares of preferred stock were issued to cover the arrears, and such stock recited that it was in purchase of such arrears, it was held that the substance rather than the technical form must be given consideration, and, therefore, since there was no fund which could be designated either as profits, undivided earnings, or accumulated surplus sufficient to cover the arrearage, the new issue must be regarded as an additional capital of the trust association rather than income, so that a life beneficiary of a stockholder was only entitled to the income therefrom.

In the absence of provision expressly limiting the personal liability of the members of a business trust, it seems that their liability to bona fide trust creditors is unlimited. For instance, in Phillips v. Blatchford (1884) 137 Mass. 510, Holmes, J., in discussing the legality of a so-called "Massachusetts trust" said that as to shareholders, if they choose to purchase stock in such an enterprise "with unlimited personal liability," it is their own lookout. And see also Hoev v. Coleman (1891) 46 Fed. 221, as quoted supra, III. b, 3.

As to provisions in trust agreements and contracts with trustees expressly limiting liability, see supra, II. c.

Of course where a trustee of a common-law business trust has incurred an obligation in conducting the trust, the obligee may reach the trust estate. Frost v. Thompson (1914) 219 Mass. 360, 106 N. E. 1009. However, to do this the creditor must bring himself within the rule. Ibid. In this case it was held that the alleged creditor of the trust did not bring himself within the rule, for the reason that it plainly appeared that the note upon which the claim was founded was not executed in accordance with the authority conferred upon the trustees by the declaration of the trust.

And see Willis v. Greiner (1894) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 26 S. W. 858, as set out in the following subdivision.

V. Power of officers or shareholders to sell trust lands.

As regards the rights and powers of the certificate or shareholders or the officers of an unincorporated trust association owning real estate, it has been held that where the trust is in the form of a joint stock association they have no power to bind the association by a contract to sell such property at a stipulated price unless such power has been granted them, especially where the association agreement vests the title in the association trustees, who are empowered to make conveyance of the same under the direction of the stockholders. Willis v. Greiner (1894) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 26 S. W. 858. In this case the president and secretary of the association attempted to make a contract to deliver deeds to certain lands owned by the association to a third person at a stipulated price, and it was held that such an agreement would not support an action by such person for commissions for the sale of such lots.

VI. Liability of trustees for negligence.

In accordance with the general rule of negligence it has been held that the trustees of a business trust association are civilly liable to one injured by their negligent management of the trust property. Falardeau v. Boston Art Students' Asso. (1903) 182 Mass. 405, 65 N. E. 797. G. J. C.

CITY OF NEW YORK, Respt.

(219 N. Y. 150, 114 N. E. 73.)

Highway — right to require license for vault beneath.

1. A municipal corporation has authority in the regulation and supervision of its streets to require a license and exact a fee from the owner of the fee of the street as a condition to the construction by him of vaults beneath the surface of the highway.

Appeal — review of facts.

2. The New York court of appeals cannot review a finding of fact by the appellate division of the supreme court which is supported by the evidence, although it reverses the findings of the special term.

[See 2 R. C. L. 208.]

Highway — title — Dutch grant — effect.

3. The rule of the Dutch law, under which a grant was made of land on Manhattan island by representatives of the Dutch government, that all lands used for streets shall revert in the government, does not operate if the streets were opened after the island had passed to the English.

4. A dedication of land for a highway in 1733 was valid under the common law.

[See 8 R. C. L. 881.]

— title to fee.

5. The fee of land dedicated for a highway remains under the common law in the ones making the dedication.

[See 8 R. C. L. 906.]

Eminent domain — title to fee.

6. When the language and intent of a statute do not otherwise require, the fee to land appropriated for the use of a public highway will remain in the owner.

Highway — proportioning fee to square feet occupied — tax.

7. That the amount of a fee to be paid for a license to construct a vault beneath a highway is calculated upon the number of square feet occupied by the vault does not make the payment a tax or assessment for revenue.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing a judgment of a Special Term for New York County, Part IV. (Greenbaum, J.), in their favor, and dismissing the complaint on the merits in an action brought to restrain defendant from claiming any estate in, or interfering with vaults or vault spaces under, the surface of the street connected with the premises of plaintiffs. Affirmed.

The material facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. Hampden Dougherty, for appellants:

The findings of the appellate division so far as they conflict with those of the special term are without any evidence whatever to sustain them, and are unwarranted in law.

Assuming that during Dutch occupancy streets or roads might have been opened without compensation through certain lands, the right of government to open streets without compensation terminated upon the surrender to the English, or, in any event, upon the final treaty of cession in 1674, and became altogether nonexistent. No such right was ever transferred to the English Crown or now inheres in the city of New York.

The finding that Cortlandt street must be presumed to have been opened under the Colonial Statute of October 1, 1691, is without any evidence to support it, and not in accordance with law.

The "presumption" in which the appellate division erroneously indulged, that the original street had been opened under the Act of 1691, has obviously no application to the 5-foot strip.

Mott v. Eno and Bradley v. Crane, supra.

In providing that before a permit for the use of vault space shall be issued, the same kind and rate of charge shall be made irrespective of where the fee is, the ordinances not only deprive the fee owner of his property in the street without due process of law, but also deny to him the equal protection of the laws.

The city has no right to demand compensation from the owner of the fee of the street for the use of the vault space.

If the city owns the bed of Cortlandt street, then unquestionably it has the right to charge anything it sees fit for the privilege of constructing vaults.

If the abutting proprietor owns the fee he cannot construct a vault without the permission of the municipal authorities and subject to such terms and conditions as they may impose. And such a permit is subject to revocation at any time when the public necessities require it.

Collin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs seek in this action in equity a judgment perpetually restraining the defendant from claiming any estate in, or interfering with vaults or vault spaces under, the surface of the northerly half of Cortlandt street in the city of New York connected with the premises of the plaintiffs at the northwest corner of Broadway and Cortlandt street. The special term awarded the judgment sought by the plaintiffs, which the appellate division reversed, and dismissed the complaint on the merits.

The immediate inducement of the action was the threat of the defendant that unless the plaintiffs procured from and paid the defendant for a permit for the vault spaces, it would deprive the plaintiffs and their tenants of the use of them. The plaintiffs assert that the threatened action is unlawful because they own in fee simple the bed of the part of Cortlandt street in which the vault spaces are.

The appellate division and the special term are in disagreement in regard to certain of the cardinal facts. There are, however, facts found by the special term which the appellate division did not reverse. Of them are the following: The source of the title of the plaintiffs to their premises and of the claimed fee in the land of the street was a grant, of April 25, 1644, by a ground brief of Director General Kieft in behalf of the States General of the United Netherlands, to Jan Jansen Damen. Cortlandt street did not then exist. On or about May 25, 1733, the then owners of the land in question, and the owners of other lands, filed with the common council of the city of New York their declaration and petition, which recited that they were possessed of certain parcels of land on the west side of Broadway and running from thence to Hudson river, and for the improvement of them they and "others concerned in the said lands by mutual consent and agreement have laid and staked out a certain new street through the said lands from the Broadway aforesaid to Hudson river of 40 foot in breadth and called the name thereof Cortlandt street," and stated that they "therefore hereby declare and make known that the said new street so laid out of 40 foot English measure in breadth through the lands aforesaid and called Cortlandt street shall forever remain, continue, and be a Publick Street and Highway in like manner as the other Publick Streets of this City now are or lawfully ought to be," and prayed that "their Declaration and Petition may be recorded in the Record of the Common Council of this Corporation." The common council granted the petition. In 1788 Cortlandt street was widened, under the Laws of 1784, chapter 56, 10 feet, by the addition of 5 feet on each side. The plaintiffs or their predecessors in title about the year 1859 constructed, and there have since then existed, vaults under the beds of Cortlandt street and Broadway contiguous to the said premises at the corner of those streets. Municipal ordinances in force at the time of the construction forbade, under a penalty, the construction of a vault in any of the streets of the city without the written municipal permission and the payment of a sum for each square foot of vault space occupied. No permission or payment for the vaults has at any time existed. Ordinances of a cognate nature have existed at all times since 1859. In 1912 the defendant first learned of the extent of the vaults, and the proper municipal authority demanded of the plaintiffs that they obtain a permit and make the required payment, and threatened, in case of their default, to wall up the vaults. Other findings will be referred to as they become relevant.

The plaintiffs assert that Jan Jansen Damen was, through the ground brief, vested by the Dutch sovereignty with the fee of the 40 feet of the lands which subsequently were occupied by the street, which, transmitted to his successors in title by mesne grants, did not pass from them in 1733 by virtue of the Roman-Dutch law, because the Roman-Dutch law had ceased to exist as to it, or by virtue of the declaration and petition of 1733, and by mesne conveyances such fee is now in the plaintiffs; and that the defendant acquired in 1788 in the proceeding under the Statute of 1784 an easement only in the 10 feet added to the width of the street. The defendant asserts that the sovereign grant to Damen, in its effect and extent, was defined by the Roman-Dutch law, under which sovereignty was revested with the fee of lands granted by it in private ownership and subsequently appropriated for a public street or highway; that such sovereign right of revestment was property and was transferred, under the capitulation articles of 1664, the Treaty of Breda of 1667 and the Treaty of Westminster of 1674, to the British Crown and thence, through royal grant and charters, passed to the defendant, vesting in it the fee of the original 40 feet; and further, that the action of the owners, assuming that the fee was in them, and the common council in 1733, was not a dedication of a street, and was the instituting of a proceeding under a colonial act of 1691 through which the defendant obtained the fee to the 40 feet; that the city became vested with the fee of the 5 feet appropriated in widening the street upon its northerly side by virtue of the Authorizing Statute of 1784.

The special term by its findings of fact and conclusions of law sustained the assertions of the plaintiffs. The appellate division, by the findings of fact as determined by it, and legal conclusions based upon them, sustained the assertions of the defendant, and reversed any finding of fact made by the special term inconsistent with the findings made by it. In case the new findings of fact made by the appellate division have support in the evidence, we must, inasmuch as its legal conclusions are upheld by the facts as found, affirm its decision. Union Trust Co. v. Oliver, 214 N. Y. 517, 522, 108 N. E. 809.

We take up first the question, Did the executory right in the Dutch sovereignty of being revested with the fee of lands as and when devoted to a street pass to the British sovereignty? It is neither necessary nor useful to attempt to determine or discuss whether the title of the British Crown to the territory of New Netherlands arose from discovery or conquest, or the cognate question whether the civil law was in force in the province de jure or merely de facto: "The claim of the Dutch was always contested by the English; not because they questioned the title given by discovery, but because they insisted on being themselves the rightful claimants under that title. Their pretensions were finally decided by the sword." Johnson v. M'Intosh, 8 Wheat. 543, 576, 5 L. ed. 681, 689. Historical research has not weakened the accuracy of the statement of Chief Justice Marshall. We assume, for the purposes of this case, that at the time of the execution and delivery of the ground brief to Damen in 1644 the Roman-Dutch law was in force in New Netherlands, that the grant by the ground brief was with reference to it, and the correlative rights of the Dutch government and the grantee in relation to the grant were controlled by it, and that the grantee was vested with the fee, subject to such limitations or servitudes as it and the ground brief affixed.

The Roman-Dutch law prevailed in the New Netherlands at the time of the sovereign grant to Damen. The Roman or civil law was its basis, but the government of the United Netherlands had through their enactments and customs incorporated in it provisions of their own. A rule of it was that every sovereign grant was subject to the reversion in the sovereignty of the absolute title to any part of the granted lands which became a public highway. Dunham v. Williams, 37 N. Y. 251. By virtue of it, the Dutch sovereignty, from the time of the grant to the time it withdrew from and surrendered to Great Britain the New Netherlands, would have become, as the representative of the people within its jurisdiction, the owner of the land of Cortlandt street, if appropriated for the street within that time. Throughout that period the title of Damen and of his successors was subject to such regal prerogative. It was a prerogative, however, which the Roman-Dutch law affixed to the Dutch sovereignty, which depended upon, and which was enforceable only through, that law. The common law of England knew naught of it, had no recognition for it, or no remedy through which it might be grasped or enforced. The common law of England ruled, generally speaking, that, apart from any statutory provisions, the owner of the land adjoining a highway, or the lord of the manor, is owner also of the soil of one half of the highway, and the owner of the soil of a highway "has right to all above and underground, except only the right of passage for the King and his people," and may exercise all rights of ownership not inconsistent with the public right of passage. Goodtitle ex dem. Chester v. Alker, 1 Burr. 138, 97 Eng. Reprint, 231, 17 Eng. Rul. Cas. 549, 1 Ld. Kenyon, 427; St. Mary, Newington, v. Jacobs, L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 47. The executory prerogatives, privileges, and rights, which by virtue of the Roman-Dutch law inhered in the Dutch sovereignty and which were foreign to the British sovereignty and its common law, did not pass, under the capitulation articles and treaties, to the British Crown or its representative, the Duke of York. The sovereignty of the Dutch was not merged in that of Great Britain. It withdrew from and became extinct in the territory of New Netherlands. It surrendered to the British Crown the public territorial possessions and estate. It did not transfer to the British Crown the Roman-Dutch law or the rights incorporate in the government of the Dutch by virtue of that law to seize, sequester, or escheat any part of or interest in the lands granted by it. The reign of the Roman-Dutch law expired in New Netherlands (except as left applicable by the capitulation articles and treaties to the private rights of the Dutch inhabitants), and with it expired the servitude, dependent upon and enforceable only through it, in the lands granted to Damen. Executory sovereign rights springing from that law and enforceable only through it ceased to exist as to the surrendered territory, and the British Crown had such prerogatives or rights in relation to it as the common law of England, modified, perhaps, by the stipulations of the surrender, gave it. The property right in the Dutch government to a reversion of the title to so much of the lands granted to Damen as became a public street or highway was not a property right in the realm of the common law of England. The common law did not recognize nor grasp nor uphold

it. The British Crown had not the right to assert a title to Cortlandt street, even as it obviously would not have had the right to assert title to the lands granted to Damen through sequestration or escheat for a cause justifying under the Roman-Dutch law, but unknown to the English law. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. McGlinn, 114 U. S. 542, 546, 29 L. ed. 270, 271, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1005. Such conclusion is not inconsistent with our decision in Dunham v. Williams, 37 N. Y. 251, 253, or our views in other cases harmonizing with that decision. In Dunham v. Williams, and in those other cases, the street or highway under consideration was laid out prior to 1664, as we have in each case expressly and carefully stated. The executory sovereign right had, therefore, through the rule of the Roman-Dutch law, become executed and ripened into an absolute title and property. That law had exhausted its office and had created that which the common law recognized as property. The Dutch government owned the land of the street or highway as it owned the vacant or ungranted lands of the province,—an ownership and a property cognizable and regulated by the common law of England. The ownership of the Dutch government in the land of a street or highway was the same as it would have been had its grantee or a successor in his title conveyed to it those lands. Thus, in Dunham v. Williams we said: "The highway having been laid out long prior to the capitulation, the title of the government to the roadbed was absolute." In Kane v. New York Elev. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 164, 11 L.R.A. 640, 26 N. E. 278, the fact was the same. In Paige v. Schenectady R. Co. 178 N. Y. 102, 110, 70 N. E. 213, the defendant claimed that Washington avenue was a Dutch street and the title to it, therefore, in the public. We denied the claim, and said: "Obviously, when Washington avenue became a public highway, the colony of New York was governed by the English law, under which the sovereign did not own the fee to the streets or highways, but only an easement upon the land over which they extended. Under the common law of England, the title to the land in a street or highway was not in the King, but in the lord of the manor, subject only to the easement of the public to a way over it." We conclude that the fee of the lands as and when devoted to the street did not pass to the British Crown.

We take up next the finding of the appellate division that under the declaration and petition of 1733 the predecessors of the defendant here took the necessary proceedings, under the Colonial Act of 1691, to lay out Cortlandt street as a public highway, and that thereunder it acquired the fee of the 40 feet.

The finding is, and must be, based, under the record, exclusively upon the contents of the declaration and petition and the language of the act. The contents of the declaration and petition and the granting of the petition have already been stated. The Colonial Act (Laws 1691, chap. 18) in effect recited that it was necessary for traffic and commerce "that buildings streets lanes wharfs docks and alleys" be regulated with uniformity for public accommodation, and "that all impediments and obstructions that may retard so necessary a work may be removed," and enacted that the municipal authorities might at their pleasure appoint supervisors of those public conveniences to act according to such rules as they should establish, and might obstruct any building that would narrow a street, and if in the laying out for the future of any such convenience "they doe take any persons Grounds they are to give notice to the Owners or Partyes interested in the ground to be so taken," and may treat and agree with the owners or parties "to the end that reasonable satisfaction may be given for all such ground as shall be taken and employed for the uses aforesaid," or in default of agreeing may cause the impaneling of a jury to assess "such Damages and recompense as they shall judge fit to be awarded to the owners and others interested according to their severall and respective Interests and Estates Of any such ground or any part thereof for their respective interests and Estates in the same as by the said Mayor Aldermen and Common Council shall be adjudged fitt to be converted to the purposes aforesaid." The language of the act does not indicate or suggest that the declaration and petition had any relation to it. It clearly contemplates a proceeding in invitum in which the land to be appropriated for the public use was to be taken, not accepted as petitioned by its owners, and was to be paid for pursuant to an amicable agreement between them and the municipality, or in default of such agreement, to an assessment by the jury. The contents of the declaration and petition do not indicate or suggest that it has any relation to the act. The land described by it is, in form, dedicated to the public for the purposes of a street through the declaration and petition and the order or resolution of the common council. In form, a street is created by dedication. In contravention of such conclusion, it is asserted that the common law with respect to dedication had not in 1733 been developed. The assertion is unsupported by and is <sup>-dedication-</sup><sub>date.</sub> contrary to judicial authority and the natural conclusions authorized by the history of the common law. The easement of a private right of way was frequently created under the common law as early as the fourteenth century. "The most elaborate and carefully worded of the private documents which have come down to us are those which create or regulate pasture rights and rights of way." 2 Pollock & M. History of English Law, p. 144. It is a clear and near step from a right of way to an individual to a right of way to the public. In Post v. Pearsall, 22 Wend. 425, 433, Chancellor Walworth stated: "Although at the time of the publication of the laws of William, the Conqueror, there were but four great roads in England called the King's highways, yet no one can doubt that there were, even at that time, innumerable thoroughfares, and many squares and open spaces, which had been dedicated to the use of the people at large, for passages and promenades; and the number since that time has probably increased an hundred fold. The law of dedication, therefore, which was applicable to thoroughfares, was properly applicable to market places and promenades, although they were not highways in the ordinary sense of the term." This general statement has a strong support in the authoritative statement: "Most highways have, or are deemed to have, originated from the owner's dedication of his land to the public for the purposes of passage and acceptance by the public of his gift, evidenced by their user of the way." 16 Laws of England (Halsbury) p. 12. Judicial authority upon the question is not lacking. In New Orleans v. United States, 10 Pet. 662, 9 L. ed. 573, it was held that land was dedicated to the public use in 1724, and the court said: "That property may be dedicated to public use is a well-established principle of the common law. It is founded in public convenience, and has been sanctioned by the experience of ages. The original dedication is proved by the maps in evidence, and by a public use of more than a century. These facts are conclusive." pp. 712-717. In 1713 an English court recognized the principle of dedication in the following opinion: "If a vill be erected, and a way laid out to it, if there be no other way but that to the vill, it is not material quo animo it was laid out, it shall be deemed a public way." Reg. v. Hornsey, 10 Mod. 150, 88 Eng. Reprint, 670. In 1732 it was likewise recognized in the two decisions in Rex v. Hudson, 2 Strange, 909, 93 Eng. Reprint, 935, and Lade v. Shepherd, 2

Strange, 1004, 93 Eng. Reprint, 997, in each of which the alleged dedication was many years prior to the rendering of the decision. We think the declaration and petition and the resolution or order of the common council conclusively established the dedication of the 40 feet to the public for the purposes of a public street. By the common law, in the act of dedication, the fee of the soil remained in the owners, but the use of the street was vested in the public. The owners parted with the use involved in the purposes of a street only. Barclay v. Howell, 6 Pet. 498, 8 L. ed. 477; Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. 431, 8 L. ed. 452. Our conclusion is that the defendant has not at any time held the fee to the original 40 feet of the street, and that the finding of the appellate division in relation thereto is not supported by the evidence.

We take up next the finding of the appellate division "that when the common council determined to lower the grade of Cortlandt street and to extend its width 5 feet on either side," pursuant to chapter 56 of the Laws of 1784, "the fee to the widened part of the street vested in the city of New York." This finding has not any support in the evidence. The Statute of 1784 recited, in effect, the destruction by fires "during the war" of a considerable part of the city, and that streets in such destroyed parts might be beneficially altered, and authorized, in effect, the city to appoint commissioners for the purpose of laying out the streets in such parts of the city under prescribed restrictions with the provision that where any owner deemed his lot injured he might apply to the city "to have the injury or damage so supposed to have been suffered, ascertained by appraisement," and appraisers "shall determine upon a full and equitable consideration and estimate of all the circumstances attending the alteration in the streets, as aforesaid, whether such lot or lots has or have been decreased or advanced in value by such alterations and to what amount," and contemplated payment to the owner of his damage or by him for the increased value. A proceeding under this statute effected the widening of the street. It does not appear from any finding or the proceeding as described that a fee was taken or sought. The statute, obviously, did not prescribe or require the taking of the fee to the land appropriated for the widening. An easement fulfilled its intentment and purposes and constituted the interest taken, because when the language and intent of a statute do not otherwise require, the fee to land appropriated for a public use will remain in the owner. Mott v. Eno, 181 N. Y. 346, 74 N. E. 229; Bradley v. Crane, 201 N. Y. 14, 94 N. E. 359. Our conclusion is that the defendant has not at any time held the fee to the land used in widening the street.

We take up now a question to which we have not as yet referred. The special term found, as facts, the extent of the occupied vault space; the demand of the defendant that the plaintiffs pay for the use of such space and take out a permit for its use; that the ordinances of the defendant, adopted in 1906 and existing at the time of the demand, forbade, under a penalty, the construction of a vault in a street without the written permission of the borough president having jurisdiction, and payment to him, after obtaining the permission, of "such sum as he shall certify in the said permission to be a just compensation to the city for such privilege, calculated at the rate of not less than 30 cents, nor more than $2 per foot, for each square foot of ground mentioned (in the application) as required for such vault," and that no permit to use any portion of said space was ever applied for by the plaintiffs or their predecessors in title. It held as conclusions of law that the plaintiffs had not the right to construct or maintain the vaults without obtaining the permit from the defendant, and the defendant had not the right to require the plaintiffs as a condition precedent to the use of any part of the said vault space to pay to it compensation fixed in the ordinance for the privilege of using said space. The judgment enjoined the defendant "from exacting from the plaintiffs the compensation fixed in the ordinance passed in the year 1906, and from interfering in any manner with plaintiffs' use of said vaults by reason of plaintiffs' failure or refusal to pay such compensation." The reasoning of the special term as expressed in the opinion was: The ordinance imposed a compensation based upon the number of square feet contained in the vault space and hence imposed not a mere license fee incident to the power to investigate the application and regulate the use of the street, but a tax measured in amount by the rental value of the vault; the charter of the defendant conferred upon the board of aldermen power to regulate merely, which does not include the power to tax. The appellate division made the finding of fact (Ryan v. Franklin, 199 N. Y. 347, 92 N. E. 673) "that no proof was adduced by the plaintiffs which tended to show that the rate of compensation which was prescribed by the ordinances for a vault permit was either excessive or unreasonable or in the nature of a tax or an assessment or a rental for the use of the land," and the conclusion of law "that, even assuming that the plaintiffs are the owners of the bed of Cortlandt street, still they have not the right to construct vaults thereunder without the permission of the municipal authorities. And as a condition of granting such permission, the municipal authorities are entitled to impose such terms and conditions as they may see fit to indemnify the city against the expenses which it would be subjected to in performing its duty of supervision and inspection and maintenance and repair."

There is not in the record any evidence supporting the finding of the special term that the defendant demanded of the plaintiffs that they pay for and take out a permit for the use of the space of land occupied by the vaults, or the conclusion that the ordinances provided or intended that plaintiffs should pay a tax upon or for such space. The language of the ordinances, upon which ultimately the finding is based, does not support the finding or conclusion. It expresses that the privilege applied and to be compensated for is that of constructing a vault in the street. That privilege has not any relation to the ownership or a renting of the land of the street or the use of the fee. It is a requisite preliminary to the construction of the vault, because the land constituting the street is subject to all the public uses, servitudes, and appropriations essential to or consistent with its status as a street, and, in the interest of public safety, convenience, security, and comfort, is, within all legitimate street uses, by statutory grant, under the control, regulation, and disposition of the public authorities, whose right to exact a payment or fee, in the process of regulation, for a permission or privilege of exercising in it a private possession or advantage, consistent with the public uses, is undoubted. Jorgensen v. Squires, 144 N. Y. 280, 39 N. E. 373; Buffalo v. Stevenson, 207 N. Y. 258, 100 N. E. 798; Deshong v. New York, 176 N. Y. 475, 68 N. E. 880; Lincoln Safe Deposit Co. v. New York, 210 N. Y. 34, L.R.A.1915F, 1009, 103 N. E. 768; New York v. Rice, 198 N. Y. 124, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 375, 91 N. E. 283. This right exists as to the owner of the land contiguous to the land of the street, irrespective of the ownership of the fee of the latter, because it is an element in the authorized regulation and supervision of the street.

The provisions of the ordinances do not contain any evidence that the payment required from the applicant for the permission to construct a vault is a tax, and not a fee or the permission. They require him to state in his written application "the number of square feet of ground which is required for the same, and the intended length and width of the same," and to pay as a just compensation for the privilege a sum "calculated at the rate of not less than 30 cents, nor more than $2, per foot for each square foot of ground mentioned as required for such vault." We cannot discern in the fact that the licensing officer is required, in exercising his discretion as to the amount, to make the basis of his computation the number of square feet of the space to be occupied, support for the legal conclusion that the pay-

—proportioning fee to square feet occupied—tax.

ment is a tax or assessment for revenue. It does not tend to prove that a computation so based would produce an unreasonable charge or fee for the expenses of the defendant resulting from the ascertainment as to whether or not the permission should be granted as requested and the regulation, supervision, and inspection incident to the construction and maintenance of the vault. The language carries no evidence that the ordinances apply only to vaults constructed in streets, the fee of which is in the defendant, or that the compensation is a rental.

The appellants take before us the further ground that the ordinances are unauthorized and unlawful because they apply alike to all streets irrespective of ownership and therein refuse to recognize the superior rights of the individuals owning the fee of a street. Inasmuch as this ground assumes that the compensation required by them is a rental, what we have already said makes further consideration of it unnecessary.

For the reasons stated, the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

NOTE.

For right of abutting owner to permanent use of subsurface of street or highway, see the annotation to KRESS v. MIAMI, post, 646.

v.

CITY OF MIAMI.

Highway — use by abutting owner.

1. The owner of the fee in a street has the right to use the subsurface in front of his property, so long as he does not interfere with the rights of the municipality below the surface for sewers, and pipes for water, gas, or other proper purposes.

Municipal corporation — ordinance — deprivation of property.

2. A municipality cannot deprive a person of his property or property rights, by declaring by ordinance or otherwise that to be a nuisance, which in fact is not a nuisance.

[See 19 R. C. L. 817.]

Highway — openings in sidewalk.

3. The owner of the fee in a street has the right, subject to reasonable municipal regulation, to make openings in the sidewalk to give access to the area beneath; but he is bound so to construct and cover the opening that it shall at all times be as safe for the use of the public as if it did not exist, and public travel over the same be not unreasonably interfered with.

Municipal corporation — requiring permit for opening in sidewalk.

4. A city has the right to require the owner of the fee in a street to procure a permit before making an opening in the sidewalk, and it has the right to see that proper safeguards are thrown about the work, and that in its progress the right of the public to use the sidewalk is not unreasonably interfered with.

— power to regulate openings in street.

5. A city may regulate how excavations in the subsurface of a street shall be made by the owner of the fee, and may regulate how trapdoors or other appliances for closing the opening shall be constructed; but it may not arbitrarily refuse to grant a permit, nor, under the guise of regulation, place an additional burden upon the abutting owner, or make regulations that would in effect deprive him from exercising his rights in the subsurface.

[See 19 R. C. L. 851.]

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Dade County (Branning, J.) enjoining them from completing the construction of a vault or subway under a sidewalk in the plaintiff city, and requiring them to remove the portion already constructed and restore the sidewalk to its previous condition. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Lilburn R. Railey, for appellants:

An injunction is an extraordinary remedy, and should not be granted except in extraordinary cases, and especially should it not be granted without the court being clearly advised on the matter and the other party having an opportunity to be heard before the granting of a temporary injunction.

Browne, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the decree of the chancellor permanently enjoining S. H. Kress & Co., its agents, servants, and employees, from constructing a vault or subway under a sidewalk in the city of Miami, and requiring them to place the sidewalk in the condition in which it was prior to the time any excavation was made thereunder.

We have considered, but will not discuss, all the assignments of error, but confine ourselves to such as relate to the vital issue,—the right of a person owning land abutting on a street in which he has the fee, to excavate and construct a subway or cellar beneath the surface of the sidewalk, and have access thereto by properly constructed and safeguarded trapdoors or other equipment.

The authorities are not in harmony, but they may be grouped into three classes: Those that hold that the owner of the fee to the street is also the owner of the subsurface and may make excavations therein if he does not unreasonably interfere with the public easement; those that hold that excavations may be made as long as they are not forbidden by ordinance or other regulation of the city; those that hold that every excavation in the street or sidewalk made without municipal consent is a nuisance per se.

Those in the first group follow the older, and we think the better, rule, as laid down by so eminent an authority as Lord Mansfield, who said: "1 Rolle, Abr. 392, Letter B, pl. 1, 2, is express—'that the King has nothing but the passage for himself and his people; but the freehold and all profits belong to the owner of the soil.' So do all the trees upon it, and mines under it (which may be extremely valuable). The owner may carry water in pipes under it." Goodtitle ex dem. Chester v. Alker, 1 Burr. 183, 97 Eng. Reprint, 231.

This doctrine has been modified by some of the later decisions of the courts of this country, but we cannot follow those that seek to extinguish all rights of the owner of the fee to the subsoil, or give to municipalities the power to take from such owner his unsundered right in the subsurface. The distinction between the doctrine of those courts that hold every excavation under the street or sidewalk made without municipal authority is a nuisance per se, and those that hold they are lawful so long as not forbidden by the ordinances of the city, more in name than in substance. A right that may be taken from a person at the will of the city is not a right, but a privilege, and, when we sustain the right of the city to grant or withhold from the owner of the fee the privilege of making excavations in the subsoil of a street adjacent to his property, his right vanishes. Neither can a municipality deprive the owner of his property or property rights, by declaring by ordinance or otherwise that to be a nuisance, which, in fact, is not a nuisance.

When the excavation for the area-way beneath the sidewalk was commenced by the appellant, there was no ordinance prohibiting it; but subsequently one was enacted that did, and it is contended that the abutting owner thereby lost his right to proceed with the work of constructing the cellar and trapdoors. We call attention to this as illustrative of the proposition, stated supra, that a recognition of the right of the city to enforce such an ordinance denies the right of the abutting owner to the subsoil of a street, because where property rights exist they cannot be taken away by an ordinance except when the property or the use to which it is put is a nuisance.

Any attempt to discuss the cases holding the various doctrines on this subject would extend this opinion to too great length, without any beneficial result; and we shall content ourselves with citations from some of those that hold as we do.

In Dell Rapids Mercantile Co. v. Dell Rapids, 11 S. D. 116, 74 Am. St. Rep. 788, 75 N. W. 898, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 459, the court said:

"Assuming that Cooley owned the soil to the center of the street, he was at liberty to use it, subject to the public easement, the same as other parts of his property, and the construction of the areas was not in itself unlawful."

"The excavation by the plaintiffs of the area under the sidewalk was not unlawful; they owned to the center of the street, subject to the right of way of the public over the surface. For any interference with this right of way, the plaintiffs would have been responsible. But, so long as they did no injury to the street, they were at liberty to use the space under it as they might any other part of their property." McCarthy v. Syracuse, 46 N. Y. 194.

"A gift of a right of way is not a gift of the earth and other materials which may exist within the boundary lines of the way, the right of which is given." Smith v. Rome, 19 Ga. 89, 63 Am. Dec. 298, 7 Mor. Min. Rep. 306.

"But it is conceded there was no such ordinance of the city of Detroit, applicable to the construction of this work (and that no license or permission was obtained from the common council for its construction), and we are satisfied that, at common law, the making of such excavations under sidewalks in cities, and the scuttles therein, for such purposes as this was made and used for, were not treated as nuisances in themselves, or in any respect illegal, unless the walk was allowed to remain broken up for an unreasonable length of time, or the work was improperly or unsafely constructed; though it would afterwards become a nuisance if not kept in repair.

"Judging from the reported cases, the usage or custom of constructing such works in cities seems to have been, in England, for a long period, as general as we know it has been in this country. And, though we find many decided cases in English books, for private injuries caused by these structures being out of repair, and indictments for obstructing highways and streets in a great variety of ways, we have been cited to no English cases, and have discovered none, in which such works have been held illegal in themselves, when properly and safely made, without any legislative permission, or that of the municipal authorities. Their legality seems, in all the cases, to have been assumed by the courts without any showing of such special authority or any authority. They have been treated as nuisances when allowed to be out of repair, and private actions have frequently been sustained for injuries received in consequence; but we find no intimation of their original illegality, when safely and properly constructed. This will appear from the cases cited below upon the question whether the tenant or the landlord is bound to keep them in repair. And the same view seems to have been quite generally taken in this country, outside of the state of New York." Fisher v. Thirkell, 21 Mich. 1, 4 Am. Rep. 422.

In McQuillin on Mun. Corp. vol. 3, § 1343, the subject is thus treated:

"Excavations may be considered from three viewpoints: First, as merely temporary ones to accomplish a lawful purpose, but interfering to some extent with public travel for a short time; second, permanent excavations in sidewalks, such as those which lead to basements by stairs inclosed by a railing on two sides, the question not relating so much to the right to use the space under the surface of the street as to the right to deprive permanently the public of the right to pass over a certain part of the sidewalk; third, the right to use the subsurface where it in no way conflicts with the public use of the surface.

"As to the first class, they are largely regulated by municipal provisions, and where for a lawful purpose are not interfered with further than to require a permit to be obtained from the municipality.

"As to the second class, it has been said that in the congested portions of large cities the use of basements are of great value, and the construction of areaways seems to be a necessity. So coalholes consisting of an iron rim into which a solid metal covering is adjusted, resting on a flange made for the purpose, are common in nearly all cities. . . . As to the third class, the first question to be decided is who owns the fee of the street. If the abutting owner has title thereto, he may use the space under the street, to the center thereof, the same as his other property, so long as he does not interfere with the superior rights of the municipality below the surface for sewers, etc. On the contrary, if the fee of the street is in the municipality, it may require abutting owners to obtain a permit before excavating under a street for room for a vault, cellar, engine room, or the like, and may require the payment of reasonable rent for the use thereof."

Other cases in point are Adams v. Fletcher, 17 R. I. 137, 33 Am. St. Rep. 859, 20 Atl. 263; Gordon v. Peltzer, 56 Mo. App. 599; Day v. Mt. Pleasant, 70 Iowa, 193, 30 N. W. 853; Papworth v. Milwaukee, 64 Wis. 389, 25 N. W. 431; Tacoma Safety Deposit Co. v. Chicago, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 868, and note (247 Ill. 192, 93 N. E. 153, 20 Ann. Cas. 564).

Upholding, as we do, the right of the owner of the fee in a street to use the subsurface the same as his other property, so long as he does not interfere with the rights of the municipality below the surface for sewers and pipes for water, gas, and other proper purposes, it follows that the owner has the right, subject to reasonable municipal regulation, to make openings in the sidewalk to give access to the area beneath; but he is bound so to construct and cover the opening that it shall at all times be as safe for the use of the public as if it did not exist, and public travel over the same be not unreasonably interfered with.

The city has the right to require the appellant to procure a permit before making an opening in the sidewalk, and it has the right to see that proper safeguards are thrown about the work, and that in its progress the right of the public to use the sidewalk is not unreasonably interfered with. It may also regulate how the excavation shall be made, and the trap-

the opening constructed; but it may not arbitrarily refuse to grant a permit, nor, under the guise of regulation, place an additional burden upon the abutting owner, or make such regulations as would in effect deprive him from exercising the rights recognized in this decision.

The decree of the chancellor granting the injunction is reversed.

I. Introductory.

This is a perplexing subject. The street purposes of the highway are paramount. The abutting owner owning the fee of the highway may use it in any manner not interfering with the street purposes. The authorities are not agreed upon what are street purposes,—a subway railway is a street purpose in Massachusetts, but not in New York. Travel on a sidewalk being a street purpose, may the city forbid all vaults under the walk as impairing its safety? The examination of the various questions, particularly as to the rights, if any, of abutters where the city owns the fee of the street, is frequently blocked by the omission from the report of any statement as to where the ownership of the fee of the highway lies. Cases as to uncovered "areas" are not included.

The owner of the land of a highway subject to the right of the public "may take trees growing upon the land, occupy mines, sink watercourses under it, and, generally, has a right to every use and profit which can be derived from it consistent with the easement." Woodruff v. Neal (1859) 28 Conn. 165.

It was stated in Weller v. McCormick (1890) 52 N. J. L. 470, 8 L.R.A. 798, 19 Atl. 1101, where a pedestrian on the sidewalk was injured by the falling of a limb from a tree in front of the defendant's premises, that an abutting owner may use the highway in front of his premises, when not restricted by positive enactment, for loading and unloading goods, for vaults and chutes, for awnings, for shade trees, etc., but only on condition that he does not unreasonably interfere with the safety of the highway for public travel.

In Fisher v. Thirkell (1870) 21 Mich. 1, 4 Am. Rep. 422, where the fee of the street apparently was in the abutting owner, it was held that, under the common law, excavations under public streets, where properly constructed and maintained, were not to be treated as nuisances per se, or in any respect illegal.

II. Laying pipes.

The abutting owner of the fee of a city street has the right to lay a water pipe for his own use beneath the surface so far as he can do so without impeding the public use, and, for that purpose, may excavate the soil, subject to such restrictions by the municipality as will insure the least interruption to the public easement. Colegrove Water Co. v. Hollywood (1907) 151 Cal. 425, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 904, 90 Pac. 1053.

In the absence of a municipal ordinance prescribing any rules or regulations governing the conduct of citizens in making excavations in the street, it is not unlawful for the assignee of the lot owners owning the fee of the street to dig a ditch and lay a gas-pipe line thereunder, provided he leaves the surface in as good condition as he found it, and does not materially interrupt travel thereon. Lynch v. North View (1914) 78 W. Va. 609, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1038, 81 S. E. 833.

The fee owner at common law may lay pipes in the highway, and where the original owner of the fee has laid water pipes along a highway, which have been used by him and his successors for sixty years, such pipes not interfering with the public right, they cannot be torn up by the municipality unless through condemnation proceedings. Wells v. Croton-on-Hudson (1910) 69 Misc. 97, 124 N. Y. Supp. 1058.

It was held in Cloverdale Homes v. Cloverdale (1913) 182 Ala. 419, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 607, 62 So. 712, that an abutting fee owner may make an excavation which amounts to an inconvenience to no one, in the street, necessary to enable him to attach a service pipe to the gas pipe at a point opposite his residence in the street. The court said: "The mere fact that an abutting landowner owns the ultimate fee to the middle of the street does not confer upon him the right to put that part of the street in which he owns such ultimate fee to even a temporary use which is inconsistent with all of the rights of the public in such street, unless there is some necessity therefor. 'The fee is entirely and completely subordinate to the dominant easement,' and an invasion of the rights of the public in the street 'can be justified only on the ground of necessity.' . . . As the abutter owns the fee to the middle of the street, he may, however, out of respect to the fact of his ownership, use that part of the street for any lawful purpose of his own when such use in no way interferes with any of the dominant rights of the public."

In speaking of the duty under contract of an abutting owner to connect his house with the service water pipe, the court said: "The abutting owner has a right of access to his premises through the street for coal or wood or other necessary things; the right of ingress for persons; and why may we not call this right to use the street to lay his pipe for conveyance of water a right of access constituting a property right in the street, which he may use and of which he cannot be divested or denied?" McClagherty v. Bluefield Waterworks & Improv. Co. (1910) 67 W. Va. 285, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 229, 68 S. E. 28, the ownership of the fee of the street not being stated.

In Bayonne v. North Arlington (1910) 78 N. J. Eq. 283, 79 Atl. 357, it was held that the abutting owner owning the fee of the street may not lay water pipes therein to convey water out of the state.

But in Kansas Natural Gas Co. v. Haskell (1909) 172 Fed. 545, it was held that the state cannot prevent the abutting owners owning the fee of highways from laying therein pipes for the purpose of conveying natural gas out of the state.

III. Passage beneath.

a. In general.

In holding that the dedicator, whose deed under the statute conveys the fee of the land, has no right to mine thereunder, the court in Matthiessen & H. Zinc Co. v. La Salle (1886) 117 Ill. 411, 2 N. E. 406, 8 N. E. 81, stated that owners of city lots had not the right of subterranean passage from one side of the street to the other.

b. Raceways, etc.

The owner of land crossed by a public highway may open a mill race under the highway, keeping a proper bridge, and not impairing the right of the public to use the highway as such. Perley v. Chandler (1810) 6 Mass. 454, 4 Am. Dec. 159; Dygart v. Schenck (1840) 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 446, 35 Am. Dec. 575; Clay v. Hart (1898) 25 Misc. 110, 55 N. Y. Supp. 43, affirmed in (1899) 41 App. Div. 625, 58 N. Y. Supp. 1150; Woodring v. Forks Twp. (1857) 28 Pa. 355, 70 Am. Dec. 134; Phoenixville v. Phoenixville Iron Co. (1863) 45 Pa. 135; West Bend v. Mann (1883) 59 Wis. 69, 17 N. W. 972.

So in case of a drain. Baring v. Heyward (1844) 29 S. C. L. (2 Speers) 553.

It was held in Groton v. Haines (1858) 36 N. H. 388, that the town, upon the laying out of a highway, had no right to interfere with a watercourse over which the highway ran, and which was used by the fee owner for carrying water to his house; and, if the town, after constructing the highway and erecting a bridge over the watercourse, neglected to repair the bridge, in consequence of which neglect the watercourse was obstructed, the owner had the privilege of entering upon the highway and opening the culvert, doing no unnecessary damage to the highway.

In Chase v. Middleton (1900) 123 Mich. 647, 82 N. W. 612, it was held that a landowner acquired a prescriptive right to the use of a ditch constructed by him across a highway, where he used it as a drain for more than twenty years without objection from the township authorities.

In Ellsworth v. Lord (1889) 40 Minn. 337, 42 N. W. 389, it was held that the dedication of a highway laid out and opened by the plaintiff over his dam and flume and by his mill did not appear to be inconsistent with his private right to use and maintain thereafter the dam and water power, or with the full enjoyment of his property, further than was reasonably implied by the nature of such dedication, and necessary for the public easement of travel and passage.

c. Cattle ways.

The fee owner's right of passage-ways for cattle seems somewhat uncertain.

In Pemberton v. Dooley (1890) 43 Mo. App. 176, it was held that the owner of the fee had the right to a pass way for his cattle through a ravine crossed by a highway on a bridge, provided he did not disturb the public use.

Where an owner of land abutting on a public highway intersected by a stream, which was spanned by a bridge, permitted her cattle to go under the bridge, and they frightened the horses of a traveler on the highway, it was for the jury to say whether the owner's use of the highway was an unreasonable interference with public rights. Mean v. Callison (1911) 28 Okla. 737, 116 Pac. 195.

But in Snively v. Washington Twp. (1907) 218 Pa. 249, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 918, 67 Atl. 465, it was held that a township which, in opening a public road, leaves a pass way for cattle beneath it for the accommodation of owners of abutting land, which it maintains for a period of fifty years, is not liable in damages in an action of trespass when, for public convenience, it decides to close the pass way, although the owner had built the walls of the pass way.

In Davis v. Pickerell (1908) 139 Iowa, 186, 117 N. W. 276, it was held that an abutting owner is not entitled to a cattle way unless by leave of the board of supervisors when the statute so requires.

IV. Vaults, coalholes, etc.

a. In general.

It is held in KRESS v. MIAMI (reported herewith) ante, 640, that an abutting owner having the fee of the street has the right to have a vault or subway under the sidewalk, provided that he complies with the reasonable regulations of the municipality and does not interfere with its rights for sewers and pipes for water, gas, and other proper purposes.

An abutting owner owning the fee of the street may make a vault under the sidewalk, properly covered, which does not interfere with the public's use of the street and sidewalks. Westliche Post Asso. v. Allen (1887) 26 Mo. App. 181.

A municipal corporation cannot, under its power to control its streets, require abutting owners to secure a permit to place vaults or areas beneath the sidewalks, and pay rent to the city for the space so occupied, where the fee is in them; but it may do so where it owns the fee of the street. Tacoma Safety Deposit Co. v. Chicago (1910) 247 Ill. 192, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 868, 93 N. E. 153, 20 Ann. Cas. 564. Followed as to the first proposition in Farwell v. Chicago (1910) 247 Ill. 235, 93 N. E. 168; Sears v. Chicago (1910) 247 Ill. 204, 139 Am. St. Rep. 319, 93 N. E. 158, 20 Ann. Cas. 539; Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank v. Chicago (1910) 247 Ill. 264, 93 N. E. 167.

In Dubuque v. Maloney (1859) 9 Iowa, 450, 74 Am. Dec. 358, where the city had built a cistern under the street and sidewalk, it was held that the abutting owner owning to the center of the street was not liable for an injury to the cistern caused by his excavations for a foundation and cellar. The court said: "Neither the city, nor any individual, had the right, against the will or without the consent of the owner of the adjoining lot, to construct a cistern under the street or sidewalk, and if the defendant for his own convenience, or to suit his own purpose, excavated the earth from the sidewalk opposite his lot, and in so doing injured or destroyed the cistern, there is no principle on which he can be made liable, in an action by the city, to recover damages for the injury."

The abutting owner owning to the center of the street has the right to a coalhole under the sidewalk, if made in a proper manner and so as not to interfere with or endanger public travel. Papworth v. Milwaukee (1885) 64 Wis. 389, 25 N. W. 431.

In State, Benson, Prosecutor, v. Hoboken (1869) 33 N. J. L. 280, it was held that a city having statutory authority to regulate the building of vaults is not authorized to require an abutter owning to the center of the street to pay a license fee based upon the size of the vault and the nature of the property, as this would be taxation.

A municipality owning the fee of the street may prevent an abutter from building a vault without its permission. Davis v. Clinton (1879) 50 Iowa, 585.

In the following cases it does not appear who owned the fee of the street: A coalhole is not inherently unlawful. Kirkpatrick v. George Knapp & Co. (1888) 28 Mo. App. 427. A coalhole under the sidewalk, constructed before any legislation, state or municipal, on the subject, is not a nuisance. Adams v. Fletcher (1890) 17 R. I. 187, 33 Am. St. Rep. 859, 20 Atl. 263. Where there are no municipal regulations on the subject, the abutter may build a vault under the sidewalk. Gordon v. Peltzer (1894) 56 Mo. App. 599. A city, having authorized a vault, cannot, fifteen years after its construction at great expense, summarily destroy it as a nuisance. Tiernan v. Thorp (1911) 88 Neb. 662, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1034, 130 N. W. 280. The construction and maintenance of a cellarway in an alley, with a cover projecting above the surface, will not be enjoined at the suit of an adjoining owner in the absence of evidence that it interferes with the safe and convenient use of the alley. Reynolds v. Union Sav. Bank (1912) 155 Iowa, 519, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 194, 136 N. W. 529.

In a case where the ownership of the fee of the street is not stated, and the other facts are not clear, but the city apparently had reduced the size of the plaintiff's vault by a change of grade, the court said: "If the vault or excavated area under the sidewalk was in the street, plaintiff cannot recover such damages as if it were his private property, but the vault is to be treated as any other convenience of a temporary character which he was rightfully enjoying and had the right to enjoy until such time as the city, representing the state in its paramount right to the use of the street, should, by proper ordinance or resolution terminate his right of enjoyment. Such right is not terminated by an unlawful change of grade." Burnham v. Milwaukee (1913) 155 Wis. 90, 143 N. W. 1067.

b. Street uses paramount.

Of course, the proper street uses dominate the situation.

Thus, an abutter owning to the center of the street, having built with the city's permission a vault under the sidewalk, must submit to having a wall of the vault pierced by telephone poles thereafter authorized by the city. Julia Bldg. Asso. v. Bell Teleph. Co. (1885) 88 Mo. 267, 57 Am. Rep. 398.

A property owner may be enjoined from excavating under the sidewalk adjoining his property in such a way as to interfere with electric conduits rightfully there. Allegheny County Light Co. v. Booth (1907) 216 Pa. 564, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 404, 66 Atl. 72, where it does not appear who owned the fee of the street.

The legislature may authorize the construction of a subway for a street railway in the street, and if such construction interferes with a vault built by an adjoining owner, and extending into the street, the municipality may require the closing or abandoning of it. United States v. Boston Elev. R. Co. (1910) 176 Fed. 963, where it seems probable that the fee was in the adjoining owner.

So, in Sears v. Crocker (1904) 184 Mass. 586, 100 Am. St. Rep. 577, 69 N. E. 327, a case brought by abutters owning the fee of the street, the court remarked that the mere fact that a subway "deprives abutters of the use of vaults or other similar underground structures in the streets, which they have heretofore maintained, is of little consequence. Abutters are bound to withdraw from occupation of streets, above or below the surface, whenever the public needs the occupied space for travel."

A municipal corporation having only an easement in a street may construct therein a subway necessary to accommodate public travel without liability to abutting owners for interference with vaults constructed by them beneath the street, or for the expense of removing fixtures therefrom, even under a statute requiring compensation for injuries sustained by reason of property taken or injured, except public ways or lands, and authorizing the removal or relocation of conduits or other property without expense to the city. Peabody v. Boston (1915) 220 Mass. 376, L.R.A. 1915F, 1005, 107 N. E. 952. But see the New York cases infra, d, 2.

c. Flooding.

A lessee of one who, as abutting owner, having the fee to the center of the street, made a cellar under the sidewalk in compliance with the city's permission and regulations, may recover from it for damages for leakage from a defective sewer into such cellar. Allen v. Boston (1893) 159 Mass. 324, 38 Am. St. Rep. 423, 34 N. E. 519.

In Bloom v. Orange (1918) 91 N. J.

L. 376, 103 Atl. 395, it was held that an abutting owner has a right to have a vault under the sidewalk, and that if the city, after it has been there for forty years, negligently causes it to be flooded, he may recover therefor. We are probably to understand that the owner owned to the center of the street.

A city permitting an owner to use cellar stairways from the street to his basement is liable for negligence in the flooding of the basement by water from the street. Wendt v. Akron (1913) 161 Iowa, 338, 142 N. W. 1024, where the ownership of the street does not appear.

In Dell Rapids Mercantile Co. v. Dell Rapids (1898) 11 S. D. 116, 74 Am. St. Rep. 783, 75 N. W. 898, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 459, it was held that a fee owner was at liberty to use the soil to the center of the street, subject to the public easement, the same as he might use any other part of his property; and therefore he had a right to construct beneath the surface of the sidewalk an area for his own use. If his goods stored in his basement were injured because of an overflow in the area due to the negligent construction of a public sewer, through a portion of the subsoil occupied by the city, the municipality would be liable for such injuries. See also McCarthy v. Syracuse (1871) 46 N. Y. 194, infra, d, 1.

It was held otherwise in substance where the city owned the fee of the street. Guthrie v. Nix (1897) 5 Okla. 555, 49 Pac. 917.

d. New York cases.

1. In general.

(It will be noted that some of the cases arising in the city of New York, hereinafter cited, are referred to as not stating whether or not the fee of the street was owned by the city. It is not unusual to meet the statement that under the city's charter it has the fee of the streets, and it may well be that some of such cases were decided upon the tacit understanding that the city had the fee of the particular street. But in view of the decision in APPLETON v. NEW YORK

(reported herewith) ante, 629, it seems that without a further study of the rights of such city than the scope of this note affords, it is safer not to take for granted that the fee of a particular street is in such city.)

It has been held in a number of cases where the ownership of the street is not stated that an abutter who, without authority, makes an excavation under the sidewalk, is liable to one injured, irrespective of negligence. Congreve v. Smith (1858) 18 N. Y. 79; Congreve v. Morgan (1858) 18 N. Y. 84, 72 Am. Dec. 495; Anderson v. Dickie (1863) 26 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 105; Clifford v. Dam (1879) 12 Jones & S. 391, affirmed in 81 N. Y. 52.

(But the city's consent may be by implication. Babbage v. Powers (1891) 180 N. Y. 281, 14 L.R.A. 398, 29 N. E. 132.)

Similarly, it has been held that a space in a vault greater than allowed under permit is a nuisance per se. New York v. Gerry (1917) 100 Misc. 297, 165 N. Y. Supp. 659, where the ownership of the fee of the street is not reported.

But where the plaintiffs sued the city for neglect of duty as to a sewer causing a flood in the plaintiff's basement under the sidewalk, the court said: "The excavation by the plaintiffs of the area under the sidewalk was not unlawful; they owned to the center of the street, subject to the right of way of the public over the surface. For any interference with this right of way, the plaintiffs would have been responsible. But, so long as they did no injury to the street, they were at liberty to use the space under it, as they might any other part of their property. They were not bound to leave the earth there, as a protection against a possible overflow of the sewer." McCarthy v. Syracuse (1871) 46 N. Y. 194.

It seems to be held in Title Guarantee & T. Co. v. New York (1912) 205 N. Y. 496, 99 N. E. 160, that the city in its discretion may charge what it sees fit for an extension of an old vault, the report not showing who owned the fee of the street.

In APPLETON v. NEW YORK (reported herewith) ante, 629, it was held that after fifty years of use (without permit and in violation of ordinances) of vaults under the half of the street by the owner of the fee of such half, the city may require payment for a permit for continued use of the vaults.

The court seems to have been of a similar opinion in Mahoney v. New York (1911) 145 App. Div. 884, 180 N. Y. Supp. 602.

Attention is called to the statement of the court in the APPLETON CASE that the permission of the city "is a requisite preliminary to the construction of the vault, because the land constituting the street is subject to all the public uses, servitudes, and appropriations essential to or consistent with its status as a street, and, in the interest of public safety, convenience, security, and comfort, is, within all legitimate street uses, by statutory grant, under the control, regulation, and disposition of the public authorities, whose right to exact a payment or fee, in the process of regulation, for a permission or privilege of exercising in it a private possession or advantage, consistent with the public uses, is undoubted. . . . This right [of the city] exists as to the owner of the land contiguous to the land of the street, irrespective of the ownership of the fee of the latter, because it is an element in the authorized regulation and supervision of the street."

In New York v. Madison Ave. Real Estate Co. (1904) 42 Misc. 535, 85 N. Y. Supp. 1118, where the report does not show the ownership of the street, it was held that a vault may not be built without the city's permit.

An abutter not owing the fee of the street may not complain if his vault, in use for forty years with the city's acquiescence, is taken away without compensation. Patten v. New York Elev. R. Co. (1878) 3 Abb. N. C. 806.

2. Street uses paramount.

A city owning the fee of the street and having given permission for vaults therein may revoke it when a public purpose requires. Lincoln Safe Deposit Co. v. New York (1904) 96 App. Div. 624, 88 N. Y. Supp. 912.

A municipal corporation which has granted a public service corporation a right to lay a pipe in a street, the fee of which belongs to itself, cannot confer authority upon an abutting owner to injure such pipe in the construction of a vault which it permits him to place under the sidewalk. New York Steam Co. v. Foundation Co. (1909) 195 N. Y. 43, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 470, 87 N. E. 765.

In New York a subway railroad is not a street purpose, although the city owns the fee. Re Opening & Extending of New Street (1915) 215 N. Y. 109, L.R.A.1916A, 1290, 109 N. E. 104, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 119. If the city owns the fee the abutter is entitled to compensation for deprivation of lateral support and if the city does not own the fee the abutter owning it is entitled to substantial damages. Re Rapid Transit R. Comrs. (1909) 197 N. Y. 81, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 647, 90 N. E. 456, 18 Ann. Cas. 366.

But where the city owns the fee, a subway railroad seems to be held to be a public purpose sufficient to enable the city to abrogate vaults. Thus it was held that an abutting owner's right to maintain, under a license from a city, a vault in the public street, does not constitute a property right attached to the fee, and a dominant easement under the surface of the street, but it amounts to no more than a revocable permit, or license revocable whenever the city or public uses require. Potter v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co. (1907) 54 Misc. 423, 105 N. Y. Supp. 1071, affirmed in (1908) 124 App. Div. 920, 108 N. Y. Supp. 1145, where the use was for a subway railway.

So a municipal corporation which owns the fee of its street was held not liable to an abutting owner for permitting the construction of a subway beneath its surface, though he is entitled to lateral support, and a permit by such municipal corporation to an abutting owner for the construction of a vault under the surface of a street is subject to abrogation for public convenience or necessity. Lincoln

In a similar situation it was said in March v. New York (1901) 69 App. Div. 3, note, 74 N. Y. Supp. 1151, that no trespass is disclosed in the destruction, under municipal authority, of a vault maintained in the street by an adjoining owner, presumptively by authority of a license from the city, which owns the fee of the street; that, as a matter of law, the plaintiff had no right to the possession of this portion of the street, as against the city.

V. Miscellaneous.

One building a vault by leave of the city may recover from a stranger who injures the sidewalk over it by negligence. Parrish v. Baird (1899) 160 N. Y. 302, 54 N. E. 724, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 666.

Where an abutting property owner is required by statute to erect and maintain a vault or covered area way under the sidewalk adjoining his premises, the city authorities are without power to exact from him compensation for a permit to construct such a vault or covered area way. Buek v. Collis (1897) 17 App. Div. 465, 45 N. Y. Supp. 291.

It was held in State ex rel. Dawson v. Parsons Street R. & Electrical Co. (1909) 81 Kan. 430, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1082, 105 Pac. 704, that where the proper public authorities authorize a subway in a public street for the use of the street railway, an abutting property owner cannot prevent the construction thereof although seriously injured thereby, his remedy being that afforded by the recovery of consequential damages. It does not appear who owned the fee of the street.

"Where the fee to a street is in the abutting lot owners, and excavations are made in the street and a bridge erected thereover, the surface of the street underneath the bridge may be used by the owners of the fee in any manner not inconsistent with the right of the public." Adair v. Atlanta (1905) 124 Ga. 288, 52 S. E. 739.

It is not intended to go into the vexed question as to what will create a presumption of a permit by the city to build a vault, or the value of such presumption. See, for example, Gridley v. Bloomington (1873) 68 Ill. 47; Gregsten v. Chicago (1898) 145 Ill. 451, 86 Am. St. Rep. 496, 84 N. E. 426; Deshong v. New York (1902) 74

App. Div. 234, 77 N. Y. Supp. 563, affirmed in (1903) 176 N. Y. 475, 68 N. E. 880; Jorgensen v. Squires (1895) 144 N. Y. 280, 39 N. E. 873; People ex rel. Ziegler v. Collis (1897) 17 App. Div. 448, 45 N. Y. Supp. 282, appeal dismissed in (1899) 158 N. Y. 704, 53 N. E. 1130. B. B. B.

PETER ANDERSON, Respt.,

v.

COLUMBIA CONTRACT COMPANY, Appt.

(— Or. —, 184 Pac. 240.)

Water — destruction of licensed fish trap.

1. A navigator cannot negligently destroy a licensed fish trap in a public navigable water.

Trial — jury — controverted question.

2. Controverted questions on both sides of which there is evidence must be submitted to the jury.

Water — navigable stream — Columbia river.

3. Columbia river is a navigable stream, and as such is a common highway.

—conflict between navigation rights and fishery rights.

4. The right of navigation in a navigable stream is paramount to that of fishery, but the navigator cannot with impunity do unnecessary injury to the fisherman or his property.

—restriction on navigation.

5. One navigating a public navigable river is not bound to keep within the channel or usual course in which vessels navigating said river should be operated and navigated.

Appeal — consideration of charge as a whole.

6. The charge to the jury should be considered as a whole with a view to ascertaining, if possible, whether the rights of the complaining party were so prejudiced as to prevent a fair trial.

Water — obstruction of stream — fish trap.

7. A fish trap licensed by the state and Federal governments in a public navigable river, which is not located within the usual course followed by vessels navigating the stream, is not an unlawful obstruction.

Property — personalty — fish trap.

8. A fish trap placed in position during the fishing season by driving piling into the soil, and removed when the season is over, is personal property.

Venue — injury to personal property — transitory action.

9. The right of action for injury to a fish trap, which is personal property, is transitory.

Damages — lost profits.

10. Damages may include an allowance for lost profits which it is reasonably certain would have been made if the wrong complained of had not been done.

— value of use.

11. The damages for injury to a fish trap should include the cost of repairs and the value of the use during the time the trap is necessarily out of commission.

Evidence — damages — value of fish trap.

12. In determining the value of the use of a fish trap injured by another's negligence, which has no rental value, evidence is admissible as to the number of fish which the trap took immediately before and immediately after the injury, as well as the number taken by other traps similarly located during the time the injured trap was out of commission.

On Petition for Rehearing.

13. The giving of a correct instruction does not make nonprejudicial the giving of an inconsistent incorrect one.

[See 2 R. C. L. 260; 14 R. C. L. 777.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County (Gantenbein, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injury to his fish trap, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Harris, J.:

The Columbia Contract Company, an Oregon corporation having its principal office in Portland, appealed from a judgment for $1,050 which Peter Anderson obtained against it for damages done to his fish trap by the company's towboat and barges. Anderson owned a pound net fish trap on the Washington side of the Columbia river. The waters of the river are affected by the ebb and flow of the ocean tides at the place where the trap is located. The fish trap was constructed by driving piling into the bed of the river and attaching web or nets to the piling in the manner described in Monroe v. Withycombe, 84 Or. 328, 331, 165 Pac. 227. The extreme width of the heart of the Anderson trap was approximately 50 feet; the lead was about 350 feet long, with the piling in it set from 8 to 10 feet apart; and hence the trap was about 400 feet over all.

About 300 feet above the Anderson trap, and on the Washington shore of the river, was a light, and back further "up in the woods" was a second light. These two lights are known in the record as the range lights. On the Oregon side of the river, and above the Anderson trap, is a place called "Bugby hole," where another light is kept; and between Bugby hole and the Anderson trap is a bar in the river, called "Puget bar." Upon leaving Bugby hole, masters of vessels navigate Puget bar by getting in line with the two range lights, and steer on that course until the bar is crossed.

Along the entire length of the Anderson trap the water is about 17 feet in depth, except at the "inner end," where it is "about 8 or 10 feet." About 1,800 feet above the Anderson trap, on the Washington side of the river, is another trap, known as the "Brandt trap." There is no obstruction between these two traps. Referring to the towboat and barges operated by the defendant, one witness stated that there "was water enough" between the two traps "so that you could go pretty close by the shore."

We cannot speak any more definitely of the width of the river at the place where the Anderson trap is located than to say that it is between 2,000 feet and 1 mile. Puget bar ends at a point above the Anderson trap. According to the testimony of one witness for the plaintiff, "after you get across the bar, and down the river, the whole river is deep, and you can go anywhere." Another witness for Anderson stated that "it is deep water clear across" opposite the Anderson trap. J. O. Church, who was employed by the defendant as master of the towboat Samson, and was thoroughly familiar with the presence and location of the Anderson trap, explained that, if it be assumed that the river is 2,000 feet wide at the Anderson trap, "you will probably have 500 feet there" beyond the outside end of the trap to "navigate in." The plaintiff contended that there "is 3,000 or 4,000 feet of channel there, — deep water across the channel."

The witnesses differed in their opinions as to how far vessels usually ran outside the Anderson trap when passing up or down the river. The estimates given by the witnesses for the plaintiff range from 800 to 1,000 feet. Captain Church, a witness for the defendant, testified: "I should judge the steamships ran in within 250 feet. J. E. Copeland, a master of steamboats, with many years of experience, stated that the course usually followed by him before the trap was put in ran about 20 feet from it; but after the trap was installed he made a change in his course, by changing one eighth of a point in the distance from Puget bar to the range light, and this changed course passed the end of the trap at a distance of about 200 feet.

The Columbia Contract Company was engaged in transporting rock down the river to the jetty at the mouth of the river, and for that purpose the company used three barges and a towboat called the Samson. Each barge, when loaded, carried about 800 tons of rock and drew about 10 feet of water. The Samson drew between 14 and 14½ feet of water. Each of the barges was about 140 feet long and approximately 40 feet wide. The Samson was about 125 feet long, with a 25-foot beam. At some time in 1911, probably September 28th, the defendant was taking the Samson and three barges loaded with rock down the river. One barge was lashed to the bow of the Samson, while a second barge was lashed on one side, and the third barge was lashed on the other side of the first barge and towboat, making of the towboat and barges what counsel have termed in their briefs a "spike formation." The flotilla was approximately 120 feet wide. The Samson, with its barges, passed Bugby hole about 3 A. M., and at that time it was so foggy that the range lights above the Anderson trap could not be seen. The fog made its appearance on the river about midnight, and in a short time became so thick that the range lights were completely obscured from view and could not be seen by fishermen on the river. One fisherman, Christian Tholo, was operating a gill net in the channel of the river a short distance above the Anderson trap, and upon hearing the fog signal of the Samson he took in his net. He could not see the range lights, nor could he see either the Oregon or Washington shore; and after changing the course of his gasoline boat several times, he finally found himself at the end of the Brandt trap, where he tied his boat. Another fisherman, Olaf Vog, was likewise operating a gill net in the channel of the river near to and a short distance above the Anderson trap. When he reached what he supposed was the end of his drift, or the place where he "should start to pick up," he took up his gill net, and although he "wanted to get over to the Oregon shore," he found himself on the Washington side at the Anderson trap, where he tied up "and laid down in the boat."

Not being able to see the range lights, upon leaving Bugby hole the master of the Samson navigated his vessel by clock and compass, by noting the time shown by the clock and by observing the course recorded in his course book. He explained that fourteen minutes of running would have brought the flotilla to the Anderson trap; that at the end of eleven minutes he slowed down, and at the end of twelve or thirteen minutes he stopped the engines and drifted. After Puget bar is crossed, and while passing the Brandt and Anderson traps, vessels, when following the usual course, are not navigated on a tangent, but are steered along the line of a slight curve. The two traps are on the outer side of this curve. The usual course taken by vessels is farther out from the Brandt trap than from the Anderson trap, and yet Tholo, the fisherman who had tied up his boat at the Brandt trap, says that the Samson and the barges passed within 20 feet of the Brandt trap. According to this witness the Samson, with its barges, proceeded down the river through the waters between the Brandt and Anderson traps, and then ran on through the latter trap. The flotilla ran through the lead of the Anderson trap at a point between the heart and inner end of the lead, taking out 24 piling, and ran so close to the heart of the trap that only one or two piling next to the heart and in the lead remained standing.

Anderson repaired the trap, and at the end of two weeks from the date of the accident was able again to operate it. He sued the Columbia Contract Company for the total sum of $1,618.60. This total sum embraced two items—one for $818.60, the cost of repairing the trap, and the other $800, the amount of the "money and profits" which Anderson alleges he could and would have earned if the trap had not been injured.

The complaint contains six specifications of negligence. The plaintiff alleges: (1) That, although there was a fixed channel and course in which vessels navigating the river should be operated, the defendant negligently failed to keep the tugboat within the limits of "said channel, and carelessly and negligently navigated said vessel outside and beyond said fixed course and channel, and into and against said fish trap;" (2) that the defendant negligently failed to maintain sufficient lights upon the vessel, so that objects lying in the stream could be seen and avoided; (3) that the defendant negligently failed to maintain a lookout, and neglected to keep a sufficient watch ahead; (4) that the defendant negligently failed to see and avoid striking the trap; (5) that the defendant negligently operated the vessel at a dangerous and unsafe rate of speed; and (6) that the defendant negligently failed to stop the vessel and to run aside, so as to avoid the fish trap, after the trap was or should have been seen by the defendant.

In its answer the defendant denies that it was guilty of negligence in any particular. As a further answer to the complaint the defendant avers that the fish trap was unlawfully built and maintained, and in such a manner that it obstructed the navigable channel of the river and was a menace to navigation; that the trap was unlawfully maintained in two particulars: (1) That it extended from the shore to a point in the navigable channel in the river; and (2) "that the signals and lights were not maintained thereon as required by law." The defendant alleges that at a time when it was lawfully navigating the river on a dark and foggy night, and while moving slowly down the stream "in the channel thereof," and "solely because the said fish trap was so located that it obstructed the navigable channel of the said river, the said steamboat, with its tow, ran into said fish trap."

The plaintiff replied by traversing the affirmative allegations of the answer.

Harris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The foregoing statement may be summarized by saying that the defendant attempted to navigate the river at a time when it was so foggy that one could not see ahead and the range lights ceased to be an aid to navigation; that the defendant left Bugby hole with the intention of following the usual course taken by vessels across Puget bar and past the Anderson trap; that the towboat and barges were successfully navigated across Puget bar; that the river is between 2,000 feet and a mile wide at the point where the Anderson trap is located; that between 500 and 4,000 feet of that width opposite the Anderson trap is sufficiently deep for the navigation of vessels; that the usual course followed by vessels is between 200 and 1,000 feet from the outer end of the Anderson trap; that, instead of following the usual course, as the master of the Samson says he intended, the flotilla, because of some controverted reason, got out of the usual course of vessels at a point at least 1,800 feet, and probably more, above the Anderson trap, and proceeded on down the river outside of the usual course, but in waters deep enough for the navigation of the towboat and barges, to and through the Anderson trap.

It is appropriate here to add to what already has been said that the master of the Samson testified that he did not see the Brandt trap at all, and that it was so foggy that he did not see the Anderson trap until he was about 100 feet from it. On the other hand, Christian Tholo testified that the fog lifted before the Samson reached the Anderson trap, and that when the boat was "in front of the lower range light" (300 feet above the Anderson trap) it was "swinging," and that at that time he saw the light on the end of the Anderson trap. The witness Vog corroborated the testimony of Tholo by saying that after the flotilla went through the trap, "I was looking around, and I could see the shore, the house ashore, and the woods back of the house." Anderson explained that his house was 600 feet below the front range light; and hence, if his testimony is taken as true, the trap, which was 300 feet below the range light, was 300 feet above the house. The Samson was displaying a red light on the port side and a green light on the starboard side, as well as two white lights on the masthead, as required by the regulations. There was a white light on the outside of each barge. These lights, however, served to enable others to see the Samson rather than to enable the Samson to see other objects. In addition to the lights already mentioned, the Samson was equipped with both an arc and a search light. The master of the vessel stated that the search light is not used in foggy weather, for the reason that such a light hinders rather than aids navigation. Besides the master, who was at the time of the accident at the Samson's wheel, there was a sailor on duty on the Samson as a lookout. There was a man on each barge, but each of these three men was asleep.

As already stated, Captain Church testified that at the end of eleven minutes he slowed down, and at the end of twelve or thirteen minutes after leaving Bugby hole he stopped the engines and drifted; but opposed to this evidence there was the testimony of Christian Tholo, who told the jury that "when she passed me she had the speed that she usually had," and that after he saw the Samson she was going, so far as he could observe, "as she usually goes when it is clear." There was testimony for the plaintiff to the effect that vessels either anchored or tied up in heavy fogs; but there was also evidence for the defendant to the effect that only loaded ocean-going vessels, whether with or without a tug, anchored, and that towboats with barges never anchored or tied up on account of the fog. The master of the Samson testified that, if the towboat had been equipped with a stern wheel, he could have backed out after seeing the trap and thus avoided it; but since the boat was equipped with a propeller, an attempt to back out at any time after he saw the Anderson trap would have resulted in the flotilla swinging around and striking the trap broadside, and thus causing greater damage to the trap. He also stated that when he discovered his predicament he started the engines and went through the lead of the trap as straight as he could, and by so doing did the least possible damage, and that if he had not done this the flotilla would have taken out the heart of the trap. It is apparent, from this brief account of the evidence, that the questions of whether or not the defendant negligently failed to maintain sufficient lights, or negligently failed to keep a lookout, or negligently failed to see and avoid the fish trap, or negligently operated the flotilla at a dangerous rate of speed, or negligently failed to stop the Samson and her tow and avoid the fish trap, were all properly submitted to the jury. There was evidence upon both sides of these controverted questions, and it was therefore the province of the jury to determine the facts. The trial court did not commit error, as contended by the defendant, in asking the jury to decide whether the cor-

Much of the discussion in the briefs relates to the allegation that the defendant "negligently failed to keep and maintain said tugboat within the limits" of the fixed channel and course in which vessels were usually operated. The defendant has urged numerous objections to the instructions given by the court, contending that some of them were erroneous and that several of them were inconsistent with each other. The position taken by the defendant is rested largely upon the application which it contends should be made of the rule which gives paramountcy to the right of navigation.

The Columbia river is a navigable stream, and as such is a common highway "and forever free." This right is a public one, and it is not only given by the common law, but is preserved by the statute admitting the state of Oregon into the Union. Johnson v. Jeldness, 85 Or. 657, 661, L.R.A. 1918A, 1074, 167 Pac. 798. The right of fishery is likewise a common right. The right of navigation is paramount, for the reason that it is of the most importance to the public weal. Davis v. Jerkins, 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 290, 293; Post v. Munn, 4 N. J. L. 61, 7 Am. Dec. 570; Flanagan v. Philadelphia, 42 Pa. 219, 228. Stated in general terms, the right of fishery must give way to the right of navigation. Expressed in more accurate language, the paramountcy of the right of navigation does not extinguish the right of fishery, although the former does, whenever there is a necessary conflict, limit the latter, and compel it to yield so far as the right of fishery interferes with the fair, useful, and legitimate exercise of the right of navigation. Speaking of the abstract right of the public, it may be said, as expressed in 1 Farnham on Waters, § 27: "The public is entitled to the free, uninterrupted, and unobstructed use of every part of the stream, from bank to bank and throughout the length of the channel, which at the ordinary stage of the water is of such depth and of such accessibility with respect to the current or main body of the stream as to be capable of navigation by boats . . . either up and down or across, or from the main stream onto any particular part in question, or thence onto the body of the stream; and this whether such part has ever been so used, and whether there is any present or anticipated necessity for so using it."

Continuing to employ general terms when referring to the right of navigation, in the abstract, a boat has a right to "take her course," and to go when and where it is necessary to go, and is not obliged to stop or go out of her way, or wait upon the movements of those who are managing a fishing seine or net; and yet this right of navigation, which entitles the public to the unobstructed use of every part of the stream which is capable of navigation by boats, and authorizes a boat to "take her course," cannot be exercised without regard to the rights of others. The navigator of a public stream must manage his craft with ordinary care and with due regard to the rights, property, and lives of others. 1 Farnham, Waters, §§ 27, 31, 33; John Spry Lumber Co. v. The C. H. Green, 76 Mich. 320, 332, 43 N. W. 576. While a boat may "take her course," nevertheless a navigator cannot with impunity do unnecessary damage to a fisherman or his property; but, upon the contrary, the paramount right of navigation must be exercised fairly, and not arbitrarily, and with due regard to the subordinate right of fishery, and a boat must be so navigated as not to do unnecessary damage. 1 Farnham, Waters, § 33a; Gould, Waters, 2d ed. § 87; Porter v. Allen, 8 Ind. 1, 65 Am. Dec. 750; Lewis v. Keeling, 46 N. C.

fishery rights.

(1 Jones, L.) 299, 307, 62 Am. Dec. 168; Post v. Munn, 4 N. J. L. 61, 7 Am. Dec. 570. For example, if nets are placed across the channel of a river, so as to be a bar to navigation, a vessel may, if reasonably necessary to do so, run over the nets; but, if a navigator is warned or ought to have known of his approach toward the net of a fisherman, he is liable for damage resulting from his negligent failure to avoid doing damage, if he can do so without prejudice to the reasonable prosecution of his voyage. Horst v. Columbia Contract Co. 89 Or. 344, 350, 352, 174 Pac. 161; Hopkins v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 131 N. C. 463, 42 S. E. 902; Cobb v. Bennett, 75 Pa. 326, 329, 15 Am. Rep. 752; Wright v. Mulvaney, 78 Wis. 89, 9 L.R.A. 807, 23 Am. St. Rep. 393, 46 N. W. 1045. The ruling in Wright v. Mulvaney is of peculiar interest, for the reason that there, as here, a pound net fish trap was injured by a boat with a tow, and some of the other material particulars were like the facts presented here. The court says: "But it does not necessarily result from this [the paramount right of navigation] that the navigator may carelessly and negligently run his vessel upon the nets of fishermen and destroy them, and escape liability therefor merely because he did not do so maliciously or wantonly. Such a proposition shocks any proper sense of justice. The benefit which the navigator is entitled to claim by reason of his paramount right is, we apprehend, that when the two rights necessarily conflict, the inferior must yield to the superior right. But he may not by his own negligence unnecessarily force the two rights into conflict, and then claim the benefit of the paramount right."

When it is said that the public is entitled to navigate upon any part of the navigable waters of a stream without obstruction, it must always be understood that reference is made to unlawful, and not lawful, obstructions. An obstruction placed in a stream may be authorized by competent authority, and consequently the right of navigation is limited by that kind of an obstruction. Gould, Waters, 2d ed. § 87; Davis v. Jerkins, 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 290, 293; Flanagan v. Philadelphia, 42 Pa. 219, 232; Lewis v. Keeling, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 299, 306, 62 Am. Dec. 168; Pound v. Turck, 95 U. S. 459, 24 L. ed. 525. If authority is granted for the erection of an obstruction in a navigable stream, and the obstruction is so placed as to be partly beyond the limits of the authorization, then in that event the obstruction is unlawful, and a nuisance only to the extent that the authority has been exceeded. Knox v. Chaloner, 42 Me. 150, 156; Renwick v. Morris, 3 Hill, 621, affirmed in 7 Hill, 575. Even though an obstruction is wholly or partially unauthorized, nevertheless this lack of authority for the erection or maintenance of the obstruction does not necessarily operate as authority to a navigator negligently to destroy the obstruction. 1 Farnham, Waters, § 33; Dimes v. Petley, 15 Q. B. 276, 117 Eng. Reprint, 462, 19 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 449, 14 Jur. 1132; The Brinton, 13 C. C. A. 331, 26 U. S. App. 486, 66 Fed. 71.

We may now direct attention to some of the instructions which the court gave to the jury. After defining negligence, and explaining that the plaintiff could recover if the defendant was, and he himself was not, guilty of negligence, the court told the jury, in instruction No. 3, that "it is charged" in the complaint "that at said time the said boat was being operated outside of and beyond the channel or course in which such vessels should be operated;" and then follows an enumeration of the remaining five specifications of negligence. Having referred to the first specification of negligence in the language already quoted, and having enumerated the other five specifications, the court, in instruction No. 4, then said: If you find the defendant was "guilty of any one or more of said charges, and if you so find that any one or more of said charges which you may so find defendant guilty of constituted negligence or lack of due care," and that such acts caused the injury, then "plaintiff is entitled to a verdict," unless his own negligence contributed to the injury.

The jury was properly told, in instruction No. 5, "that in operating its said vessel the duty rests upon defendant to operate the same in a reasonably careful manner, so as to avoid colliding with or injuring structures along the shore."

The next instruction related to the right and duty of the defendant when navigating in the fog, and the succeeding instruction referred to the duty of maintaining a lookout. The next instruction, No. 8, reads as follows: "It was also the duty of defendant to operate and navigate said vessel in the channel or usual course in which vessels navigating said river should be operated and navigated."

In instruction No. 9 the jurors were told: "If you find from a preponderance of the evidence, therefore, that defendant failed to perform any one or more of these duties, then defendant was negligent, and not in the exercise of due care."

Instruction No. 26 is important, because it was given at the request of the defendant. This instruction begins by saying that if the jury found that the plaintiff had obtained permits from the state of Washington and the United States, and had erected and maintained the trap in the place and manner provided by such permits, and if the jury further found "that the defendant was careless and negligent in piloting, operating, and navigating its towboat Samson, and in thereby causing the same to run into and against the said fish trap of plaintiff, and that the fish trap was thereby damaged and injured, the plaintiff is entitled in such case, and in such case only, to recover from the defendant the amount of his damages: Provided that the negligence of the defendant which occasioned the injury consisted in the failure of the defendant to keep and maintain its towboat within the limits of the navigable channel of the Columbia river and outside and beyond the fixed course and navigable channel of said river, or that the defendant failed to keep and maintain adequate and sufficient lights upon its towboat, so that objects lying in the Columbia river could be seen and avoided, or that the defendant failed to keep and maintain a lookout upon its towboat, and failed to keep and maintain a sufficient watch ahead, or that the defendant, through negligence in looking ahead, failed to see the fish trap; or that, having seen the fish trap, the defendant failed to use such means as were available to avoid striking and injuring the same, or that the defendant operated and propelled its towboat at a dangerous rate of speed, or at an unsafe rate of speed with regard to the condition of the weather, the atmosphere, and the circumstances and conditions surrounding the locality where the accident complained of is alleged to have occurred, or that the defendant, having means to stop its towboat, or to turn aside and thus avoid the fish trap after the same was seen, failed to employ said means efficiently, or to take proper and timely steps to stop its towboat, or to turn aside and thus avoid the said fish trap."

Instruction No. 8 was clearly erroneous. Instruction No. 3, standing alone, is not strictly accurate, for the reason that it states that the complaint charges that "the boat was being operated outside," instead of including the element of negligence, and saying that the boat was being "negligently" operated outside, of the channel. However, when this instruction is construed in connection with instruction No. 4, then the two, when taken together, harmonize with the complaint. The plaintiff —restriction on navigation.

does not rely in his complaint upon the bald fact that the defendant got outside of the channel usually followed by vessels; but he relies upon the charge that the "defendant carelessly and negligently failed to keep and maintain said tugboat within the limits of said channel, and carelessly and negligently navigated said vessel outside and beyond said fixed course and channel."

The position of the plaintiff with respect to instructions 3 and 4 is made plain by the following excerpt taken from his printed brief:

"By said instructions, 3 and 4, the court charged the jury that it was alleged in the complaint that appellant carelessly and negligently operated its boat outside of and beyond the channel or course in which vessels should be operated, and that if the jury found, not only that appellant did this, but that its action in so doing resulted from negligence or a lack of due care, and they also found that such negligence caused the damages to the trap, respondent was entitled to recover, unless he was himself guilty of contributory negligence.

"In other words, the court instructed the jury that before they could find against appellant for navigating outside the channel or usual course of vessels they must find that it did so unnecessarily and because of negligence and a want of due care. It was properly left to the jury to say from all the circumstances, taking into consideration the location of the trap and the width of the channel, whether appellant's action in going outside of the usual channel and course of vessels was the result of an unfair or negligent exercise of its right of navigation."

Instruction No. 26 is entirely consistent with instructions 3 and 4, and is in harmony with the construction which the plaintiff places upon these two instructions. Instruction No. 8, however, told the jury that it was the duty of the defendant to navigate its vessel in the channel and the usual course taken by boats. When this instruction is considered in the light of all the instructions which had been previously given, and in connection with instruction No. 9, it was equivalent to charging the jury that, if the defendant got outside of the channel or usual course taken by vessels, that fact alone and of itself convicted the defendant of negligence; for, after saying in instruction No. 8 that it was the duty of the defendant to operate its boat in the usual course taken by other vessels, the court said in instruction No. 9 that, if "defendant failed to perform any one or more of these duties," then the defendant was negligent. It was not negligent per se for the defendant to navigate the flotilla outside of and beyond the course usually followed by vessels. It was a question of fact for the jury to say whether the defendant failed to exercise ordinary care in the navigation of its flotilla. It may fairly be assumed that the defendant conceded that when its flotilla left Bugby hole its captain intended to follow the usual course taken by vessels, and did not intend to go between the Brandt and Anderson traps; the defendant does not contend that the business in which it was engaged required it to go outside of the usual course, or to navigate the waters between the Brandt and Anderson traps; and consequently the ultimate question of fact is whether the defendant failed to use due care when transporting the rock down the river; and although a failure to keep within the usual course taken by vessels is not negligence as a matter of law, nevertheless, as stated in Porter v. Allen, 8 Ind. 1, 4, 65 Am. Dec. 750, "though it was proper for the jury to consider the fact" that the boat was not in the usual and ordinary channel where boats are usually run, "in connection with the other facts proved in the case, still it was alone insufficient to control the verdict."

The charge to the jury should, of course, in this as in all cases, be considered as a whole, with the view of ascertaining, if possible, whether the rights of the appealing litigant were so prejudiced as to prevent a fair trial. Instruction No. 8 was not a mere parenthetical statement made during the course of the charge, but it stands out as prominently as any other single instruction appearing in the charge, and it contains plain language which the jury could not have misunderstood; and hence a reversal of the judgment becomes necessary.

The defendant insists that the Anderson trap was an unlawful obstruction. The plaintiff was authorized by both the state of Washington and the United States to erect and maintain the trap. All the evidence shows that the trap was neither above nor below the place indicated in the permits, although there is a controversy as to whether or not the trap extended farther out into the river than allowed by the permit given by the United States. The defendant argues that all that part of the trap which was taken out when the flotilla went through the lead was beyond the limits fixed by the permit. The evidence shows conclusively that the 24 piling taken out were either in whole or in part within the limits of the Federal permit. The defendant argues that the trap exceeded the length allowed by the permit by 180 feet. Even though it be assumed that the trap was 180 feet too long, still it must be remembered that the heart was 50 feet wide, and if to this width is added the distance covered by the 1 or 2 piling left standing next to the heart, and also the distance covered by the 24 piling taken out, it will be seen that only a part of the obstruction was unlawful, in the sense that it exceeded the authority given to the plaintiff. If, on the other hand, the trap did not extend beyond the point allowed by the permit, then all of it was authorized, and no part of it was an illegal obstruction. No part of the trap was within the usual course followed by vessels going up or down the river.

The defendant has urged with much vigor that this is a local action, and therefore triable only in the state of Washington. The plaintiff first obtained a permit from the United States in 1901, and he operated under that permit until 1912, when he received a new permit. In each year of that period, except possibly four or five years, when he did not put in the trap, the plaintiff drove the piling for his trap and completed its construction a short time before the fish began to run, and then, when the fishing season ended for that year, he pulled out the piling and removed the trap. No part of the trap was driven into the earth, except the piling; and all the piling were driven by the owner with the intention on his part of removing them at the end of the season; and hence the trap was only personal property. Water—

Johnson v. Pacific Land Co. 84 Or. 356, 164 Pac. 564; Roseburg Nat. Bank v. Camp, 89 Or. 67, 173 Pac. 313. The trap was only an appliance used by the plaintiff in the exercise of his right to fish. The action is not one for trespass upon real property; nor is it prosecuted on account of any assault upon the right of fishery. The trap was personal property, and was used as an appliance by the plaintiff, a salmon fisherman; and when that appliance was damaged, the result was not different in principle from the situation presented by some person negligently breaking an ordinary trout rod, which the owner was using for casting from the bank into a stream, and even though the trout fisherman owned the bank upon which he stood while casting. The injury complained of was damage to the trap, and the action is transitory.

The next question relates to the measure of damages. The court said to the jury that if the plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, he was entitled "to such damages as you may find from a preponderance of the evidence will fairly compensate him for the loss he has suffered;" and that "there are two elements of damage to be considered by you: First, you will consider and determine from the evidence the reasonable amount that it would be necessary to expend to repair plaintiff's trap and restore it to the same or as good condition as it was before the injury; second, you will determine from the evidence the value of the use of plaintiff's trap during such time as it was necessarily delayed by the injury to it. The sum of these two elements so determined by you would be the amount plaintiff is entitled to, if entitled to any sum."

Besides evidence relating to the cost of repairing the trap there was testimony concerning the number of fish caught by the Anderson trap before the accident, and also after the trap was repaired, as well as testimony about the catch made by other traps in that locality and on the same side of the river. The Anderson trap had been in operation from September 10, 1911. There was evidence to the effect that the catch made by the Anderson trap averaged 1,500 or 1,600 pounds a day for a few days before the accident; that the fish "generally run steady on that place there, right along; when we have a run, we have one at about the same time as the other places." The plaintiff testified that the "run of silver side salmon" continued during the period of two weeks while his trap was out of repair, "because the rest of the traps above me and below me had lots of fish at the time when she was broke off;" that during those two weeks the traps above and below his trap "were catching up to a couple of tons a day;" that after the trap was repaired the average catch was "about 1,600 or 1,700 pounds per day." Charles Brandt, who was an experienced trap fisherman and thoroughly familiar with the Anderson trap, testified that he knew the reasonable value of the use of the Anderson trap, and that its value was "between $50 and $60 a day" during "the time she was broke down;" however, he also stated that he never knew of a trap having been rented for a money rental, but that all the leases coming to his knowledge had been "on the shares." This witness further explained that the Anderson trap "was a trap that caught the fish, and she is the best trap there is in" that locality; that he "would be willing to pay the man $50 a day for the use of that trap," and that "I go on the basis of what catch she is making" when estimating the value of the trap. The weather conditions, according to all the evidence, were favorable. The foregoing is substantially all the evidence relating to the value of the use of the trap.

The defendant contends that it was error to receive evidence of the average catch of the Anderson trap before and after the accident; that the testimony about the catch made by other traps, located above and below the Anderson trap, was erroneous. The defendant took the position that the occupation of a fisherman is uncertain and precarious, and that his profits are necessarily speculative, and for that reason the defendant requested, but the court refused to give, the following instructions: "The value of the fish trap of the plaintiff, if you should find that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, is a matter of easy determination, and inasmuch as the trap is put in for one season only, I charge you that the measure of damages for the use of the trap is interest upon such value as you may find the trap to have had at the time of this injury for such period as you may deem reasonable, but not over the period of one year at the rate of 6 per centum (6%)."

The law aims to allow full and complete compensation to an innocent party who has been damaged by the breach of a contract or the commission of a tort. In practice, the law does not prove false to its theory by banning profits merely because of their nature as profits; but, upon the contrary, the law endeavors faithfully to realize its aim by allowing compensation for profits which it is reasonably certain would have been made, if the wrong complained of had not been done. Allison v. Chandler, 11 Mich. 542; 8 R. C. L. 501; Bredemeier v. Pacific Supply Co. 64 Or. 576, 131 Pac. 312; Fields v. Western Union Teleg. Co. 68 Or. 209, 217, 137 Pac. 200; McGinnis v. Studebaker, 75 Or. 519, L.R.A. 1916B, 868, 146 Pac. 825, 147 Pac. 525, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 1190; Feeney & B. Co. v. Stone, 89 Or. 360, 171 Pac. 569, 174 Pac. 152; Fletcher v. Fischer, — Or. —, 182 Pac. 823. In the absence of malice the law endeavors to compel reparation rather than punishment. When attempting to compel reparation, the difficulties encountered by the administrators of the law consist in the application rather than in the interpretation of the rules prescribed for the measurement of damages. There is no single rule applicable alike to all cases, involving profits which may be taken into account, when fixing the amount of compensation for the breach of a contract or the commission of a tort. In some cases profits constitute either the sole or one of the elements of damages, and therefore are to be taken as the measure of the amount of compensation; and in other cases profits constitute only an item of evidence to be taken into consideration, together with other evidence, by the jury when fixing the amount of compensation.

profits as an element of damages, and hence, if entitled to recover on his theory of the case, he would be entitled to have this element of damage measured by the amount of the profits. The instruction of the court, however, is based on the theory that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the value of the use of the trap, and we think that the theory of the trial court is —value of use. correct and in harmony with the principle which supports the holding in Williams v. Island City Mercantile & Mill. Co. 25 Or. 573, 37 Pac. 49. One witness testified that he never knew of a trap having been rented for a money rental, and hence it may be that the trap does not have a rental value, in the same sense that the words "rental value" are used when referring to a storeroom or a dwelling house in a city; and yet the trap did have a usable value. The trap was usable for only one purpose, and it was valuable for that, and no other purpose, and the damages must, in order to award compensation, be ascertained by an inquiry into the value of the use of the property to the injured party for the time he was deprived of it. Past results ought to be of some aid in fixing the usable value, and in the very nature of things one of the first inquiries that one would naturally make when estimating the usable value of the trap would be: How many fish did the trap catch? Admission of evidence concerning the catches made by the trap before the injury is fully supported by the doctrine stated in Williams v. Island City Mercantile & Mill. Co. See also the luminous opinion in Standard Supply Co. v. Carter, 81 S. C. 181, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 155, 62 S. E. 150. While the past success of the trap is not controlling, it is nevertheless one of the factors which may be taken into consideration, not as the measure of damages, but to aid the jury in estimating damages. Post v. Munn, 4 N. J. L. 61, 63, 7 Am. Dec. 570;

If the complaint is strictly construed, it must be interpreted to mean that the plaintiff is suing for

profits as an element of damages, and hence, if entitled to recover on his theory of the case, he would be entitled to have this element of damage measured by the amount of the profits. The instruction of the court, however, is based on the theory that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the value of the use of the trap, and we think that the theory of the trial court is —value of use. correct and in harmony with the principle which supports the holding in Williams v. That there was a good run of fish during the two weeks is evidenced, the plaintiff says, by the fact that the weather conditions were good, by the significant circumstances that other traps in the same locality, but less favorably situated than the Anderson trap, caught each day "up to a couple of tons a day," and by the important fact that, when the Anderson trap was repaired, it caught each day from 1,600 to 1,700 pounds of fish. Does not this evidence of the catches made during the two weeks, as well as the catches made immediately afterwards, serve to make more certain any inference of usable value that may be drawn from prior results? Obviously the testimony about the run and catch of fish during the two weeks when the trap was out of repair and the catches made by the Anderson trap when again put in repair constituted data which would be very helpful in fixing the usable value of the trap for those two weeks. The fishing season is of comparatively short duration, and consequently the usable value of the trap might be negligible at one time of the year and considerable at another. In brief, the evidence under discussion was competent, not for the purpose of measuring the compensation to be paid to the plaintiff, but for the purpose of aiding the jury in estimating the usable or rental value of the trap.

There are other exceptions presented by the record, but, since the questions arising out of them are not likely to recur upon a retrial, we deem further discussion unnecessary.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

McBride, Ch. J., and Burnett and Benson, JJ., concur.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Harris, J., on November 25, 1919, handed down the following additional opinion (— Or. —, 185 Pac. 231):

In the original opinion we ruled that instruction No. 8 made it necessary to reverse the judgment. The plaintiff earnestly insists in the petition for a rehearing that instruction No. 8, which was given at the request of plaintiff, "is merely a statement with which everyone will agree, namely, that it was the duty of appellant to operate and navigate its vessel where vessels should be operated and navigated."

The petition for a rehearing contains no new argument, for at the hearing, as well as in his printed brief, the plaintiff vigorously contended that instruction No. 8 was devoid of error, and the reasons given for that contention were the same as those now assigned by him. However, we have again examined and considered the record with the same result as before. As stated in the original opinion, this instruction was not a parenthetical statement, but, upon the contrary, it stood out as boldly and prominently as any other instruction. When instruction No. 8 is viewed in the light of the allegation that, "although there was at said time and place a fixed channel and course in which vessels navigating said river should be operated, said defendant carelessly and negligently failed to keep and to maintain said tugboat within the limits of said channel and carelessly and negligently navigated said vessel outside and beyond said fixed course and channel," and when this instruction is viewed in the light of the evidence concerning the location of the course usually followed by vessels, it appears manifest to us that the instruction in effect stated to the jurors that it was the duty of the defendant to navigate its flotilla in the channel and course usually taken by boats.

Among other instructions, the court gave, at the request of the defendant, instruction No. 29, which reads as follows: "Vessels navigating the Columbia river are not required to keep in the dredged channel, where there is a dredged channel, nor in the center of the navigable channel. For instance, you may legally and without negligence navigate any part of the navigable channel of said river where the depth of water is sufficient therefor."

The plaintiff now argues, just as he contended in his printed brief, that instruction No. 8 is not prejudicial when considered in connection with instruction No. 29. The answer to this argument is that one instruction is inconsistent with the other. Construing instruction No. 8 as we do, then the inevitable conclusion is that this instruction was prejudicial error. We adhere to the original opinion and the conclusion there reached.

ANNOTATION.

Liability for damage by vessel to nets or other articles used in fishing.

General rule.

The right of navigation is superior to the right of fishing, and no liability attaches for injury to fishing apparatus by a vessel engaged in the bona fide exercise of the right of navigation, in the absence of proof of wantonness, maliciousness, or unnecessary damage. The City of Baltimore (1872) 5 Ben. 474, Fed. Cas. No. 2,744; Lewis v. Keeling (1854) 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 299, 62 Am. Dec. 168; ANDERSON v. COLUMBIA CONTRACT Co. (reported herewith) ante, 653. See also Anonymous (1808) 1 Campb. (Eng.) 517.

Thus, in Lewis v. Keeling (1854) 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 299, 62 Am. Dec. 168, it appeared that the defendant's steamboat, in approaching the shore of a navigable river to take on a passenger, ran on and destroyed a seine used by the plaintiffs in their fishery. The court held that the right of navigation was paramount to the right of fishing, and therefore the defendant had a right to bring his steamboat to the river bank for the purposes of his vocation, and he was not liable for the destruction of a fishing net in so operating the boat, in the absence of proof of wanton or malicious destruction. The court said: "A boat on a navigable stream has a right to 'take her course,' and to go to the bank, when and where it is necessary to do so, doing no unnecessary damage, and acting without wantonness or malice; and is not obliged to stop or go out of her way, or wait upon the movements of those who are managing a seine or net, which they are permitted to use by the sufferance of the sovereign, and not as a right conferred by grant. This is the only line that can be established, plain enough for practical purposes. There must be no wantonness or malice,—no unnecessary damage,—but a bona fide exercise of the paramount right of navigation."

In The City of Baltimore (1872) 5 Ben. 474, Fed. Cas. No. 2,744, wherein it appeared that a steamship, while entering the harbor of New York, on her usual course, ran over a seine containing a quantity of fish, tearing the net and liberating the fish, the court held that a libel against the vessel must be dismissed, for, it appearing that the ship was traveling in her regular course, and that a deviation therefrom would have incurred danger of grounding, there was no negligence on her part.

See also Anonymous (Eng.) supra, an early English case brought for disturbing the plaintiff's fishery by the moving of a vessel in such a manner that the plaintiff was prevented from taking as many fish as he would otherwise have done, wherein the court said: "A navigable river is a public highway, and all persons have a right to come there in ships, and to unload, moor, and stay there as long as they please. Nevertheless, if they abuse that right so as to work a private injury, they are liable to an action. The question will therefore be, whether the defendant has abused his right? The privilege of the plaintiff must be subservient to the right of the public. It would be of very mischievous consequences if the owner of a fishery could prescribe to the public how and where they are to moor in a navigable river. . . . The defendant had a right to moor and remain where his ship lay, as long as convenience required. Yet, if he acted wantonly and maliciously for the purpose of injuring the fishery, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict, but not otherwise."

Limitation of rule.

The rule that there is no liability for injury to fishing paraphernalia necessarily damaged by a vessel in the fair and reasonable exercise of the right of navigation is strictly limited, however, to those cases wherein it does not appear that the injury was caused wantonly, maliciously, or negligently; and where these circumstances appear, the courts hold the wrongdoer liable.

Canada.—Snowball v. Donovan (1895) 33 N. B. 182; Hubbard v. Dickie (1906) 39 N. S. 506; Smith v. Northern Constr. Co. (1914) 30 Ont. L. Rep. 494, 5 Ont. Week. N. 789, 19 D. L. R. 380.

Thus, in Post v. Munn (N. J.) supra, an action in trespass, it appeared that the plaintiff was the owner of a fishery on a navigable river, and the defendant, who was the master of a boat on the same river, in sailing his boat, ran on a net thrown out by the plaintiff, tearing and injuring the same. The court held that while the right of fishery was subordinate to the right of navigation, nevertheless, the master of a vessel was liable for a wilful destruction of a net in the exercise of the superior right.

And in Cobb v. Bennett (1874) 75 Pa. 326, 15 Am. Rep. 752, wherein the plaintiff contended that the defendant wantonly ran his vessel into the former's fishing net, greatly injuring it, it appeared that the defendant, on being warned of the presence of the net, could have changed his course without prejudice to the reasonable prosecution of his voyage. The court held that the defendant was liable for the damage complained of, saying: "A vessel is entitled to take her course in the navigation of the river, and to hold it without regard to the fisherman's net, provided the master act without wantonness or malice, and do no unnecessary damage. This is an obvious consequence of the superior right of navigation. But this, we think, was the very doctrine of the charge, and the exception contained in the qualification in view of the facts in evidence. If the mariner, warned of the position of the net and requested to change his tack, may do so 'without prejudice to the reasonable prosecution of his voyage,' can we say he is exercising his superior right of navigation justly, and in the spirit of the maxim, "sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas," if, indifferent to the inferior right, he recklessly holds on his way and fouls and injures the fisherman's net? Certainly we cannot say this, for in effect it would be to say a fisherman has no rights whatever; that being no right which another may disregard under all circumstances."

In Wright v. Mulvaney (Wis.) supra, wherein it appeared that the defendant's steam tug ran through a fish net of the plaintiff, and it appeared, further, that at the time of the occurrence it was broad daylight, and those in charge of the tug could have easily seen the net and changed the boat's course so as to avoid it, the court held that the defendant was liable for the negligence of his servants, although the injury was not caused wantonly or maliciously.

Where it appeared that a steamboat had a clear and wide channel in which it could have been so operated as not to interfere with the plaintiff, the court held that the owners of the boat were liable for the unnecessary damage caused the plaintiff's fishing boat and nets, saying: "The steamboat should exercise her paramount right of navigation in a bona fide manner, so as to do no unnecessary damage." Horst v. Columbia Contract Co. (1918) 89 Or. 344, 174 Pac. 161.

See, to the same effect, Hopkins v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. (1902) 131 N. C. 463, 42 S. E. 902.

In Hubbard v. Dickie (1906) 39 N. S. 506, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's fish net was carried away and destroyed by the negligent navigation of the defendant's towboat, the court held that the defendant was liable for the damage caused by his negligence, it appearing that the course of the boat could have been altered without danger, so as to avoid hitting the nets.

In Fowler v. Harrison (1905) 39 Wash. 617, 81 Pac. 1055, wherein it appeared that the appellants wilfully, deliberately, and wantonly ran their steamboat into and destroyed the fish traps and nets of the respondent, the court held that they were liable for the damage caused thereby, for, conceding that the traps and nets were not lawfully in the stream, nevertheless, the appellants would not be justified in maliciously and wilfully destroying the same.

In Smith v. Northern Constr. Co. (1914) 30 Ont. L. Rep. 494, 19 D. L. R. 380, wherein the respondent sought to recover damages for the loss sustained by him owing to the destruction of his fish nets by the appellant, it appeared that the appellant was engaged in towing "a large boom of logs or saw timber and ties" on the waters of the bay, and was using for that purpose "a tug or steam vessel known as an alligator," and in the process of towing and warping, "in addition to the usual methods of propulsion," a large steel cable and anchor were attached to a tree or other solid object upon the land, and the cable was wound up by steam power on a drum on the alligator, and in that way the alligator and her tow were hauled along. It appeared further that, in so operating the tug and tow, an anchor was put out in the water in front of the alligator; and, upon an attempt being made to wind the cable to which the anchor was attached, it was found that the anchor did not hold. The cable was then let go, and either then, or in taking it to the shore of the island to attach it to a tree, it caught the nets and destroyed them. The court held that the appellant was liable for the damage caused by the negligence of its servants, for it was not justified in wilfully impinging upon or destroying the nets, and was bound to use due care and skill in the navigation of the vessel, saying: "The man in charge of the tow knew or ought to have known that there were or were likely to be nets set out in the eastern channel; he had been instructed to be careful to avoid injuring nets, and yet no precaution whatever to that end was taken. There was, as I have said, no reason why the cable which caught the nets and destroyed them should have been let go and permitted to ground. The channel which was taken was not the one used in such an operation as that in which the appellant was engaged, and there was no necessity for taking the eastern channel. If the wind was such that the alligator could not take the western channel, there was nothing to prevent it being anchored or fastened to a tree on the shore; but, in spite of the fact that the wind would not permit of the westerly channel being taken, and was so strong that the alligator was unable to keep to its course, those navigating it deliberately proceeded by the easterly channel, with which they were little acquainted, and that, too, upon a dark night."

In the reported case (ANDERSON v. COLUMBIA CONTRACT Co. ante, 653) the court holds that it was proper to submit to the jury the question whether the defendant negligently operated its towboat in such a manner as to cause the injury to the plaintiff's fish traps, holding that while the right of fishery must give way to the paramount right of navigation, the latter right must be exercised in a bona fide and fair manner, and with due regard to the subordinate right of fishery, and the boat must be so navigated as not to do unnecessary damage.

In Snowball v. Donovan (1895) 33 N. B. 182, wherein it appeared that a warp holding a raft at anchor broke, and the raft crashed into the plaintiff's nets, seriously damaging them, the court held that the evidence was sufficient to justify the jury in finding the defendant guilty of negligence, and liable for the damage sustained.

ERROR to the District Court for Cotton County (Jones, J.) to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover amounts alleged to be due on five certain negotiable bills of acceptance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. L. K. Revelle, for plaintiff in error:

The defenses and counterclaim set up in the answers are wholly insufficient on their face to constitute a defense or counterclaim to the action brought, and are wholly without merit on the identical question sought to be raised by said answers.

Messrs. Dudley B. Madden and W. A. Ruggles for defendant in error.

Stewart, C., filed the following opinion:

This case involves liability of the defendant to the plaintiff on five negotiable bills of acceptance, each for $59.20 and bearing date January 20, 1914, payable to the order of National Novelty Import Company, due respectively four months, six months, eight months, ten months, and twelve months after date. The plaintiff corporation alleged that it was the owner and holder of such bills in due course for valuable consideration and by due indorsement before maturity; that the defendant had paid on the first due the sum of $25 on July 2, 1914, and the further sum of $25 on July 21, 1914, as shown by indorsement thereon. The defendant filed answer, admitting the execution of the bills, but denying that the plaintiff was the owner or holder of the same in due course, and denying that the same were transferred and indorsed to said plaintiff for valuable consideration before maturity. The answer was not verified, but afterwards defendant filed what was called "Amendment to Answer," which was signed and verified, reading as follows: "I, F. D. Davis, being first duly sworn, on my oath say that I am defendant in the above-entitled action, and that the certain denial contained in the above and foregoing answer in said action, in words as follows, to wit: 'especially denies that said bills of exchange mentioned in said bill of particulars were transferred and indorsed to said plaintiff for a valuable consideration before maturity,' is true."

The defendant alleged that said bills of acceptance were signed in pursuance of a contract made with the National Novelty Import Company by its agent and representative T. K. Smith for the purchase of certain articles of jewelry, and that defendant had sustained damages in the sum of $500 because of breach of an alleged warranty of such goods. The evidence shows that the payee indorsed the bills of acceptance before maturity to the plaintiff, and received valuable consideration therefor; that plaintiff had no knowledge of any defense to the same, there being no evidence tending to disprove such facts. The trial court, however, submitted the cause to the jury on the issue of damages, and, the jury returning a verdict for the defendant, the trial court rendered judgment accordingly, from which judgment the plaintiff duly appeals.

The trial court refused, on request of the plaintiff, to instruct the jury on the question of the plaintiff being an innocent purchaser for value and a holder in due course. Such failure of the court is assigned by the plaintiff as error, and it is also contended that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment on the pleadings and under the undisputed evidence. The defendant urges that his amendment to the answer, in which he says that he "denies that said bills of acceptance mentioned in the bill of particulars were transferred and indorsed to plaintiff for valuable consideration before maturity is true," was sufficient to put in issue the indorsement of the bills of acceptance under § 4759, Rev. Laws 1910, providing, among other things, that "allegations of the execution of written instruments and indorsements thereon, . . . shall be taken as true unless the denial . . . be verified by the affidavit of the party, his agent or attorney."

We cannot agree with learned counsel for defendant; the affidavit does not deny the indorsement, but denies that the bills were indorsed to plaintiff for a valuable consideration before maturity. The averment is not sufficient to put in issue the allegation of plaintiff as to the indorsements, which indorsements denial of transfer of

of themselves import valuable consideration, and it is provided in § 4095, Rev. Laws 1910, as follows: "Except where an indorsement bears date after the maturity of the instrument, every negotiation is deemed prima facie to have been effected before the instrument was overdue."

The indorsements in the instant case bearing no date, it must therefore be presumed that they were made before maturity. Even if the answer were sufficient to put in issue the question of indorsements, there was evidence introduced showing that the indorsements were duly made, and there is no evidence to the contrary.

It is contended, however, by the defendant that the evidence shows that the indorsements were made by the use of a rubber stamp, and therefore are not sufficient. The means by which an indorsement is made are not so important as is the intention of the purported indorsee. An indorsement of the name of the payee on a bill of acceptance by means of a rubber stamp is sufficient, —indorsement by stamp. if such indorsement was made by authority of the payee, and there is no presumption of want of such authority when the indorsee in a suit on the instrument indorsed alleges due indorsement. The maker of the bills of acceptance in the case at bar is, therefore, in no position to complain as to the manner of indorsement. Cadillac State Bank v. Cadillac Stave & Heading Co. 129 Mich. 15, 88 N. W. 67; Deep River Nat. Bank's Appeal, 73 Conn. 341, 47 Atl. 675; Herrick v. Morrill, 37 Minn. 250, 5 Am. St. Rep. 841, 33 N. W. 849. Under both the pleadings and evidence in this case the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to render judgment for the plaintiff for the face of the bills of acceptance, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent from their respective dates of maturity, less the amounts paid, to be credited as of the dates same were paid, and costs.

ANNOTATION.

Sufficiency of signing or indorsing a bill or note by printing or stamping.

The sufficiency of a printed or stamped signature or indorsement to a bill or note has generally been sustained. Pennington v. Baehr (1874) 48 Cal. 565 (facsimile of signature of public official printed on interest coupons attached to bonds); Lexington v. Union Nat. Bank (1897) 75 Miss. 1, 22 So. 291 (lithographed signature of public official to interest coupons attached to bonds); Mayers v. McRimmon (1906) 140 N. C. 640, 111 Am. St. Rep. 879, 53 S. E. 447 (rubber stamp indorsement); Rosenberg v. Germania

Bank (1904) 44 Misc. 233, 88 N. Y. Supp. 952 (obiter); METROPOLITAN DISCOUNT Co. v. DAVIS (reported herewith) ante, 670; Carroll v. Mitchell-Park Mfg. Co. (1910) 60 Tex. Civ. App. 263, 128 S. W. 446 (note signed with rubber stamp); Midkiff v. Johnson County Sav. Bank (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 144 S. W. 705 ("transfers upon the back of . . . acceptances . . . by printed signatures, presumably with rubber stamp").

A stamped indorsement has been sustained under the requirement of the Negotiable Instruments Act that an indorsement must be "written" on the instrument itself, or on a paper attached thereto. American Union Trust Co. v. Never Break Range Co. (1916) 196 Mo. App. 206, 190 S. W. 1045; Flanders v. Snare (1908) 37 Pa. Super. Ct. 28. In American Union Trust Co. v. Never Break Range Co. (Mo.) supra, the court states that the question is placed beyond debate by the further provision of the Negotiable Instruments Law that, unless the context otherwise requires, "written" includes printed, and "writing" includes print. The corporation whose indorsement was in question in this case had several times recognized the rubber stamp indorsement as its own, and had ratified it and agreed to have an official sign under it if that was desired. Upon the general question of whether a signature by a rubber stamp is sufficient, the court states that the fact "that this indorsement was not 'in writing,' in the literal sense of the word 'writing,' is entirely immaterial. It has been many times held that affixing a rubber stamp to an instrument is sufficient in law to fulfill the requirement that the indorsement of the name must be written, or in writing, if the stamp is affixed with the intent of using it as an indorsement." Practically the same reasoning with reference to the Negotiable Instruments Act appears in Flanders v. Snare (Pa.) supra.

It is stated in Weston v. Myers (1864) 33 Ill. 424, that a person whose name was printed on a due bill, by issuing the bill for value, adopted the printed signature thereon as his own, and became thereby bound in the same manner as if he had written it himself. The court further states: "We think it makes no difference, so far as the defendant's liability is concerned, whether he wrote his name in script or Roman letters, or whether such letters were made with a pen or with type, or whether he printed, engraved, photographed, or lithographed them, so long as he adopted and issued the signature as his own. It is true that a written signature in script may be a safer mode of subscribing one's name, but where a party has adopted a signature made in any other mode and has issued an instrument with such adopted signature for value, he is estopped from denying its validity."

There is no opinion in Pennington v. Baehr (1874) 48 Cal. 565, supra. The action in that case was an application for writ of mandamus to require the state treasurer to pay interest on bonds, as evidenced by the coupons attached thereto. The refusal to make the payment was based on the ground that the name of the president of the fund commissioners had been printed upon the coupons and not written with his own hand. It was contended for the treasurer that a facsimile could not be adopted as a signature without express authority of law, and that, since no express authority of law appeared in this case, the signature was invalid. The court ordered the mandamus to issue as prayed for without writing any opinion.

Printed or stamped indorsements and signatures have been treated as valid in some cases, without any question being raised. First Nat. Bank v. Smith (1882) 132 Mass. 227 (stamped indorsement); Cadillac State Bank v. Cadillac State & Heading Co. (1901) 129 Mich. 15, 83 N. W. 67 (corporate notes on which the corporate name was impressed with a rubber stamp, "per . . . manager," held valid); McKee v. Vernon County (1874) 3 Dill. 210, Fed. Cas. No. 8,851 (interest coupons to county bonds on which coupons the signatures of the proper officials were lithographed held valid obligations); Thompson v. Big Cities Realty & Agency Co. (1910) 21 Ont. L. Rep. 394 (rubber stamp corporate signature to note, as a part of which the names of the president and treasurer appeared in writing, sustained).

There are certain conditions prerequisite to the sufficiency of a stamped signature or indorsement. These have been variously stated. A condition quite generally announced is that the signature or indorsement must be made by the authority of the person whose signature or indorsement it purports to be. Mayers v. McRimmon (1906) 140 N. C. 640, 111 Am. St. Rep. 879, 53 S. E. 447; METROPOLITAN DISCOUNT CO. v. DAVIS (reported herewith) ante, 670. It has been stated that the person whose signature is printed or stamped must adopt it as his signature. Pennington v. Baehr (1874) 48 Cal. 565; Weston v. Myers (1864) 38 Ill. 424; Midkiff v. Johnson County Sav. Bank (1912) — Tex. Civ.

App. —, 144 S. W. 705. In case of an indorsement it has been stated that the stamp must be affixed with the intent to use it as an indorsement. American Union Trust Co. v. Never Break Range Co. (1916) 196 Mo. App. 206, 190 S. W. 1045, see supra; Mayers v. McRimmon (1906) 140 N. C. 640, 111 Am. St. Rep. 879, 53 S. E. 447.

ARTHUR J. ADAMS, Doing Business as the Crystal Mirror & Beveling Company, and

ROBERT LONGMIRE, Garnishee, Appt.

(Fuller & Co. v. Longmire, 97 Wash. 254, 166 Pac. 623.)

Estoppel — leaving property in possession of relative.

A mother who permits her minor son to have possession of machinery belonging to her, for use in a business conducted by him, knowing that he held himself out as the owner of the machinery, is estopped to assert title to it against one who gives him credit for goods furnished for use in the business without knowledge of the true ownership of the property.

APPEAL by garnishee defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County (Card, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the purchase price of goods sold by plaintiff to defendant Adams. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court, except that appellant's brief states that the property involved consisted of beveling machines used in the manufacturing processes of the son's business.

Mr. H. W. Lueders, for appellant:

Defendant's mother is not estopped from claiming the property in question, and cannot be held for the obligations incurred by her minor son.

Messrs. Raymond J. McMillan and Ernest K. Murray for respondent.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced in the superior court for Pierce county by the plaintiff, W. P. Fuller & Company, seeking recovery of the purchase price of goods sold by it to the defendant Arthur J. Adams. Thereafter a writ of garnishment was issued in the action at the instance of the plaintiff, directed to Robert Longmire, sheriff of Pierce county, requiring him to answer as to property in his possession belonging to the defendant. He answered the writ, admitting that he had in his possession certain personal property, describing it, claimed by the plaintiff to be the property of the defendant, but alleged that it was in fact the property of Carrie Adams, the mother of the defendant. This allegation of ownership of Carrie Adams was controverted by the plaintiff. Thereafter the issue so raised was tried by the court together with the issues raised by the pleadings in the original action, resulting in findings and judgments in favor of the plaintiff as against both the original and garnishee defendants. The court directed the sale of the property in the hands of Longmire as garnishee defendant, and the proceeds thereof applied to the payment of the judgment rendered against the original defendant. From this disposition of the cause the garnishee defendant Longmire has appealed to this court. The original defendant Adams has not appealed, so the controversy here is only between the plaintiff and Longmire as garnishee defendant.

It appears that the defendant Adams was, at the time of purchasing the goods for the purchase price of which judgment was rendered against him in respondent's favor, a minor about twenty years old. At the time of purchasing the goods he was carrying on the business indicated by the name Crystal Mirror & Beveling Company. The goods were sold to him by respondent for use in that business. The business was being carried on by him as his own, he having entire control thereof with knowledge and consent of his mother, who was then his natural guardian, his father having died some time previous. This property is in the hands of appellant as garnishee was property used in the business, and had been seized by appellant as sheriff in proceedings looking to the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage thereon, which had been executed by defendant Adams, which property remained in appellant's possession at the conclusion of the foreclosure proceedings. It was claimed by Mrs. Adams as her property, she claiming that it had been loaned by her to her son for use in the business, and it was because of this claim made by Mrs. Adams that appellant resists the claim of the plaintiff that it be sold to satisfy the judgment against defendant Arthur J. Adams. Mrs. Adams was not a party to the original action, nor to this garnishment proceeding. The trial court found that "Carrie Adams is and was the mother of the defendant Arthur J. Adams, and at all times was informed and knew that said Arthur J. Adams was holding himself out as the owner of the personal property above described, and that he was conducting the business of said Crystal Mirror & Beveling Company as his own and obtaining credit therein, and said Carrie Adams by her conduct is estopped to assert as against the plaintiff that said Arthur J. Adams is not the owner of said personal property."

This finding, we think, is amply supported by the evidence. Plainly, we think, whatever right to this property Carrie Adams may have as against her son Arthur J. Adams, it must be held to be his property so far as the rights of the plaintiff in this cause are concerned.

Estoppel—leaving property in possession of relative.

Some other contentions are made by counsel for appellant. We think they are wholly without merit so far as the present controversy is concerned. We may observe that they relate for the most part to questions arising in the original action, and not to questions arising between respondent and appellant. We are not here concerned with alleged errors occurring in the rendering of the judgment against the defendant Arthur J. Adams, since no appeal is taken therefrom.

The judgment against appellant Longmire as garnishee is affirmed.

Ellis, Ch. J., and Fullerton, Mount, and Holcomb, JJ., concur.

Petition for rehearing denied.

I. Scope.

This note is limited to the question whether the owner of a personal chattel who permits another to use it in his business is thereby estopped to assert title to it as against a creditor or purchaser of the possessor. It is not intended, in general, to cover the question of the effect of such permission and consequent possession coupled with other indicia of title or accompanied by other acts or conduct, which, together with said permission and possession, would amount to an estoppel, though the cases are rarely without some evidence of other acts or conduct besides the permission. The note excludes cases of securities, or of slaves, or of property in the hands of agents, or sold, or conditionally sold. It also excludes questions between the bailor and the bailee's assignees for creditors, or his trustee in bankruptcy. In some states there are statutes governing the question of verbal loans, at least, to some extent.

II. General principles.

"It is said to be a fundamental principle of our law of personal property that no man can be divested of it without his own consent; and consequently even an honest purchaser, under a defective title, cannot resist the claim of the true proprietor. The maxim that 'no one can transfer to another a better title than he has himself' obtains in the civil as well as the common law (Pothier, Traite du Contract du Vente, 1, n. 7; Erk. In. 418): and hence it is now recognized everywhere in civilized Europe, for 'a sale ex vi termini imports nothing more than that a bona fide purchaser succeeds only to the rights of the vendor.' 2 Kent, Com. 324; Saltus v. Everett (1838) 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 275, 32 Am. Dec. 541. In England, an exception is acknowledged in favor of sales effected in market overt; but, as in this country we have not adopted their notion of market overt, every transfer of chattels is, with us, to be considered in reference to the general law I have stated. . . . In the words of Lord Loughborough: 'Mere possession, without a just title, gives no property, and the person to whom such possession is transferred by delivery must take the hazard of the title of its author.' Bell, J., in McMahon v. Sloan (1849) 12 Pa. 229, 51 Am. Dec. 601. See also Kent, Ch. J., in Wheelwright v. De Peyster (1806) 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 471, 3 Am. Dec. 345.

A note to Wilbraham v. Snow (1671) 2 Wms. Saund. 47, 85 Eng. Reprint. 624, has this passage: "But it is said that if the bailee, or other person who has only a special property, sells and delivers the goods to another as his own, bona fide and without notice, the general owner cannot maintain this or any other action against the vendee, because by such a sale by a person who has a special property in, and possession in fact of, the goods, the property of the general owner is altered. Bro. Trespass, 216, 295." As to which Holmes, J., in Robinson v. Bird (1893) 158 Mass. 357, 35 Am. St. Rep. 495, 33 N. E. 391, says: "The mere fact that the plaintiffs made a bailment to Mrs. Bryant, and that she mortgaged the goods to Stetson, who took without notice and for value, and directed the present sale, is not such a justification. The passage to the contrary in the note to Wilbraham v. Snow (Eng.) supra, cited in Vincent v. Cornell (1833) 13 Pick. (Mass.)

296, 23 Am. Dec. 683, is a misunderstanding of the Yearbooks, on a matter as to which their doctrine no longer is the law, as everyone knows, and as may be seen from the later additional note."

"A purchaser from a lessee or bailee for hire, in possession by virtue of an ordinary lease, cannot withhold the property from the lessor or true owner, although he purchased for value and without notice." Guest Piano Co. v. Ricker (1916) 274 Ill. 448, 113 N. E. 717.

"In the absence of conduct amounting to fraud or deceit, the owner of the property will not be precluded from asserting his title against the creditors of one having the custody and manual possession thereof." Nisbet v. Federal Title & T. Co. (1916) 144 C. C. A. 54, 229 Fed. 644, writ of certiorari denied in (1916) 241 U. S. 669, 60 L. ed. 1229, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553.

In sustaining against the creditors of the bailee the ownership of one who lent farming implements to his brother to use on his farm, where they remained four years, the court said: "Large quantities of material are constantly being placed in the hands of artificers and manufacturers, for the purposes of being converted into goods, wares, and merchandise, and yet it is permitted to the owner to prove and hold his property, unless the transaction is tainted with fraud in fact. And it is believed that, so far as it relates to trade and commerce, the rule has always obtained that the character of the transaction may be shown. . . . No reason is perceived why a farmer may not hire or borrow stock and implements to carry on his business, or why the wealthy may not, of their abundance, leave their property to a poor neighbor or relative, to enable him to obtain a livelihood, without forfeiting the ownership. To so hold would cut off all the aid that may be kindly extended by the affluent to the industrious poor, who are willing, but unable, to contribute to the production, so essentially necessary to the support and well-being of society." Peters v. Smith (1867) 42 Ill. 417.

The doctrine of two innocent persons requires more than the bare possession of property loaned. William J. Lemp Brewing Co. v. Mantz (1918) 120 Md. 176, 87 Atl. 814.

Where the owner of a horse lent it to his brother, a sewing machine agent, who used it for a time and then pledged it to a third party, the court, in sustaining the owner's right, said: "We are also referred to the effect upon the owner's rights of his clothing another with the indicia of ownership, and to the rule by which it is determined which of two innocent parties must suffer. If the law referred to applied to cases like this it would soon put an end to lending and all other forms of bailment." Cox v. McGuire (1887) 26 Ill. App. 319.

Where the owner delivered a horse to another person to be kept for him on certain terms, with a certain division of the emoluments, in holding that the owner might recover the horse of one who innocently purchased it from such possessor, the court said: "The maxim that 'he who trusts most shall lose most' is said to apply in favor of the purchaser. But does not he who parts with a limited, qualified property, or use of a specific thing, capable of identification and recaption, trust less than he who pays his money, in its kind undistinguishable, to the vendor, upon his affirmation or assurance that the thing sold is his own?" Chism v. Woods (1808) Hardin (Ky.) 531, 3 Am. Dec. 740.

But compare, in this connection, Neale v. Sears (1868) 31 Tex. 105, infra, V.

In Larkin v. Parmelee (1897) 69 Conn. 79, 36 Atl. 1009, in holding that the owner of property which she permitted her brother to use in his business did not intend to represent an actual ownership in the bailee, the court said: "The doctrine of estoppel in pais especially concerns conscience and equity. Where one of two innocent persons must suffer, it is frequently—perhaps generally—equitable that the loss should fall upon the one who has been the cause of the injury, rather than upon the other, who is not only innocent, but without fault in the matter. And so, in applying the principle stated by Lord Denman in Pickard v. Sears (1837) 6 Ad. & El. 469, 112 Eng. Reprint, 179, 11 Eng. Rul. Cas. 78, we have held that 'whatever the motive may be, if one so acts or speaks that the natural consequence of his words and conduct will be to influence another to change his condition, he is legally chargeable with an intent, a wilful design, to induce the other to believe him, and to act upon that belief, if such proves to be the actual result.' And for the same reason, i. e., that the doctrine of estoppel in pais 'is so purely a doctrine of practical equity,' we have also held the imputing in each particular case, to a person whose course of action is unaccompanied by fraud or any culpability, knowledge of consequences that may follow his conduct, is not wholly subject to abstract formulas, but depends somewhat on the actual equities of the case. . . . As stated by Baldwin, J., in a recent case; 'An equitable estoppel does not so much shut out the truth as let in the truth, and the whole truth. Its office is not to support some strict rule of law, but to show what equity and good conscience require, under the particular circumstances of the case, irrespective of what might otherwise be the legal rights of the parties.' Canfield v. Gregory (1895) 66 Conn. 17, 33 Atl. 536."

It will be seen that the fact that the bailee puts his own name on the property with the knowledge of the bailor does not necessarily create an estoppel (Nisbet v. Federal Title & T. Co. (1916) 144 C. C. A. 54, 229 Fed. 644, writ of certiorari denied in (1916) 241 U. S. 669, 60 L. ed. 1229, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553 infra, IV.; *Larkin v. ## 2. Diamonds, etc.

Some of the cases of diamonds and the like are beyond the strict scope of this note, but they present features of a peculiar character.

In Charles Moe Co. v. J. H. Logue Co. (1908) 108 Ill. App. 128, it was held that a bona fide pledgee of a diamond from one to whom it had been loaned to show to a customer, and who was to return it the same day, as another had the refusal of it, could not retain it as against the owner.

If a dealer is intrusted with diamonds to show to a customer, but is not authorized to sell, a purchaser in good faith, and without notice of the facts as to the ownership, can acquire no title as against the owner, since mere possession does not confer the power to sell. Smith v. Clews (1889) 114 N. Y. 190, 4 L.R.A. 392, 11 Am. St. Rep. 627, 21 N. E. 160.

The owner of a diamond, by knowingly intrusting it to a dealer in jewelry for the purpose of obtaining a match for it, or, failing in that, to get an offer for it, does not thereby so put it in the power of the bailee to act as apparent owner as to estop the bailor from setting up title as against a subsequent purchaser without notice. Levi v. Booth (1882) 58 Md. 305, 42 Am. Rep. 332.

A bona fide purchaser of diamonds from one who obtained them from their owner, under the fraudulent representation that he had a customer for them, and would return them or their price in an hour, with the intention of appropriating them to his own use, acquires no title as against the bailor. Baehr v. Clark (1891) 83 Iowa, 813, 13 L.R.A. 717, 49 N. W. 840.

Where a person intrusts to another an article of diamond jewelry "upon the representation that it is to be exhibited to a third person with a view of selling it, and authorizes the sale to be made at a certain price, the person receiving the article to retain as his compensation any amount paid by the purchaser in excess of the price fixed by the owner, such person receiving does not thereby acquire the right to pawn the property for his own benefit, and the party to whom it may be delivered in pawn acquires no right thereby to hold it as against the owner." Frantz v. Winehill (1909) 124 La. 680, 50 So. 650; Frantz v. Fink (1909) 125 La. 1018, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 539, 52 So. 131.

3. Various.

The rule has been applied in case of a cash register (Kiewel v. Tanner (1908) 105 Minn. 50, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 772, 117 N. W. 231); a chronometer (Roberts v. Dillon (1869) 3 Daly (N. Y.) 50); stereotype plates (Agnew v. Johnson (1854) 22 Pa. 471, 62 Am. Dec. 303); a newspaper plant (Reid v. Mayo (1893) 45 La. 1091, 13 So. 799); tools (McInstry v. Tanner (1812) 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 135); a planing machine and lathe (Heisley v. Economy Tool Mfg. Co. (1907) 33 Pa. Super. Ct. 218); a moving picture machine (Adams v. Fellers (1911) 88 S. C. 212, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 385, 70 S. E. 722); a horse for use by a traveling man (Cox v. McGuire (1887) 26 Ill. App. 315); a race horse (Anderson v. Heile (1901) 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1115, 64 S. W. 849); mules for use in pedding (Medlin v. Wilkerson (1886) 81 Ala. 147, 1 So. 37) and in hauling (Boozer v. Jones (1910) 169 Ala. 481, 53 So. 1018); sheep (Turnbow v. Beckstead (1908) 25 Utah, 468, 71 Pac. 1062; Bellows v. Denison (1888) 9 N. H. 293); wagons and harness (William J. Lemp Brewing Co. v. Mantz (1913) 120 Md. 176, 87 Atl. 814); an automobile (Mack v. Holsopple (1917) 67 Pa. Super. Ct. 291); a truck (Lester v. Ladrigan (1916) 90 Conn. 570, L.R.A.1916F, 939, 98 Atl. 124); furniture for use in a barber shop (Giannone v. Fleetwood & Co. (1898) 93 Ga. 491, 21 S. E. 76), or in a hotel (Neubauer v. Gabriel (1893) 86 Wis. 200, 56 N. W. 783); pianos (Guest Piano Co. v. Ricker (1916) 274 Ill. 448, 118 N. E. 717 (case lost on another ground); Oliver Ditson Co. v. Bates (1902) 181 Mass. 455, 57 L.R.A. 289, 92 Am. St. Rep. 424, 63 N. E. 908); and circus properties (Nisbet v. Federal Title & T. Co. (1916) 144 C. C. A. 54, 229 Fed. 644, writ of certiorari denied in (1916) 241 U. S. 669, 60 L. ed. 1229, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553).

IV. Illustrations.

The owners of circus property who leased it to a circus corporation for use in their business retained their property as against creditors of the lessee. Nisbet v. Federal Title & T. Co. (1916; C. C. A. Colo.) 144 C. C. A. 54, 229 Fed. 644, writ of certiorari denied in (1916) 241 U. S. 669, 60 L. ed. 1229, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553, where the court said: "It is true that that corporation exercised dominion over the property, and the same was appropriately labeled to indicate its connection with the circus exhibition. The uncontroverted proofs are that this was entirely in accord with the custom of the business in which the property was used. In such cases, the sale statute . . . has no application."

In Larkin v. Parmelee (1897) 69 Conn. 79, 36 Atl. 1009, upon the assumption that it is an essential element of estoppel that the owner must have put the property in the possession of another with an intention to represent an actual ownership in the possessor, and to induce others to act upon that representation as true, it was held that evidence that the owner of a horse and wagon and harness allowed her brother to use the property in his meat-market business, and permitted it to continue in the latter's possession after seeing a sign upon the wagon, "George W. Larkin, Meats," did not establish conclusively the existence of such an intention, where it appeared that she had no interest in her brother's business, her conduct being in entire good faith, without any anticipation that the property would be liable to attachment for her brother's debts, or that her action would in any manner tend to deceive his creditors, or to give him any false credit.

An owner of horses, by allowing a trainer to have possession of them and to race them in his own name, under a certain contract, is not estopped from maintaining his ownership as against a creditor of the trainer, furnishing feed, but not asserting an agister's lien. Anderson v. Heile (1901) 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1115, 64 S. W. 849.

The use of stock by a husband under a contract with his wife by which he was to pasture the stock for the use of the cattle, and she was to have the increase, cannot of itself create an estoppel against the wife in favor of her husband's creditors. Paden v. Goldbaum (1894) 4 Cal. Unrep. 767, 37 Pac. 759.

In McGinley v. Brechtel (1908) 4 Neb. (Unof.) 552, 95 N. W. 32, where the owner of stock loaned it to his daughter for use on the farm of her husband, and the latter, after keeping it until he and his wife separated, sold the property, it was held that the owner was not estopped from recovering the same, there being nothing in his acts or conduct to mislead the purchaser, or cause him to believe the husband was the owner, and nothing to show that the owner knew that his son-in-law claimed to own the property.

In Staples v. Bradbury (1832) 8 Me. 181, 28 Am. Dec. 494, after holding that the fact that a father who has conveyed his farm to his son, reserving a life interest in it, places cattle thereon in such a situation as ostensibly to be the property of the son, so that a vendee of the son may fairly presume the animals to be his, will not prevent the father, or his representatives, from asserting title thereto, the court says that "surely, because the owner of cattle or any other personal property leases it to his neighbor, who goes into possession, that neighbor has no right to dispose of it; we are not to allow property to be thus changed. The question is not, Did the cattle appear to be the property of . . . [the son] when he gave the bill of sale? but, Were they then his property?"

In Turnbow v. Beckstead (1903) 25 Utah, 468, in holding that the lessor of sheep may recover them of the lessee's mortgagee, the court did not attach much significance to the fact that the lessee had put his brand on them.

The owner of furniture does not, by letting the occupants of a barber shop use it, thereby hold it out as their property, or as a basis for giving them credit; nor does he thereby grant them any leave so to hold it out. Giannone v. Fleetwood & Co. (1893) 93 Ga. 491, 21 S. E. 76.

A father who leases furniture to his son to start him in the hotel business is not estopped from asserting title thereto as against the son's mortgagee, who had furnished him with meat and groceries for the hotel. Neubauer v. Gabriel (1893) 86 Wis. 200, 56 N. W. 733.

It is no defense to the demand of pianos by their owner that they were purchased in good faith by an innocent purchaser from a hotel company, which had leased them of the owner. Guest Piano Co. v. Ricker (1916) 274 Ill. 448, 113 N. E. 717, where, however, the owner lost its case on another ground.

That the lessee of a piano had a retail store and kept musical instruments for sale, and that this was known to the lessors, was held not to enlarge the authority of the lessee, and give him a right to sell the piano to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, to whom he had formerly hired it. Oliver Ditson Co. v.

The owner of a piano who lets it to the husband of a musical teacher may recover the value of it from an auctioneer to whom the lessee has sent it for sale, and who refuses to deliver it without the payment of expenses incurred. Loeschman v. Machin (1818) 2 Starkie (Eng.) 311, 20 Revised Rep. 687.

In holding that the owner of a cash register, safe, and pool table, who had leased them to a saloon keeper for use in his business, was not estopped to claim title as against an attachment creditor of the lessee, the court laid down the rule that, "in order that the real owner of personal property may be estopped from asserting his title against a person who has dealt with the one in possession on the faith of his apparent ownership, something more than mere possession and control is necessary to be shown. To work an estoppel in such a case, the possession of the third person must be of such a character, or he be so clothed with the indicia of title, as to deceive those dealing with him in the belief of his ownership." Kiewel v. Tanner (1908) 105 Minn. 50, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 772, 117 N. W. 231.

Lessors of a chronometer to a ship-owner may retain it when it has been delivered to them for repair, after the term of the lease, by one who had purchased it in good faith from a dealer. Roberts v. Dillon (1869) 3 Daly (N. Y.) 50.

A lessee of a newspaper plant, etc., who went into possession as editor and publisher, and so printed his name on the paper, cannot place himself in position to give title to the property by later changing the printed statement so as to read that he was editor and proprietor, the change being without the consent of the lessors. Reid v. Mayo (1893) 45 La. Ann. 1091, 13 So. 799.

One renting a moving picture machine to another for use in the state, whose laws do not require the contract to be recorded, does not, where he reclaims the property as soon as he learns the facts, lose his title in favor of a bona fide purchaser in another state, to which the lessee removes the property without authority, although the laws of such state require the recording of such contracts to give them validity against bona fide purchasers. Adams v. Fellers (1911) 88 S. C. 212, 85 L.R.A. (N.S.) 385, 70 S. E. 722.

The owner of an automobile, who was the officer of a company which he permitted from time to time to use the car in its business, recovered in replevin against a vendee of such company in Mack v. Holsopple (1917) 67 Pa. Super. Ct. 291, where the court approved the refusal of the trial court to charge the jury that the plaintiff was estopped.

In Cleveland v. Rand (1916) 90 Vt. 223, 97 Atl. 989, it was held that a woman owning a farm and the personal property thereon was entitled to recover live stock levied on and sold under an execution against her husband, upon a judgment on a contract which did not relate to the management of the farm or the personal property. She had permitted her husband to treat the personal property as his own in dealing with third persons, so that, for example, he had made a mortgage on some of the personal property with her consent, and had purchased stock for which he gave his personal lien notes,—the mortgage and the notes being duly recorded,—and he had for several years inventoried the personal property for taxation as his own. It was held that the case was not altered by the facts that the husband's judgment creditor, before entering into his contract with the husband, inquired of the town clerk whether the husband was good for six or seven hundred dollars, and that the town clerk answered by letter, in substance, that he considered him good for that amount; that he owned a small place in the village, and the personal property on the farm where he resided. The clerk got this information from what then appeared in the town clerk's office. The court said: "The findings do not show that the town clerk, when he wrote the letter to Wright, had any knowledge or information touching any of the facts found pertaining to the conduct of the plaintiff; nor do they show that, through the town clerk, Wright had any such knowledge or information before his contract with Cleveland was consummated. It follows that, so far as showing such facts against the plaintiff as constitute an estoppel is concerned, the defendant's case stands no better with the evidence of his information from the town clerk than it does without that evidence; the same essential elements of estoppel are lacking."

V. Contra and border-line cases.

The Davis Case (Ind.) and the Neale Case (Tex.) infra, probably go further against the general rule than any others.

In Davis v. First Nat. Bank (1905) 6 Ind. Terr. 124, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 760, 89 S. W. 1015, it was held that an intending tenant who, pending a negotiation for a lease, places a wagon which is to be the consideration for the lease in possession of the other party, and permits him to use it as his own for a year, is estopped to assert title against one who, without notice, has taken a mortgage on the property from the party in possession.

In Neale v. Sears (1868) 31 Tex. 105, one of two partners in a saloon business, who owned the billiard tables, withdrew, but permitted the continued use thereof to his former partner, who, in advertising the attractions of his place, included the tables. It was held that Sears, the owner of the tables, could not recover them from the bailee's mortgagee. The court said: "We do not attribute fraud to Sears; on the contrary, as far as we can judge from the record, his motives were influenced by kindness toward White, and the case might more properly come into the class where one of the two innocent persons must suffer; and it is a well-established rule that he who trusts most must suffer most. . . . Because Sears tacitly assented to the assumed ownership of the property by White, and thereby induced Neal to loan money to White upon the security furnished by this property, he is legally and equitably precluded from asserting his ownership to the detriment of Neale, who appears an innocent purchaser." This case, of course, had something of the element of leaving property in the hands of the vendor.

There are, however, a few other cases which, while not in terms denying the rule, indicate a tendency against it.

It will be seen that it is held in the reported case (W. P. FULLER & Co. v. ADAMS, ante, 674) that a mother who permits her minor son to have possession of machinery belonging to her, for use in a business conducted by him, knowing that he holds himself out as the owner of the machinery, is estopped to assert title to it against one who gives him credit for goods furnished for use in the business without knowledge of the true ownership of the property. The court states that the theory of estoppel is amply supported by the evidence. It is to be regretted that the evidence is not reported. The facts, so far as reported, do not indicate that the holding of estoppel would be in accord with the great weight of opinion.

In a case where the testimony is not reported, the court reversed a judgment for a wife who claimed furniture in a hotel against an attaching creditor of her husband, and said: "Where a party by his course of dealing, or particular conduct, though not actually designed to entrap or defraud another, but which induces another to believe, as in this case, that the husband is the owner of the property upon which he obtains credit, she will be estopped from asserting the contrary when the creditor demands that the property shall answer for his debt.

. . . The husband obtained this credit for supplies which went into the hotel where this furniture was employed; and a careful reading of the testimony in this record has persuaded us that there are such strong circumstances of an equitable estoppel in favor of this defendant as should entitle him to the most explicit submission of that issue to the jury." Cottrell v. Spiess (1886) 28 Mo. App. 35.

In Dunlap v. Gooding (1885) 22 S. C. 548, it was held that where a mother let her son have a mare, and hold himself out as its owner, an innocent purchaser was so affected by the mother's conduct as to estop her from asserting title to the property.

There is an especially strong circumstance in First Nat. Bank v. Kissare (1908) 22 Okla. 545, 132 Am. St. Rep. 644, 98 Pac. 433, where the owner of cattle living in Arkansas branded them with his son-in-law's brand and shipped them to him in the Indian Territory, to be by him pastured for hire, and it was held that the owner could not recover the cattle from his son-in-law's mortgagee. The court said: "That Kissare by branding his cattle in Butler's brand and sending them from Conway, Arkansas, to Holdenville, Indian Territory, many miles from where they were known as his property, and by placing them in Butler's possession, thereby clothed Butler with the highest indicia of title thereto, there can be no doubt. It is a well-known fact that cattle bearing a brand are, by the business world, taken to be the property of the owner of the brand. By thus branding them, Kissare not only proclaimed to the world Butler's ownership in the cattle as effectually as he could have done by any other means, but just as effectually disclaimed ownership in them himself."

VI. Miscellaneous.

In Albright v. Albright (1913) 151 Wis. 610, 139 N. W. 413, it appeared that a couple conveyed their farm and the personal property thereon to their eldest son, in consideration of some money and an agreement to support them, and that, after the father's death, the son conveyed the farm to his mother and lived on it with her and his two brothers for many years, his mother being in charge and he at times absent. It was held, on the mother's death, that he was not estopped from claiming the personalty, it not being shown that the brothers who received real property from their mother and who claimed the personalty, she having once stated that she had given it to them, had changed their position to their prejudice, relying on their mother's apparent ownership of the personalty.

That a druggist who owned a printing press and other materials allowed another to set up a printing shop in the rear of his store, in his own name, and to use such press and materials, will not estop the owner from holding the property as against a creditor who did not give credit to the printer on the faith of the supposed ownership. Angell v. Hopkins (1889) 79 Cal. 181, 21 Pac. 729.

So, allowing a press to be used by the owner's successors in business does not prevent the owner from asserting title as against a creditor who had not extended credit to the possessor because of the press. Orcutt v. Gast (1918) 231 Mass. 305, 120 N. E. 855.

In Morgan v. Pierron (1885) 64 Wis. 523, 25 N. W. 543, where a father stocked a farm, and put his son upon it to make a living, and some of the property was taken in an attachment against the son, it was held that the father could recover, it appearing that he was unaware of the debt of the son, and it not appearing that the creditor knew anything about the ownership of the property, or the circumstances of his debtor. ## RE ESTATE OF DANIEL C. CORBIN, Deceased.

STATE OF WASHINGTON, Appt.,

v.

AUSTIN CORBIN et al., Exrs., etc., of Daniel C. Corbin, Deceased, Respts.

Tax — computation — individual estate.

1. Under an inheritance tax law which imposes the tax upon the right to receive, the graduated rates of taxation should be determined by the amount going to the individual taxed, and not upon the whole estate, as composed of the aggregate of the separate devises and legacies.

— inheritance — what affected by.

2. A tax upon the right to receive property under a will, rather than upon the property itself or the right to transmit it, is imposed by a statute providing that all property which shall pass to any person shall be subject to a tax at certain rates, depending upon the degree of relationship of the recipient to the testator.

[See 26 R. C. L. 195.]

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County (Blake, J.) in favor of the executors in a proceeding to determine inheritance taxes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. C. R. Jackson and George G. Hannan for the state.

Messrs. Allen, Winston, & Allen, for respondents:

The tax is not one upon the right of devolution, but one on the privilege of succession by will, law, or gift, the word "inheritance" being used in its broad sense. Were it otherwise, it would be unconstitutional, as not being within its title.

The inheritance tax statutes being special and arbitrary in their nature, and it being within the power of the legislature to make its intent clear, they are strictly construed against the state. Their terms will not be extended by implication or construction, and all doubts will be resolved in favor of the taxpayer.

Tolman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Daniel C. Corbin, a resident of Spokane county, there died on June 29, 1918, leaving an estate which, after deducting debts and expenses properly allowable under the Inheritance Tax Law, amounted in value to $743,425.52. Deceased by his will devised this estate to his widow, a son, and a daughter in unequal proportions. The executors and the tax commissioner were unable to agree upon the method of computing the inheritance tax and applying the graduated rates provided by § 9183, Rem. Code, as amended by the Laws of 1917, chap. 43, p. 196. The tax commissioner contended that all of the legatees and devisees were within the first class, as defined by the statute, and that, after deducting the exemption, the graduated rates should be applied to the estate passing to them as a whole; while the executors contended that the graduated rates should be applied to each bequest or legacy as a separate entity. By the first-mentioned method of computation the inheritance tax would, by reason of the graduated rates, amount to considerably more than by the second. The matter was submitted to the trial court upon an agreed statement of facts, and that court adopted the method of computing the tax contended for by the executors, and entered judgment accordingly, from which judgment the state has appealed.

The act which we are called upon to consider is entitled, "An Act Relating to the Taxation of Inheritances and Providing for the Disposition of the Same." In the first section (Rem. Code, § 9182), it is provided that "all property within the jurisdiction of this state, and any interest therein, . . . which shall pass by will or by the statutes of inheritance . . . to any person in trust or otherwise, shall, for the use of the state, be subject to a tax as provided for in § 9183, . . . and all administrators, executors and trustees, and any such grantee under a conveyance, and any such donee under a gift, . . . shall be respectively liable for all such taxes to be paid by them. . . . The inheritance tax shall be and remain a lien on such estate from the death of the decedent until paid."

In the second section as now amended, chapter 43, p. 196, Session Laws of 1917, it is provided:

"The inheritance tax shall be imposed on all estates subject to the operation of this act at the following rate:

"If passing to or for the use of a father, mother, husband, wife, lineal descendant, adopted child or lineal descendant of an adopted child, the tax shall be 1 per centum of any value not exceeding $50,000; 2 per centum of any value in excess of $50,000 and not exceeding $100,000; 3 per centum of any value in excess of $100,000 and not exceeding $250,000; 5 per centum of any value in excess of $250,000. . . ."

Following are other classifications based upon relationship or want of it, each taking a different rate.

Bearing upon the question to be here determined, we must inquire whether this act imposes a tax upon the right to receive property by inheritance as distinguished from a tax upon the property itself thus passing, or a tax upon the right to transmit property by will or under statutes of succession. A reading of the statute at once suggests that in assessing the tax the relationship or classification of each legatee or devisee must be considered in order to determine the rate of taxation; and the language of the act and its title, fairly construed, seem to point toward the conclusion that the legislative intent was to impose a tax upon <sup>Tax—inheritance</sup> ~~the right to receive,~~ <sup>—what affected by.</sup> rather than a tax upon the property itself or upon the right to transmit it. This court has been called upon in a number of cases to consider this legislation, though in none of them was the question now in issue raised; yet some light may be shed upon the present subject by a study of what has been heretofore said.

In State v. Clark, 30 Wash. 439, 71 Pac. 20, the constitutionality of the law was attacked, and the opinion deals mainly with constitutional questions. Among other expressions which might be quoted, it is there said: "The rule of equality in taxation is invoked against this exemption. It may be observed that the rule invoked does not forbid a liberal classification for purposes of taxation. The classification made here is manifestly reasonable. There is no inequality among the members of the same class. This objection is discussed in many of the authorities heretofore cited. It is so completely met and disposed of in the case of Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594, that it must be convincing here."

The writer of that opinion quoted from and repeatedly referred to the Magoun Case, and so clearly followed and adopted its reasoning as to make it binding upon us, practically to the same extent as though it were a decision by this court. It is said in the Magoun Case: "The tax is not on money; it is on the right to inherit; and hence a condition of inheritance, and it may be graded according to the value of that inheritance."

This court again considered the act in the case of Re Clark, 37 Wash. 671, 80 Pac. 267. It was there said: "We do not think that the claim of the state treasurer can be upheld. The inheritance tax is payable out of the legacies, and is chargeable to the individual legatees.

The court cannot compel one legatee to pay the inheritance tax due from another, and yet such is the effect of the order appealed from."

In Re White, 42 Wash. 360, 84 Pac. 831, there was involved the question of whether the title of the act was sufficiently broad to cover a tax on the right of succession by will as well as by operation of law, and it was there held that the act imposes a tax on the right of succession, whether the property passed by will, by operation of law, or by grant or gift, to take effect upon the death of the grantor or donor.

In Re Stixrud, 58 Wash. 339, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 632, 109 Pac. 343, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 850, it was squarely held that this act imposes a tax, not upon property, but upon the right or privilege of receiving it.

In Re Lotzgesell, 62 Wash. 352, 113 Pac. 1105, it was held that the inheritance tax was not a debt of the testator, but was properly chargeable to the legatees.

If, then, as we have already held, the tax is one upon the right to receive, to be paid, in the last analysis, by the legatee, and if one legatee cannot be held to pay the tax of another, does it not likewise follow that the amount of the tax to be paid by any one legatee must be determined from the amount of the legacy received by him, and not either in whole or in part from the <sup>—computation</sup> ~~—individual~~ amount which may <sup>estate.</sup>

be received by others? We are convinced that a fair reading of the statute itself leads to that conclusion, and every expression of this court during the eighteen years that it has been the law lends support to that position. Not only so, but the reasoning of other courts in construing similar laws, while not wholly harmonious, abundantly supports our conclusions. Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747; Re Macky, 46 Colo. 79, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1207, 102 Pac. 1075; Re McKennan, 25 S. D. 369, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 606, 126 N. W. 611; Re Fox, 154 Mich. 5, 117 N. W. 558; McGannon v. State, 33 Okla. 145, 124 Pac. 1063, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 620.

We conclude, therefore, that the legislative intent was that each legacy should be considered as a separate entity and taxed as such at the statutory rate, and therefore the judgment appealed from was right and is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Whole estate or individual shares as basis of computation of inheritance tax.

- I. Introduction, 688.
- II. Rule as to exemptions:
  - a. In general, 689.
  - b. Rule that legacy or distributive share is determinative, 689.
  - c. Rule that amount of the entire estate is determinative, 691.
- III. Rule as to graduated rate, 695.

I. Introduction.

The ordinary form of inheritance tax statute declares that all property that shall, upon the death of the owner, pass to another, shall be subject to a tax, but excepts therefrom property or estate below a certain amount.

There is also a provision in some statutes for an increased rate as the property or estate increases in amount. The various statutes are set out below. The contemporary statute should always be consulted in any investigation of this subject. Under such statutes there arises the question annotated herein, as to whether the "property" or "estate" that is exempted or that measures the rate under the graduated taxing statutes is the property or estate of the decedent or the property or estate that passes to the separate beneficiaries.

II. Rule as to exemptions.

Although this matter as it relates to exemptions is governed to some extent by the form of statute, the differences in statutes do not account altogether for the difference in judicial opinion. There are two theories upon the question.

b. Rule that legacy or distributive share is determinative.

According to one theory the exemption is governed by the amount of the legacy or distributive share.

Koenig (Colo.) supra, provided that "all property . . . which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state from any person . . . to any person or persons . . . shall be and is subject to a tax at the rate hereinafter specified . . . and all heirs, legatees and devisees, administrators, executors and trustees shall be liable for any and all such taxes until the same shall have been paid as hereinafter directed. When the beneficial interests to any property or income therefrom shall pass to or for the use of any father, mother, husband, etc., . . . in every such case the rate of tax shall be $2 on every $100 of the clear market value of such property received by each person . . . provided that the sum of $10,000 of any such estate shall not be subject to any such duty or taxes and that only the amount in excess of $10,000 shall be subject to the above duty or tax." The court argues that "the term 'such estate,' to which the exemption applies, presupposes that that estate or property has been described or mentioned in some previous part of the section or statute. The word 'property,' but not 'estate,' is earlier employed several times in the same section. Naturally 'such estate' in the proviso relates to the next antecedent similar expression. Observing this usual rule of construction, the term 'such estate' we think refers to 'such property received by each person,' because that is the first preceding similar term found in the same sentence and in the same grammatical connection. As the tax is laid upon the receipt of 'such property by each person,' naturally the exemption should, and we hold does, apply to the separate distributive shares and legacies, and not to the aggregate value of the property of the decedent. 'Property' and 'estate' are often used synonymously, and are so used in this section."

The statute involved in Booth v. Com. (Ky.) supra, provided that "all property which shall pass by will, or by the intestate laws of this state from any person, . . . to any person . . . shall be and is subject to a tax of $5 on every $100 of the fair cash value of such property. . . . Provided that the first $500 of every estate shall not be subject to such duty or tax." In holding that this last sentence referred to the estate passing to the legatee, the court says that "the tax is upon the individual, and can be imposed only when the particular interest in the decedent's estate passing to him exceeds $500. The tax is not, therefore, imposed on the estate of the decedent, but upon the beneficiaries' right of succession to his property. Nor does the fact that the executor or administrator is required by the act to pay the tax make it a tax against the estate of the testator or decedent, for it also requires him to deduct it from the estate passing to the legatee or collateral heir."

The statute involved in State v. Hamlin (Me.) supra, provided that "all property within the jurisdiction of this state, and any interest therein, . . . which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state . . . to any person . . . shall be liable to a tax of 2½ per cent of its value above the sum of $500 . . . and all administrators, executors and trustees, and any such grantee . . . shall be liable for all such taxes." The court argues: "It is difficult to construe this language to mean other than that such taker, subject to the tax, shall be liable upon the amount received above $500. A grantee is made liable to 'such taxes.' What taxes? Plainly, 2½ per cent upon the amount received in excess of $500. This construction is greatly aided by the 2d section, which, in dealing with limited estates to the excepted classes (whether including all or part of decedent's estate) and remainder to the taxable class, provides for an appraisal of the value of the limited estate, and when that is ascertained, that value, 'together with the sum of $500,' is to be deducted from the value of such property, and the remainder become subject to the tax or duty. This provision is plainly inconsistent with the claim that the $500 exemption is to be taken once for all from the corpus of decedent's entire estate."

The statute under which State ex rel. Basting v. Probate Ct. (1907) 101 Minn. 485, 112 N. W. 878, was decided, is not set out in that opinion. A statute of this state which was involved in the earlier case of State ex rel. Foot v. Bazille (1905) 97 Minn. 11, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 732, 106 N. W. 93, 7 Ann. Cas. 1056, provided: "Section 1. A tax shall be and is, hereby imposed upon all inheritances, devises, bequests, legacies and gifts of every kind, . . . the value of which exceeds $10,000, and upon such excess only. Section 2. Such tax shall be computed upon the full and true value of such inheritance, devise, bequest, legacy, or gift, above such excess." This statute apparently is the same as that involved in State ex rel. Basting v. Probate Ct.

Section 1 of chapter 483, of the New York Laws of 1885, under which Re Cager (1888) 111 N. Y. 348, 18 N. E. 866, and Re Howe (1889) 112 N. Y. 100, 2 L.R.A. 825, 19 N. E. 518, and other of the New York cases set out above, were decided, provided that "after the passage of this act all property which shall pass by will," etc., to any person, etc., other than the father or certain other excepted persons, "shall be subject to a tax of $5 on every $100 of the clear market value of such property, provided that an estate which may be valued at a less sum than $500 shall not be subject to such duty or tax." In holding that the exemption applied to each separate legacy, the court, in Re Howe (N. Y.) supra, states that "the tax is not imposed upon the estate of which she [the testatrix] was seised or possessed, but only upon so much of it as passes to certain persons,—not all persons, or any person; and, although the executor is required to pay the tax, he is to deduct it from the particular legacy, and cannot 'deliver or be compelled to deliver any specific legacy or property subject to tax to any person until he shall have collected the tax thereon.'"

The New York statute was changed by the Statute of 1892, under which the entire amount of the decedent's estate was made the determinative amount (see infra, II. c). The New York act was again changed in 1910 (Laws of New York, § 243, chap. 706), and the words "estate" and "property," as used in the article, were defined to mean "the property or interest therein, passing or transferred to individual or corporate legatees, devisees, heirs, next of kin," etc., and "not the property or interest therein of the decedent, grantor, donor or vendor, passing or transferred." Under this act, the courts have, in accord with the clear language thereof, held the exemption to be governed by the amount passing to the beneficiaries. Re Mason (1910) 69 Misc. 280, 126 N. Y. Supp. 998; Re Title Guarantee & T. Co. (1913) 81 Misc. 106, 142 N. Y. Supp. 1070, affirmed in (1913) 159 App. Div. 803, 144 N. Y. Supp. 889, which is affirmed in (1914) 212 N. Y. 551, 106 N. E. 1043; Re Eaton (1913) 79 Misc. 69, 140 N. Y. Supp. 601.

Under a statute providing that an inheritance tax shall not be imposed upon any inheritance, legacy, or other donation to or in favor of any ascendant or descendant of the decedent below $10,000 in amount of value, the question is seemingly settled in accord with the theory of the above decisions. It has been held, however, that if the legacy is over $10,000 in value, it is taxable on its full amount under this statute. Fallon's Succession (1919) 144 La. 299, 80 So. 544.

Other courts hold the exemptions to be determined by the amount of the estate, and not the amount of the separate legacies.

See Re Title Guarantee & T. Co. (1913) 81 Misc. 106, 142 N. Y. Supp. 1070, supra.

A bishop or a religious corporation is specifically exempted from taxation under the New York statute, and it is the theory of the decisions that if such a gift reduces the estate below the exemption amount, the estate is not taxable. Re Corbett (1902) 171 N. Y. 516, 64 N. E. 209 (obiter). Certain relatives of the decedent are also exempted unless the property passing to them is over $10,000, while the general exemption amount is only $500. In Re Corbett (N. Y.) supra, a tax was assessed upon the legacies to favored relatives although aggregating less than $10,000, where this aggregate with the legacies passing to others made a total so passing in excess of $10,000.

Where the entire estate is less than $10,000, a legacy to a favored relative has been held not taxable; but if the estate, including such legacy, is over $500, the shares of the other legatees are held taxable although the aggregate of the shares passing to them is less than $500. Re Costello (1907) 189 N. Y. 288, 82 N. E. 139; Re Garland (1903) 88 App. Div. 380, 84 N. Y. Supp. 630; Re McMurray (1904) 96 App. Div. 128, 89 N. Y. Supp. 71; Re Mock (1906) 113 App. Div. 913, 100 N. Y. Supp. 1130, reversing (1906) 49 Misc. 283, 99 N. Y. Supp. 236; Re Rosendahl (1903) 40 Misc. 542, 82 N. Y. Supp. 992.

On the other hand, it has been held in this state that where property less than $10,000, which is bequeathed to one of the favored relatives, reduces the amount of the estate below $500, the estate is not taxable. Re Bliss (1896) 6 App. Div. 192, 39 N. Y. Supp. 875; Re Conklin (1903) 39 Misc. 771, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1124. The reasoning by which the court in Re Bliss (N. Y.) supra, arrived at its conclusion, is as follows: After citing the statutory definition of the words "estate" and "property," to the effect that such words shall be taken to mean the property or interest therein of the testator or intestate, etc., passing or transferred "to those not herein specifically exempted" from the provisions of the act, the court states: "It thus appears that under the statute, while the distributive shares passing to the nephew do not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $500 [the general exemption amount], still those shares will be subject to taxation in case the whole property of the intestate passing to persons not by the act specifically exempted exceeds the sum of $500. The only question presented is, therefore, whether the sister [one of the favored relatives] of the intestate is 'specifically exempted' by the statute. We think it clear that she is. The counsel for the appellant concedes that bishops and religious corporations are exempted from the provisions of the tax, and that if any part of the estate had passed to them under the distribution, such part would not be considered in determining whether the property exceeded $500 or not. The exemption from taxation of devises or bequests to bishops and religious corporations is found in the same section as the exemption of the father, mother, or sister, in case the personal property is less than $10,000 [the exemption amount to favored relatives]. We think the father, mother, or sister is as truly exempted as the bishop or religious corporation. There is this, and only this, difference between these two classes: The bishop or religious corporation is specifically exempted in all cases; the father, mother, or sister, etc., are exempted only in case the estate does not exceed $10,000. But as to both these classes the exemption is specific. As the distributive share passing to the sister was less than $10,000, it is not to be added to the distributive shares passing to the nephews, and ascertaining whether such last distributive shares are subject to taxation." The court in Re Conklin (N. Y.) supra, referring to the provision of the statute that the word "property" shall mean the property of the decedent "transferred to those not herein specifically exempted from the provisions of this article," states that the "sum of this law is, therefore, that, given an estate of less than $10,000 value, it is taxable only when that part of it passing to persons not specifically exempted equals or exceeds $500 in value. In the case at issue the amount passing to the sisters is specifically exempted, the estate being less than $10,000, and the amount passing to those not specifically exempted is less than $500, and likewise not taxable." The reasoning of the courts which have come to the opposite conclusion is stated as follows in Re Garland (1903) 88 App. Div. 380, 4 N. Y. Supp. 630, supra: "A widow was not a person exempted from the operation of the law; a transfer to her was not taxable unless the total value of the personal property passing under the transfer was $10,000 or more. The exemption referred to in the statute had reference to the persons to whom transfers are made, such as a bishop or a religious corporation, and not to the value of the property transferred to such person."

The statutes under which this theory, that the amount of the entire estate determines the exemption, has been adopted, have been of various forms. In McGhee v. State (1898) 105 Iowa, 9, 74 N. W. 695, there was held to be but one exemption under a statute declaring that "all property within the jurisdiction of the state . . . which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws . . . to any person in trust or otherwise . . . shall be subject to a tax of 5 per centum of its value above the sum of $1,000, after the payment of all debts, for the use of the state." The court states that "the statutory phrase 'to any person' does not necessarily mean one person only, but will include more than one when that is required to give the statute the effect it was intended to have. The administrator, executor, or trustee charged with the duty of settling the estate is liable for the payment of the tax, excepting that in some cases he is required to collect the tax from the person who is to receive the property, and to do certain things provided by statute to procure a lien for the tax upon property subject to it. But the tax is only payable on account of the property of an estate in excess of $1,000 which remains 'after the payment of all its debts.' To whose debts does this statute refer? . . . It is evident that the debts to be paid are those which are claims against the estate of decedent, and we are of the opinion that both of the phrases 'above the sum of $1,000' and 'after the payment of all debts' have direct relation to the estate of the decedent. The legislative intent as to this may be expressed thus: 'All property within the jurisdiction of this state which shall pass by will or the intestate laws of this or any other state, or by deed, grant, sale, or gift made . . . other than to or for the use of the persons specified, 'shall be subject to a tax of 5 per centum of its value above the sum of $1,000 after the payment of all its debts, for the use of the state.' Other portions of the act tend to justify the interpretation we adopt, and we do not doubt that it expresses the legislative intent. It will, as nearly as is practicable, operate uniformly where the conditions are the same, and thus produce equality in results." The court then refers to the case of Re Howe (1889) 112 N. Y. 100, 2 L.R.A. 825, 19 N. E. 513, and states that "we must decline to follow that case so far as it can be regarded as applicable to the statute under consideration."

The statute involved in Stellwagen v. Wayne Probate Judge (1902) 130 Mich. 166, 89 N. W. 728, provided that "when the property or any beneficial interest therein passes by any such transfer to [certain specified persons] . . . such transfer of property shall not be taxable under this act unless it is personal property of the value of $5,000 or more, in which case it shall be taxable under this act at the rate of 1 per centum, upon the clear market value of all such property in excess of $5,000." This statute is held by the court to be a substantial copy of a pre-existing statute of the state of New York, which was construed in Re Hoffman (1894) 143 N. Y. 327, 38 N. E. 311, and there held to have been enacted for the express purpose of making plain an intent that the exemption should be taken from the estate of the decedent as a whole, and not from each interest transferred. The statute having been so construed, that construction was followed. There is, however, a strong dissenting opin-

The statute involved in State ex rel. Gilmore v. District Ct. (1912) 45 Mont. 385, 122 Pac. 922, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 469, provided that "all property which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state from any person . . . to any person or persons . . . shall be and is subject to a tax of $5 on every $100 of the market value of such property. . . . Provided that an estate which may be valued at a less sum than $7,500 shall not be subject to any such tax or duty."

The statute involved in Re Inheritance Tax (1897) 5 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 555, provided that "all property which shall pass . . . shall be liable to a tax of 5 per centum on its value above $2,000."

The statute involved in Howell's Estate (1892) 147 Pa. 164, 23 Atl. 403, provided that "all estate, real, personal, and mixed, of every kind whatsoever . . . passing from any person . . . to any person or persons," shall be liable to a tax of $5 "on every hundred dollars of the clear value of such estate or estates." It was then provided that "no estate which may be valued at a less sum than $250 shall be subject to a duty or tax."

The Pennsylvania statute involved in Com. v. Boyle (1885) 2 Del. Co. Rep. (Pa.) 385, provided that "all estates, real, personal, and mixed, of every kind whatsoever passing from any person . . . to any person . . . shall be, and they are made subject to a tax or duty of . . . on every hundred dollars of the clear value of such estate or estates, etc. Provided that no estate that may be valued at a less sum than $250 shall be subject to duty or tax."

The statute involved in Dixon v. Ricketts (1908) 26 Utah, 215, 72 Pac. 947, provided that "all property, within the jurisdiction of this state, and any interest therein . . . which shall pass by will or by the statute of inheritance . . . to any person, in trust or otherwise, shall be subject to a tax of 5 per centum of its value

The statute under which Atty. Gen. v. Aberdare [1892] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 684, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 615, 67 L. T. N. S. 588, 56 J. P. 806, was decided, made estate duly payable "where the value of any succession exceeds £10,000."

As shown above, the earlier New York cases adhere to the rule that the exemption under such statutes as are under discussion in this note related to the share taken by the legatees, and not to the amount of the estate. In 1892, there was a revision of the New York law on the subject of inheritance taxation, and a section inserted, to the effect that "the words 'estate' and 'property,' as used in this act, shall be taken to mean the property or interest therein of the testator, intestate, grantor, bargainor, or vendor, passing or transferred to those not specifically exempted from the provisions of this act, and not as the property or interest therein, passing or transferred to individual legatees, devisees, heirs, next of kin, grantees, donees, or vendees. . . . The word 'transfer,' as used in this act, shall be taken to include the passing of property, or any interest therein, in possession or enjoyment, present or future, by inheritance, descent, devise, bequest, grant, deed, bargain, sale or gift in the manner herein prescribed." Under this statute it is held in Re Hoffman (1894) 143 N. Y. 327, 38 N. E. 311, that the exemption must be determined by the entire estate of the deceased. The court states that "it will be observed that the idea of the lawmaker is explained by declaring not only what the words 'estate' and 'property,' as used in the act, shall mean, but also what they shall not mean; and the negation is a denial in terms of the precise construction which this court had previously adopted in determining what was meant by the word 'estate' when used ambiguously and without qualifying words, as it was used in connection with limitations of value. The Wisconsin act is stated in Black v. State (1902) 113 Wis. 205, 90 Am. St. Rep. 853, 89 N. W. 522, to be, in all essential respects, a literal copy of the New York law, and in the Wisconsin act the words "estate" and "property" are defined as they are in the New York law, to mean the property or interest therein of the testator, intestate, grantor, bargainor, or vendor, and not the property or interest passing to individual legatees, devisees, heirs, next of kin, donees, or vendees, and an interpretation is given to this act similar to that given to the New York statute.

The New York law was again changed in 1910 (see supra, II. b.).

Only one exemption was allowed in People v. Freese (1915) 267 Ill. 164, 107 N. E. 857, but the report of that case is not clear as to what contentions were made.

III. Rule as to graduated rate.

The only cases that have decided the question as it relates to the graduated rate hold that such rate is measured separately by the amount of each legacy, and not by the sum of the whole estate. Knowlton v. Moore (1900) 178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747; RE CORBIN (reported herewith) ante, 685. The South Dakota statute was so construed in Re McKennan (1910) 26 S. D. 369, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 606, 126 N. W. 611, but it seems no question was raised as to this construction. On the contrary, the amount of the estate was made the basis of the computation of the tax in Posey v. Com. (1918) 123 Va. 551, 96 S. E. 771, but no question was raised in this regard. The statute under consideration was as follows: "Where any estate in the commonwealth of any decedent shall pass under a will or under the laws regulating descents and distributions to any person or to or for the use of any person, the estate so passing shall be subject to a tax at the rate of 5 per centum on every hundred dollars value thereof." The statute then provided for a different rate for certain specified classes, and then followed the provisions as to the progressive feature as follows: "When the amount of the market value of such property or interest exceeds $15,000, the rate of the tax upon such excess shall be as follows: (1) Upon all in excess of $15,000 up to $50,000, at the primary rate; (2) upon all in excess of $50,000 and up to $250,000, two times the primary rate; (3) upon all in excess of $250,000 and up to $1,000,000, three times the primary rate; (4) upon all in excess of $1,000,000, four times the primary rate."

It is apparent that there are some considerations which demand that the amounts passing to the various beneficiaries shall be determinative of the graduated rate which are not present when a determination of the basis for computing exemptions is involved. Whether, however, in a jurisdiction which determines the exemptions by the amount of the estate, the amount of the estate will be made the basis for computing a graduated rate, cannot be foretold. Allowance must, of course, be made for differences in the statutory provisions relating to the two matters.

The statute involved in Knowlton v. Moore (1900) 178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747, provided: "That any person or persons having in charge or trust as administrators, executors or trustees any legacies or distributive shares arising from personal property where the whole amount of such personal property as aforesaid shall exceed the sum of $10,000 in actual value passing . . . from any person . . . either by will or by the intestate laws of any state or territory, or any personal property or interest therein transferred by deed, grant, bargain, sale or gift, made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor or bargainor, to any person or persons . . . in trust or otherwise, shall be and hereby are made subject to a duty or tax to be paid to the United States as follows, that is to say: Where the whole amount of said personal property shall exceed in value $10,000, and shall not exceed in value the sum of $25,000, the tax shall be . . . where the amount or value of said property shall exceed the sum of $25,000, but shall not exceed the sum or value of $100,000, the rates of duty or tax above set forth shall be multiplied by one and one half," etc.

The court, after construing the statute as taxing only the legacies, continues: "Granting, however, there is doubt as to the construction in view of the consequences which must result from adopting the theory that the act taxes each separate legacy by a rate determined not by the amount of the legacy, but by the amount of the whole personal estate left by the deceased, we should be compelled to solve the doubt against the interpretation relied on. . . . We are, therefore, bound to give heed to the rule that where a particular construction of a statute will occasion great inconvenience or produce inequality and injustice, that view is to be avoided if another and more reasonable interpretation is present in the statute." CHARLES T. PLUNKETT et al., Exrs., etc., of William B. Plunkett, Deceased,

v.

OLD COLONY TRUST COMPANY et al.

(233 Mass. 471, 124 N. E. 265.)

Tax — where falls.

1. The Federal estate tax rests upon the residue of the estate, and is not apportioned between the legatees, in the absence of any provision in the will requiring such apportionment.

[See note on this question beginning on page 708.]

Statute — interpretation — consideration of heading.

2. The heading or title of a statute may properly be considered in interpreting the statute.

— examination of records.

3. In construing doubtful language in a statute records of legislative proceedings incident to the passage of the statute may be examined, but not debates of individual members as a general thing.

[See 25 R. C. L. 1037-1040.]

Tax — estate — what is.

4. An estate as distinguished from a legacy tax is imposed upon the interest which ceased by reason of the death, not upon the interest to which some person succeeds.

— estate — Federal — what affects.

5. The estate tax imposed by act of Congress is upon the entire estate and not upon the particular devise, bequest, or distributive share of the individual beneficiary.

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County (Crosby, J.) for the determination by the full court of a suit by plaintiffs as executors of the estate of William B. Plunkett, deceased, for instructions regarding the payment of the Federal estate tax. Decree entered instructing payment out of the residue of the estate.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Charles N. Stoddard, in propria persona:

The Federal estate tax is an excise on the privilege of transmitting property by will or under the intestate laws of the state of the domicil of the deceased.

Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 47,

The Federal estate tax, being therefore an excise, must meet two requirements of the Federal Constitution in order to be valid.

Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 293, 42 L. ed. 1037, 1042, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594; People ex rel. Farrington v. Mensching, 187 N. Y. 8, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 625, 79 N. E. 884, 10 Ann. Cas. 101; Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 47, 44 L. ed. 969, 971, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747; Fuller v. Gale, 78 N. H. 544, 103 Atl. 308; Re Douglass, 104 Misc. 359, 171 N. Y. Supp. 956; Re Ferris, decided by Surrogate Cohalan, N. Y. L. J. Dec. 26, 1918; Re Tyler, 89 N. J. Eq. 170, 104 Atl. 298.

The Federal estate tax is not an item of expense of administration.

Re Sherman, 179 App. Div. 497, 166 N. Y. Supp. 19, affirmed in 222 N. Y. 540, 118 N. E. 1078; Re Penfold, 216 N. Y. 171, 110 N. E. 497; Re Gihon, 169 N. Y. 443, 62 N. The Federal estate tax, as well as other inheritance taxes, is not a debt or claim against the decedent.

Bradford v. Storey, 189 Mass. 104, 75 N. E. 256; United States v. Fitta, 197 Fed. 1007; United States v. Priest, 210 Fed. 332.

The levying of a tax based on the total amount of the estate is constitutional.

It cannot be said that the will shows an intention on the part of the testator for the payment of the tax in any way other than what had been customary at the time his will was drawn, and that, under the Massachusetts law, was for each beneficiary to pay the tax on his particular legacy.

Rugg, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is reserved upon the pleadings for the determination of this court. The material facts are that William B. Plunkett, late of Adams, in the county of Berkshire, died testate on the 25th of October, 1917, leaving as his heirs at law two sons, each of whom had children, and one of whom has since deceased. His will was executed on the 15th of September, 1909, the first codicil on the 28d of October, 1911, and the second codicil on the 19th of July, 1917. None of these testamentary instruments contain any provision respecting the payment of succession or inheritance taxes under either state or Federal laws. The state legacy and succession tax had been enacted before the execution of the will, and remained in force as amended at the time of the execution of both codicils. Stat. 1909, chap. 490, part 4. The Federal "estate tax" was enacted shortly before the execution of the last codicil. The estate of the testator was of such size that the Federal tax assessed upon it was $72,476.15. The provision for one son under the will and codicils was a gift outright of property valued at $14,275, and a gift of property valued at $382,616.75 to a trustee upon a spendthrift trust, to pay the income to that son during his life, with other life estates at his death and gifts over of the remainder. A legacy amounting to $126,760 was given to a trustee to hold until the testator's grandchildren should "arrive at the age of twenty-five years, respectively," when it was to be divided equally among them. The residue of the estate, valued at $381,109.72, was bequeathed to the testator's other son. This petition by the executors is brought to determine whether this Federal tax, which has been paid, should be charged entirely against the residue of the estate, or apportioned pro rata among all the devisees and legatees. That is the single question presented. An important factor in the answer of this question is the meaning of the Federal statute on the point whether the tax is imposed with reference to the entire net estate or with reference to the particular devises, bequests, or distributive shares.

The tax was established by the Act of Congress of September 8, 1916 (39 Stat. at L. 756, chap. 463, Comp. Stat. § 6336a, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 312), entitled "An Act to Increase the Revenue and for Other Purposes," as amended by Acts of March 3, 1917, chap. 159, 39 Stat. at L. 1000, and Oct. 3, 1917, chap. 68, 40 Stat. at L. 300, Comp. Stat. § 6336aa, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 336. The relevant sections of the successive acts are grouped respectively under "Title II. Estate Tax," "Title III. Estate Tax," and "Title IX. War Estate Tax." The tax thus entitled is "imposed upon the transfer of the net estate of every decedent dying after the passage of this act." Section 201 (Comp. Stat. § 6336½b). Subsequent sections contain directions for the ascertainment of the net value of estates of deceased persons. Briefly and compendiously stated the net value comprehends all estate left by a decedent within the purview of the act, after deducting debts, losses, and expenses of administration and an exemption of $50,000. Sections 202, 203 (§§ 6336½c, 6336½d). The tax is in general terms, and is a percentage upon the amount of the net estate. § 201. It is due one year after the death of the decedent. § 204 (§ 6336½e). It must be paid by the executor or administrator, and no direction is found in the act for apportionment among legatees or devisees. § 207 (§ 6336½h). The intent is expressed by § 208 (§ 6336½i) that, unless otherwise directed by will, the tax shall be paid out of the estate before distribution. The tax, if not sooner paid, is made a lien upon the gross estate for a period of ten years, except that it is divested as to such part as is used to defray charges against the estate, and expenses of administration when allowed by the court of appropriate jurisdiction. § 209 (§ 6336½j).

The contention that the tax is on the particular devises, bequests, or distributive shares is met at the outset by the heading or title given to the tax by the statute itself, which describes the kind of pecuniary imposition levied as an "estate tax." This is properly to be considered in interpreting a statute of the United States. Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 65, 44 L. ed. 969, 978, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747. The sections of the act prefaced by this heading, or title, refer exclusively to the value of the "net estate" as the basis for the ascertainment of the tax. There is no mention whatever in this connection of legacies, devises, or distributive shares. They are wholly omitted. The statute ignores utterly the disposition made of the estate by the testator or by the law as to intestate property, and looks only to the net estate itself as defined.

imposing the tax point strongly toward the interpretation that the tax is on the estate, and not on the particular devises, legacies, or distributive shares. The words "net estate" are used uniformly in the operative parts of the act to the exclusion of phrases of other significance.

Two considerations fortify this interpretation:

(1) The War Revenue Act of 1898, being an act approved on June 13 of that year (80 Stat. at L. 464), chap. 448, §§ 29, 30, plainly and by its express words imposed a tax on particular legacies and distributive shares arising from the property left by a decedent, and not on the whole personal estate so left. Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 43, 65, 67, 71, 44 L. ed. 969, 970, 978, 980, 981, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747. The contrast between the terms of that earlier act and those of the present throws a clear light on the meaning of the act here in question. If Congress had intended to levy a tax on legacies and distributive shares, it naturally would have adopted the words of its Act of 1898, which had been already used, and whose significance had been established by the highest judicial authority. Employment of other language of quite different import indicates a change of purpose.

(2) It is permissible to examine records of legislative proceedings incident to the passage of a statute to illumine its doubtful language, although its plain meaning cannot be thereby affected; but for this purpose resort commonly cannot be had to the debates of individual members. Old South Asso. v. Boston, 212 Mass. 299, 305, 99 N. E. 235, and cases there collected; United States v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 247 U. S. 310, 318, 62 L. ed. 1130, 1134, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525. The design of the framers of the Act of 1916 to establish an estate tax as distinguished from a legacy or distribution tax is manifested by the report of the committee on ways and means of the national House of Representatives, to which the Revenue Bill had been referred. In that report made on July 5, 1916 (Report No. 922, 64th Congress, 1st Session, page 5, under the heading "Estate Tax") are found these words: "Thirty states have laws imposing inheritance or share taxes both upon direct and collateral heirs. Twelve other states have laws imposing inheritance taxes upon collateral heirs. Your committee deemed it advisable to recommend a Federal estate tax upon the transfer of the net estate rather than upon the shares passing to heirs and distributees or devisees and legatees. The Federal estate tax recommended forms a well-balanced system of inheritance taxation as between the Federal government and the various states, and the same can be readily administered with less conflict than a tax based upon the shares."

An estate tax, as distinguished from a legacy or succession tax, is well recognized. It was said in Minot v. Winthrop, 162 Mass. 113, 124, 26 L.R.A. 259, 38 N. E. 516: "The right or privilege taxed can perhaps be regarded either as the right or privilege of the owner of property to transmit it on his death, by will or by descent, to certain persons, or as the right or privilege of these persons to receive the property."

The difference between the nature of the two kinds of taxes was pointed out and defined by a quotation from Hanson's Death Duties, by the present Chief Justice of the United States in Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, at page 49, 44 L. ed. 969, 973, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 751, in these words: "What it [that is, an estate tax] taxes is not the interest to which some person succeeds on a death, but the interest which ceased by reason of the death."

An estate tax is imposed upon the net estate transferred by death, and not upon the succession result-—examination

ing from death. Re Roebling, 89 N. J. Eq. 163, 104 Atl. 295.

The conclusion seems to us to follow irresistibly that the tax here in question is an estate and not a legacy or succession tax. This is in accord with the decision in Re Hamlin, 226 N. Y. 407, post, 701, 124 N. E. 4. Although the precise point was not presented for decision in Corbin v. Townsend, 92 Conn. 501, 505, 103 Atl. 647; People v. Pasfield, 284 Ill. 450, 453, 120 N. E. 286; State ex rel. Smith v. Probate Ct. 139 Minn. 210, 211, 166 N. W. 125, or Knight's Estate, 261 Pa. 537, 539, 104 Atl. 765, in each of those decisions there is a dictum to the effect that this is an estate tax. See, however, Fuller v. Gale, 78 N. H. 544, 103 Atl. 308.

The provisions of § 208 of the act, respecting "a just and equitable contribution" to one from whose share in the estate the tax has been collected "by the persons whose interest in the estate . . . would have been reduced" if the tax had been paid before distribution, or "whose interest is subject to equal or prior liability for the payment of taxes," affords no warrant for applying what may be thought, in a special instance, to be general equitable considerations in opposition to fixed principles as to the settlement of estates. That section is inapplicable to the facts here disclosed.

The further step follows inevitably from what has been said, that the law makes no provision for apportionment of the tax among legatees, but leaves it simply to be paid out of the estate before distribution is made.

The will and codicils of the testator contain no direction respecting the payment of this tax. There is nothing written in any of these testamentary instruments which rightly can be construed as expressing the purpose of the testator on the subject. Although the last codicil was executed after the enactment of the Federal taxing law, no reference is found therein touching the payment of the taxes imposed. So far as any inference may be drawn, it would seem to be that taxes were intended to fall where the law placed them. It is not permissible for us to speculate as to the existence of an intent to make a different provision from that provided by law, in the absence of any expression of testamentary purpose on the subject. It is the general rule that, failing any testamentary provision to the contrary, debts, charges, and all just obligations upon an estate must be paid out of the residue of an estate. The benefaction conferred by the residuary clause of a will is only of that which remains after all paramount claims upon the estate of the testator are satisfied. Tomlinson v. Bury, 145 Mass. 346, 1 Am. St. Rep. 464, 14 N. E. 137. The tax is a pecuniary burden or imposition laid upon the estate. Boston v. Turner, 201 Mass. 190, 193, 87 N. E. 634. In its nature, it is superior to the claims of the residuary legatee. Since neither the act of Congress nor the will and codicils make any other provision for the point of ultimate incidence of this tax, it must rest on the residue of the estate. Re Hamlin, 226 N. Y. 407, 418, 419, post, 701, 124 N. E. 4. Decree is to be entered instructing the executors accordingly.

NOTE.

The question decided in the reported case (PLUNKETT v. OLD COLONY TRUST CO. ante, 696), as to whether the Federal estate tax is to be charged upon the specific legacies or upon the residuary estate, is discussed in the annotation to RE HAMLIN, post, 708.

New York Court of Appeals — May 30, 1910.

1. The Act of Congress of 1916, imposing a tax equal to certain percentages in value of the net estate upon the transfer of the net estate of each decedent, imposes the tax upon the entire estate rather than upon the legatees or distributees.

[See note on this question beginning on page 708.]

Statute — construction — what considered.

2. In ascertaining the intention of the legislature in the enactment of a statute, such historical and other facts as are reasonably within the scope of judicial cognizance may be considered, including reports of committees in charge of the bill and changes made in its frame in the course of passage.

Tax — estate — conversion into legacy tax.

3. The imposition of a tax upon an estate is not impliedly converted into one upon the legatees or distributees, by provisions for contributions to those entitled to reimbursement, if the tax is collected out of the portion of the estate passing to them and making the trustee or transferee personally liable for the tax if the tax is not paid when due.

4. The tax falls upon the residuary, and not upon the particular, legatees in case the tax is imposed upon the net value of the estate.

APPEAL by the executors and residuary legatees of the estate of Mary E. Daniels, deceased, from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, reversing in part a decree of the Surrogate's Court for Erie County (Hart, S.), apportioning among legatees of the testatrix, payment of the Federal estate tax, in a proceeding for settlement of the accounts of the executors of her estate. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. O'Brian, Donovan, Goodyear, & Hellings, for executors, appellants:

The language of the statute imports an apportionment of the tax among legatees. Such pro rata apportionment is equitable.

The pro rata apportionment is in line with general custom and brings the estate tax within the constitutional power of Congress.

Hogan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mary E. Daniels, a resident of Erie county, died January 3, 1917, leaving a will executed July 8, 1907, which will was admitted to probate on January 16, 1917. The executors named therein duly qualified.

The testatrix, by her will, bequeathed to her daughter certain articles of personal property, and made bequests of money to nine individuals aggregating $160,000, amongst whom were George B. Mary, and Grace Wellington, cousins, each of whom was given a legacy of $25,000. The residue and remainder of the estate was bequeathed and devised to trustees, for Grace E. Hamlin and Chauncey J. Hamlin, with remainder to the children of Chauncey J. Hamlin, of whom there are three, all minors.

The executors of the will, having paid to each of the legatees named in the will the amount of the legacies given them, after deducting from each legacy the amount of transfer or inheritance taxes, together with a proportionate amount of the Federal estate tax, on the 6th day of April, 1918, filed their account with the surrogate of Erie county.

The account disclosed, so far as the Federal tax is involved, that the net estate of the testatrix taxable was $1,170,449.29; that the Federal tax as fixed thereon was $51,226.96 or .0437667 per cent of the whole net estate; that the executors had deducted from each legacy on account of that tax the stated per centum upon the amount of the legacy; thus, upon a legacy of $25,000, the deduction was $1,094.17.

Objections were filed on behalf of the three legatees in the $25,000 class to such deduction made against each of them, upon the grounds: (1) That said sum was not chargeable against them, but if chargeable should not exceed in amount $250 against each; (2) that under the act of Congress no apportionment of the Federal tax can be made, but that the whole thereof is payable by the executors out of the estate, but, in the event that an apportionment is to be made, the method of apportionment applied is erroneous. The objections were overruled and a decree entered confirming the account of the executors.

From such part of the decree as approved, allowed, and confirmed the action of the executors in apportioning pro rata the Federal tax and dismissing the objections filed to the account, the respondents legatees appealed to the appellate division. The latter court reversed the decree of the surrogate so far as appealed from (185 App. Div. 153, 172 N. Y. Supp. 787), and remitted the matter to the surrogate's court with directions to strike from the account the amount of the Federal tax charged against each of their legacies; the court unanimously holding that the tax was payable from the estate, and the legacies were not chargeable with any part of the same.

The sole question presented for determination arises under the objections filed to the account of the executors, viz.: Was any portion of the Federal tax chargeable against the legacies of the respondents? If so, what proportion of the same?

The act of Congress in force at the time of the death of the testatrix is contained in the Internal Revenue Law of September 8, 1916, chapter 463, designated under the title "Estate Tax." 39 Stat. at L. 777, Comp. Statutes, § 6336½a, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 305, and following.

Section 6336½b provides: "Taxing Percentages Based on Value of Net Estate.—A tax (hereinafter in this title referred to as the tax), equal to the following percentages of the value of the net estate to be determined as provided in section two hundred and three, [§ 6336½d] is hereby imposed upon the transfer of the net estate of every decedent dying after the passage of this act."

Then follows a table of percentages, viz., "1 per centum of the amount of such net estate not in excess of $50,000," and eight several specific percentages, of the amounts by which such net estate exceeds a stated sum, but does not exceed a sum mentioned and one additional rate, "10 per centum of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $5,000,000."

The act then provides the manner in which the value of the gross estate and the net value of the estate shall be determined. Sections 6336½c, 6336½d. The latter section, in substance, is as follows: "Net Value of Estate, How Determined.—For the purpose of the tax the value of the net estate shall be determined—(a) In the case of a resident, by deducting from the value of the gross estate—(1) Such amounts for funeral expenses, administration expenses, claims against the estate, unpaid mortgages, losses incurred during the settlement of the estate . . . support during the settlement of the estate of those dependent upon the decedent, and such other charges against the estate, as are allowed by the laws of the jurisdiction, whether within or without the United States, under which the estate is being administered; and (2) an exemption of $50,000."

The tax becomes due one year after a decedent's death. § 6336½e. The executors were required, within thirty days after qualifying as such, or after coming into possession of the property of decedent, to give written notice to the collector of internal revenue of the district in which the testatrix was domiciled at the time of her death, and file with him a return, under oath, setting forth the value of the gross estate, the deductions allowed under § 6336*d*, the value of the net estate as determined under that section, and tax paid or payable thereon. "The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall make all assessments of the tax under the authority of existing administrative special and general provisions of law relating to the assessment and collection of taxes" (§ 6336*f*), which provisions were by § 6336*i* made applicable to the Estate Tax Law. Payment of the tax is required to be made by the executor to the collector or deputy collector of internal revenue. Section 6336*h*.

In 1898, the Congress, for the purpose of meeting existing conditions, enacted a law known as the War Revenue Law (Act of Congress of June 13, 1898, chap. 448, 30 Stat. at L. 448, Comp. Stat. § 6144, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 135). That law imposed various taxes, amongst which was one under the heading, "Legacies and Distributive Shares of Personal Property." §§ 29, 30. Section 29 of the law provided "that any person or persons having in charge or trust, as administrators, executors or trustees, any legacies or distributive shares arising from personal property, where the whole amount of such personal property as aforesaid shall exceed the sum of ten thousand dollars in actual value, passing, after the passage of this act, from any person possessed of such property, either by will or by the intestate laws of any state or territory, or any personal property or interest therein, transferred by deed, grant, bargain, sale, or gift, made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor or bargainer, to any person or persons, or to any body or bodies, politic or corporate, in trust or otherwise, shall be, and hereby are, made subject to a duty or tax, to be paid to the United States as follows—that is to say: Where the whole amount of said per-

Then followed five classifications of beneficiaries, each varying in the rate of tax imposed, and a further provision of increase of rate of the tax dependent upon the amount or value of the property transferred. The validity and interpretation of the Law of 1898 was the subject of consideration by the United States Supreme Court. Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747. Mr. Justice White, writing for the court, reviewed at length the history of laws imposing death duties, impost and excise taxes, and various acts of the Congress in the enactment of revenue laws, and fully treated of the distinction between a tax imposed on the whole personal estate and a tax laid upon legacies or distributive shares, concluding that under the Law of 1898, the validity of which was sustained, the tax therein provided for was not upon the whole estate of a decedent, but was one imposed upon particular legacies or distributive shares.

In 1916, when the Congress was again confronted with the necessity of providing revenue, we may assume that the framers of a proposed law would, in the first instance, recall the Law of 1898, and the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Knowlton Case, to the end that any proposed legislation should be within constitutional limitations and consonant with the decision of the court. Had the Congress of 1916 intended to impose a tax upon legacies or distributive shares, the task would be lightened by practically following the Act of 1898, as construed by the court, with any changes deemed advisable in the rate of the tax imposed. That the Congress did intend, by the Law of 1916, to impose a tax on the net value of the estate of a decedent at a flat rate dependent upon the amount of the same, rather than upon legatees or distributees, is evident by a comparison of the Act of 1916 with the Act of 1898. In the latter statute, the provision imposing the tax was embodied under a heading, "Legacies and Distributive Shares of Personal Property." Under the Act of 1916 the tax imposed is characterized as "Estate Tax." Under the Statute of 1898, the tax was imposed upon legacies and distributive shares and any interest which may have been "transferred by deed, grant, bargain, sale, or gift, made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor or bargainor, to any person or persons." Then followed a provision enumerating several classes whereby the rate of the tax imposed varied, depending upon relationship or nonrelationship between the decedent and the beneficiaries. Under the Act of 1916, the tax is imposed upon the net value of the estate of decedent as the same shall be determined as in the act provided. As to transfers, etc., made in contemplation of death, such transfers are to be included in the value of the gross estate and considered as a part of the same prior to the determination of the value of the net estate. The number of legatees, their relationship or nonrelationship to a decedent, etc., do not enter into consideration in a determination of the value of the estate. The sole basis of taxation is the net value of the estate, and the tax is determined upon the amount thereof.

As bearing upon the intention of the legislature of this state in the enactment of a statute, we may consider such historical or other facts as are reasonably within the scope of judicial cognizance. People v. Charles Schweinler Press, 214 N. Y. 395, L.R.A.1918A, 1124, 108 N. E. 639, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 1059. It is also permissible in an interpretation of an act of Congress to refer to the reports of a committee, including the bill as introduced, changes made in the frame of the bill in the course of its passage, and statements made by the committee chairman in charge of it, under proper qualifications. United States v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 247 U. S. 310, 318, 62 L. ed. 1130, 1134, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525. Within the limitations of the rules prescribed, an examination of the records of the Congress discloses the following facts: The House of Representatives' Bill (No. 16,763) was referred to the committee on ways and means, of which Mr. Kitchin was chairman. On July 5, 1916, the committee on ways and means through its chairman reported the bill to the House of Representatives (Report No. 922, 64th Congress, 1st Session); and recommended that the bill do pass. The report of the committee under the heading "Estate Tax" reads: "Thirty states have laws imposing inheritance or share taxes both upon direct and collateral heirs. Twelve other states have laws imposing inheritance taxes upon collateral heirs. Your committee deemed it advisable to recommend a Federal estate tax upon the transfer of the net estate, rather than upon the shares passing to heirs and distributees or devisees and legatees. The Federal estate tax recommended forms a well-balanced system of inheritance taxation as between the Federal government and the various states, and the same can be readily administered with less conflict than a tax based upon the shares."

On July 6th, when the proposed measure was under consideration in the committee of the whole, while Mr. Kitchin, the chairman of the ways and means committee, was explaining the nature of the estate tax, he was asked by a member of the House if he recalled how the proposed tax rate compared with the inheritance tax rates in the state of New York, to which inquiry Mr. Kitchin replied: "No, I do not know. We levy an entirely different sys-construction—

what

tem of inheritance taxes. We levy the tax on the transfer of the flat or whole net estate. We do not follow the beneficiaries and see how much this one gets and that one gets, and what rate should be levied on lineal and what on collateral relations, but we simply levy on the net estate. This also prevents the Federal government, through the Treasury Department, going into the courts contesting and construing wills and Statutes of Distribution."

On August 16th, while the bill (H. R. 16,763), having passed the House of Representatives, was in the Senate, the committee on finance, through Senator Simmons, made a report thereon to the Senate, in the course of which he stated: "The report of the committee on ways and means of the House of Representatives states with such clearness, ability, and sufficiency the reasons for raising this additional revenue by impositions upon incomes, inheritances, and munitions of war that your committee contents itself with incorporating in its report that part of the report of the ways and means committee dealing with this subject."

Then follows, under the head of "Estate Tax," the language already quoted from the report made by Mr. Kitchin from the committee on ways and means. Senate Report No. 793, part 1, 64th Congress, 1st Session.

The Senate recommended additional classifications to those contained in the House bill, which were subsequently adopted and are found in the present act.

The plain intent and obvious meaning of the act of Congress under consideration, especially when considered in connection with the facts surrounding the enactment of the same, indicate clearly that the act imposes an "estate tax" as distinguished from an inheritance tax, that the tax is payable by the estate rather than by the legatees, as determined by the appellate division.

The appellants admit that the act does not contain an express direction as to how the estate tax shall be apportioned, but argue that the language of certain sections thereof and amendments disclose an intention that the tax should be apportioned pro rata. In support of the suggestion, counsel cites § 6336*i*, which reads: "If the tax herein imposed is not paid within sixty days after it is due, the collector shall, unless there is reasonable cause for further delay, commence appropriate proceedings in any court of the United States, in the name of the United States, to subject the property of the decedent to be sold under the judgment or decree of the court. From the proceeds of such sale the amount of the tax, together with the costs and expenses of every description to be allowed by the court, shall be first paid, and the balance shall be deposited according to the order of the court, to be paid under its direction to the person entitled thereto. If the tax or any part thereof is paid by, or collected out of that part of the estate passing to or in the possession of, any person other than the executor in his capacity as such, such person shall be entitled to reimbursement out of any part of the estate still undistributed or by a just and equitable contribution by the persons whose interest in the estate of the decedent would have been reduced if the tax had been paid before the distribution of the estate or whose interest is subject to equal or prior liability for the payment of taxes, debts, or other charges against the estate, it being the purpose and intent of this title that so far as is practicable and unless otherwise directed by the will of the decedent the tax shall be paid out of the estate before its distribution."

Counsel submits that the words, "just and equitable contribution," which words I have italicized, were intended to adopt a method for equitably apportioning the tax among all persons benefiting from the transfer of the estate, especially when construed in connection with § 6336*j*, which reads: "Unless the tax is sooner paid in full, it shall be a lien for ten years upon the gross estate of the decedent, except that such part of the gross estate as is used for the payment of charges against the estate and expenses of its administration, allowed by any court having jurisdiction thereof, shall be divested of such lien. If the decedent makes a transfer of, or creates a trust with respect to, any property in contemplation of or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after his death (except in the case of a bona fide sale for a fair consideration in money or money's worth) and if the tax in respect thereto is not paid when due, the transferee or trustee shall be personally liable for such tax, and such property to the extent of the decedent's interest therein at the time of such transfer, shall be subject to a like lien equal to the amount of such tax. Any part of such property sold by such transferee or trustee to a bona fide purchaser for a fair consideration in money or money's worth shall be divested of the lien and a like lien shall then attach to all the property of such transferee or trustee, except any part sold to a bona fide purchaser for a fair consideration in money or money's worth."

To hold that the Congress, by the language of the sections referred to, intended by implication to provide that the tax imposed by the act was one upon legacies, the tax to be paid by legatees, would not only violate the clearly expressed intention of the Congress, but require us to ignore the historical facts surrounding consideration of the measure by the Congress. When

legacy tax.

the Congress provided that the tax was imposed upon the value of the net estate, the manner in which said value should be determined, and that the executor should pay the tax, and in § 6336*i*, above quoted, said, "It being the purpose and intent of this title that so far as is practicable and unless otherwise directed by the will of the decedent the tax shall be paid out of the estate before its distribution," the conclusion is inevitable that the tax was not imposed on legacies, the tax to be paid by the legatees, rather than by the executor out of the estate before distribution. Had the Congress desired to provide for an apportionment of a tax amongst legatees, it might readily have used language adopted by that body in 1901 (31 Stat. at L. 948, chap. 806, § 11) when it amended § 30 of the Act of 1898, reviewed in the Knowlton Case, infra, by adding thereto, "Any tax paid under the provisions of sections twenty-nine and thirty shall be deducted from the particular legacy or distributive share on account of which the same is charged," or, as provided in our statute, that the executor shall deduct the tax on a legacy or distributive share.

Dissenting, as we do, from the argument of counsel for appellants in his application of the sections quoted, it would not be profitable to analyze the sections at length. As stated by Mr. Kitchin, chairman of the ways and means committee, the basis of the tax "prevents the Federal government, through the Treasury Department, going into the courts contesting and construing wills and Statutes of Distribution." Much might be written upon the application of the sections quoted, as to the intention of the Congress to insure the payment of the tax, the administrative features of the sections, and cases illustrated where the sections would or would not apply, but such questions are not before us in this case, and discussion thereof should be avoided until such time as a case involving the same is presented.

Counsel for appellants also calls attention to amendments made to the Law of 1916 by the Act of Congress of February 24, 1919, chap. 18, 40 Stat. at L. 1057, which in effect provide that the value of the gross estate of the decedent shall include "to the extent of the amount receivable by the executor as insurance under policies taken out by the decendent upon his own life; and to the extent of the excess over $40,000 of the amount receivable by all other beneficiaries as insurance under policies taken out by the decedent upon his own life" (§ 6336½c, new § 402); also, amendment to § 6336½i, new § 408, which provides: "If any part of the gross estate consists of proceeds of policies of insurance upon the life of the decedent receivable by a beneficiary other than the executor, the executor shall be entitled to recover from such beneficiary such portion of the total tax paid as the proceeds, in excess of $40,000, of such policies bear to the net estate. If there is more than one such beneficiary the executor shall be entitled to recover from such beneficiaries in the same ratio,"—and submits that thereby the Congress required the beneficiaries of insurance policies and of transfers made in contemplation of death to pay a tax on their respective interests, computed on the basis of the whole net estate, while under the decision of the appellate division in the case at bar all general legatees would receive their legacies in full. Counsel in his brief expressed doubt as to the constitutionality of such amendment, but such question is not before us, and reference is made to the same only as bearing upon the intention of the Act of 1916. Viewed from that standpoint, the conclusions already expressed as to the Act of 1916 remain unchanged.

I have not deemed it necessary to refer to the power of the Congress to enact the law under consideration. To one interested in such question, the careful and exhaustive opinion of Mr. Justice White in the Knowlton Case, 178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747, will be of interest. As to the equity of requiring payment of the tax by the residuary legatees and relieving the remaining legatees from any contribution to the same, the question <sup>—where burden falls.</sup> is susceptible of conflict of opinion. The Congress has spoken, and it is our function to interpret, not to legislate.

The order of the Appellate Division should be affirmed, with costs payable out of the estate.

Hiscock, Ch. J., and Chase, Cardozo, Pound, McLaughlin, and Andrews, JJ., concur.

ANNOTATION.

Liability as between residuary estate and legacies or devisees for Federal estate tax.

The majority of cases which have passed upon the Federal inheritance or estate tax act of September 8, 1916 (39 Stat. at L. 777, chap. 463, §§ 200-212, Comp. Stat. §§ 6336½a-6336½m, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, pp. 305-310), hold that it is imposed upon the estates of decedents, and not upon legatees or devisees. RE HAMLIN (reported herewith) ante, 701; PLUNKETT v. OLD COLONY TRUST CO. (reported herewith) ante, 696.

The general theory of these cases that the Federal estate tax of 1916 is a tax upon the estates of decedents is supported by the cases adhering to the majority view as to whether the amount of the Federal tax is to be deducted before the state tax is computed, discussed in the annotation to People v. Northern Trust Co. post, 714.

A different view has been taken of this statute. In Fuller v. Gale (1918) 78 N. H. 544, 103 Atl. 308, a petition by an executor for the construction of a will in which advice was asked as to "what, if any, part of the estate tax imposed by the United States falls upon the legacies other than residuary," the court answered the question as follows: "The estate tax imposed by act of Congress is to be paid pro rata by all who share in the estate. It is not a property tax, but one imposed upon the transfer of the net estate.' 39 Stat. at L. 777, chap. 463, § 201, Comp. Stat. § 6336½b, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 305. It is not like the foreign inheritance taxes considered in Kingsbury v. Bazeley (1908) 75 N. H. 13, 139 Am. St. Rep. 664, 70 Atl. 916, 20 Ann. Cas. 1355, but is imposed by a law which applies to the devolution of estates in this jurisdiction. It not being otherwise directed by the will, the tax is to be paid out of the estate and charged pro rata to each beneficiary."

In Re Douglass (1918) 104 Misc. 359, 171 N. Y. Supp. 956 (decided before the reported case), it was held in the case of the will of a testator executed before the passage of the United States estate tax law, that the amount of the tax should not be paid as an administration expense and thus charged wholly to the residuary legatees, but should be deducted proportionately from each legacy. The court states that "while the act provides that the tax is imposed upon the transfer of the estate, and not upon the transfer of the interests of the respective legatees, it would be obviously unjust to the residuary legatees to deduct the tax in toto from the estate in the same manner as administration expenses are deducted. The will of testator was executed before the passage of the Revenue Act, and there would, therefore, be no justification for assuming that he contemplated the enactment of such a law and the payment of the tax exclusively out of the shares of the residuary legatees. . . . It seems, therefore, that the tax should be deducted proportionately from each legacy, and that the amount to be deducted is that proportion of the entire tax assessed against the estate which the individual legacy bears to the entire net estate."

But see RE HAMLIN (reported herewith) ante, 701.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

v.

NORTHERN TRUST COMPANY, Exr., etc., of Charles W. Pardridge, Deceased, Appt.

(289 Ill. 475, 124 N. E. 662.)

Tax — estate — deduction of Federal tax.

1. The Federal estate tax imposed upon the estate of a decedent should be deducted as a charge or expense against the estate before assessing the tax imposed by the law of a state.

— trust — power of revocation — effect.

2. A trust established by a man for the benefit of his children and their appointees does not become taxable as in contemplation of death merely because a power of revocation is reserved in it.

Statute — adoption — construction given it.

3. Where a statute is adopted by a state after it has been construed by the courts of the state of its origin, it is held to have been adopted with the construction so given it.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of Cook County Court (Cooke, J.) in favor of plaintiff in a suit to subject property of decedent to an inheritance tax. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Fisher, Boyden, Kales, & Bell and Darrell S. Boyd for appellant.

Messrs. Edward J. Brundage, Attorney General, LeRoy Millner, Walter K. Lincoln, and Henry F. Hawkins for the People.

Duncan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Northern Trust Company, executor of the estate of Charles W. Pardridge, deceased, has appealed from a judgment of the county court of Cook county, requiring appellant to pay inheritance taxes in the amount of $31,818.20 upon the property interests disposed of by two deeds of settlement executed by Pardridge in his lifetime and a further inheritance tax of $53,144.20 on interests disposed of by his will.

There are three questions raised by the assignment of errors on this record: (1) In computing the state inheritance tax on the value of the property passing by the will of the testator, is appellant entitled to have first deducted therefrom the Federal estate tax? (2) Are the property interests disposed of by the aforesaid deeds of trust subject to an inheritance tax? (3) If the properties transferred by the deeds of trust are taxable, should they be taxed according to their value on their respective dates or as of the date of the testator's death?

It is conceded by appellee that the court erred in holding that the properties transferred by the deeds of trust should be assessed on their values at the respective dates of the deeds instead of their values at the date of the testator's death, and in the view that we have taken of this case that question need not be further considered.

The only question relative to the tax assessed on the property passing by the will of the testator is the refusal of the court to first deduct the Federal estate taxes as an expense of the estate before assessing the tax on the property passing by will. The testator died November 17, 1917. He left an estate valued by the inheritance tax appraiser at $2,-871,151.71, which he disposed of by will. The county court, in assessing the state inheritance tax on that property, refused to deduct the Federal estate tax paid by the executor, <sup>Tax—estate—deduction of Federal tax.</sup> amounting to $316,-432.40. In this ruling the court erred. The Federal estate tax is a charge or an expense against the estate of the decedent rather than against the shares of the legatees or the distributees, and as part of the expense of administration this tax should be deducted before computing the state inheritance tax. People v. Pasfield, 284 Ill. 450, 120 N. E. 286.

The two deeds in question contained substantially the same provisions, were absolute in form, and were executed to the Northern Trust Company, as trustee, on May 6, 1910, and on December 18, 1911, respectively. The real estate and leasehold interests so conveyed were valued by the inheritance tax appraiser at $2,333,333.33. Besides the tax assessed on this property, on a large balance thereof there is still left in suspense, under the judgment of the court, a state inheritance tax by reason of the fact that some of the beneficiaries cannot be ascertained until the exercise of certain powers of appointment. Trust instruments separate and apart from the deeds were executed on the respective days that the deeds were executed, and they are substantially the same in form and contain substantially the same provisions. They provide that the trustee shall take possession of the trust property, with complete power to manage, lease, care for, and protect the same; to collect the rents and incomes therefrom; to pay taxes and assessments levied thereon; to repair and keep the buildings in repair and rebuild the same if destroyed; to insure the same against fire and other casualties usually insured against by prudent owners in Chicago; and to have the right to institute and defend all legal proceedings affecting the same. The trustee is to hold the property in trust for the testator's four children, Edward W. Pardridge, Albert J. Pardridge, Evelyn Florence Pardridge Engalitcheff, and May Aline Pardridge Sargent, for their natural lives and until the death of the last survivor of them in equal shares as tenants in common, and is to hold the share of each deceased child in trust for such person or persons as such deceased child shall by last will or testament have appointed. In default of such appointment the trustee shall hold such deceased child's share in trust for the issue of such deceased child, and if any child shall die without issue its portion shall be divided equally among the other shareholders of the trust estate. The distribution of the trust estate is to be made upon the death of the last survivor of the four children. During the lifetime of each of the four children the trustee is to pay in monthly instalments the net income arising from such child's share, and from and after the death of any of said four children, and until the death of the last survivor of them, the net income arising from such deceased child's share is to be paid in monthly instalments to the person or persons for whom such share is held under the terms of the trust agreements. The deeds also provide that a majority of the four children then living may at any time, by an instrument under seal delivered to the trustee, admit their brother Charles A. Pardridge as a tenant in common with them in such property, with like powers and privileges granted to him for the receiving and appointing persons to receive said property and the issues and profits thereof. His interest, however, is at no time to exceed one fifth of the income of said trust estate, and in case he is so admitted as a beneficiary the final distribution of the property is to be made on the death of the last survivor of the five brothers and sisters, and during his lifetime the trustee is to hold the property for the benefit of the five brothers and sisters upon the same terms as provided in the original trust agreement for the original four brothers and sisters. The deeds provide for compensation to the trustee and for the appointment of the two sons Edward W. and Albert J. Pardridge, and the survivor of them, as the agent of the trustee in the management of the trust estate, and also fix their compensation and require them to give a bond. Their powers and duties are to determine the rental to be charged for the property and to negotiate and prepare all leases for the same, to assume entire charge of affairs and make all contracts for the same, pay all taxes and assessments against the trust estate and insure the same, and to render statements of accounts of all the receipts and disbursements concerning the same. The trustee has full authority to remove said agents, or either of them, in case of neglect or misconduct or inability to discharge their duties as such. In case the trustee shall resign, the majority of the beneficiaries then entitled to share in the net income of the trust estate are given the right to name the successor of the trustee. By the terms of the trust deeds no person entitled to a share of the net income of the trust estate shall have the right to anticipate the same, nor to sell, assign, mortgage, pledge, or otherwise dispose of or encumber his share in the trust estate or any part of it or the income therefrom, and no share of the trust estate, or the income arising therefrom, shall be liable for his or her debts or be subject to attachment, garnishment, execution, creditor's bill, or other legal or equitable process. The trust agreements finally reserve to the settlor the right of revoking the deeds and each and every trust therein created and declared, either in whole or in part, by notice in writing to the trustee, and in case of such revocation said trust estate, or the portion thereof so revoked, shall be conveyed by the trustee to the settlor, to be held by him as his sole and absolute property and discharged from all trusts declared in said trust agreements.

Oral testimony was offered in the county court showing clearly that the provision for the revocation of the trust agreements was inserted by the attorney who drew up the same at his own suggestion, and without any instructions from the settlor with reference to the same. The testimony further shows that the settlor exercised no further control over the property whatever after the trust agreements and conveyances were executed, and received none of the income therefrom. He even declined to be consulted about the management thereof when on one occasion one of the sons sought his advice. The trustee accepted the trust, and up until the settlor's death managed the property according to the provisions of the trust agreement and without consulting him with reference to the same, and the settlor never offered any suggestions as to the management of the property to anyone. About all this testimony was excluded by the court over appellant's objections. The court, however, found as facts that neither one of said trust instruments was made by the settlor in contemplation of death, and that neither one of said instruments was intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after his death, and that both of said instruments were intended to, and that they actually did, take effect in possession and enjoyment on the respective dates of their execution. The court further found that the donor did not, during his lifetime and subsequent to the respective dates of execution of said deeds, exercise any dominion, power, or control over said property, and did not during his lifetime, by any instrument in writing or otherwise, revoke the trust deeds, or either of them, in whole or in part.

The oral evidence and the trust deeds and the trust instruments all sustain the finding of the court as to the facts, and there is no contention whatever between the parties to this record in that regard. By the written instruments the grantor or settlor intended to make a voluntary settlement of a large part of his property. The only right or power reserved in the deeds was the right of revocation. The instruments cannot be construed in any way as reserving any right in the settlor to alter or amend the trust or to add to or withdraw from the trust any portion of the property or to exchange any portion of the property by substituting other properties for the same. The instruments give no right of control to the settlor of any of the properties conveyed, or even the right to direct the management or enjoyment of the trust estate. The evidence is undisputed, also, that he never, in fact, exercised or sought to exercise any right of control, disposition, or enjoyment over the property, and never received a penny of the income or profits of the same. He expressed it as his wish, when consulted by one of his sons, that they and the trustee should manage and control the property and to use their own judgment, and that he did not want to be longer bothered or troubled by such affairs. The mere right of revocation would not have been written in the trust instruments had it not been suggested by his attorney, and the attorney advised it as a matter of protection of the donees in case any of them proved to be spendthrifts or otherwise incapable of protecting their own interests. This character of deed, with such a power of revocation, has long been recognized by our law as a proper mode of an ancestor deeding his property to his children and of protecting them in the use and enjoyment of the same. All well-skilled and farseeing lawyers, advising for the benefit of their clients, usually suggest the insertion of such a clause of revocation, and no court, so far as we know, has ever declared that such a deed is testamentary in character, or is to be held to take effect only after death, by reason, alone, of such a clause of revocation. In fact, it is not possible for such a clause to have such effect. As a matter of fact, such a deed takes effect at once, and continues in full force and effect until actually revoked. If revoked it can only be revoked during the life of the grantor, and if he does not call into effect such power of revocation during his lifetime it continues in full force and effect forever after his death. If he revokes the deed under such a power the deed becomes a nullity, and the title will be reinvested in the settlor by the deed of reconveyance by the trustee.

The court in substance held as a proposition of law that the powers of revocation reserved to the grantor in the trust instruments were sufficient, in themselves, to cause the property passing by the deeds of trust to be taxable under § 1 of the Inheritance Tax Act. So far as applicable that section provides: "A tax shall be and is hereby imposed upon the transfer of any property, real, personal or mixed, or of any interest therein or income therefrom, in trust or otherwise, . . . when the transfer is of property made by a resident, . . . by deed, grant, bargain, sale or gift, made in contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor or donor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death." Hurd, Stat. 1917, p. 2500.

There is no contention that the deeds were made in contemplation of death. It is admitted that they were not so made. As the deeds were not intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after the death of the settlor, and as this is also an admitted fact, the conveyance does not come within the statute, and the property of revocation—

effect.

was not taxable under our Inheritance Tax Law. Our Inheritance Tax Law, so far as this provision is concerned, was literally copied from the New York statute. The New York court of appeals confirmed, without delivering an opinion, the appellate division of the supreme court in holding that the mere power reserved in a deed to revoke the same did not operate to change the effect of the deed, but that the deed took effect at once, and was so intended, and that the property should not have been included in an appraisal of an estate for the purpose of taxation under the New York Inheritance Tax Act (Consol. Laws, chap. 60, §§ 220-245). Re Masury, 28 App. Div. 580, 51 N. Y. Supp. 331, affirmed by New York court of appeals in 159 N. Y. 532, 53 N. E. 1127. Where a statute is adopted from another state or country, and the same has been construed by the court of such state or country, it is the general rule that the statute is to be held to have been adopted with the construction so given to it, and particularly where the statute itself does not express an intention to the contrary. People v. Carpenter, 264 Ill. 400, 106 N. E. 302.

adoption—construction

We have been referred to other New York cases, and particularly to the case of Re Bostwick, 160 N. Y. 489, 55 N. E. 208, as making a different holding from that in Re Masury, just cited. The Bostwick Case does not in any wise overrule the former decision of the New York court of appeals, but serves to distinguish that case from the cases later considered by that court.

The construction that we have placed upon this statute will not, in our judgment, aid parties in evading the Inheritance Tax Law. Whenever it becomes manifest that a deed was intended as an evasion of the Inheritance Tax Law the state will be protected in the collection of the inheritance tax, no matter what the form of the deed may be. We are entirely unwilling, however, to declare that trust deeds and trust instruments in the form in which we find those under consideration in this record render the property conveyed taxable under our Inheritance Tax Act by the mere insertion of a clause of revocation so useful and so long in use for the protection of grantees in such deeds, when it so clearly appears that that was the sole intention as it does in this case.

The judgment of the county court is reversed in so far as it affects the property conveyed by the trust deed, with directions to modify the judgment affecting the property transferred by will in accordance with the views herein expressed.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

ANNOTATION.

Deduction of Federal estate tax before computing state tax.

The question under annotation herein has been raised under two Federal statutes, viz., that of 1898 (June 13, 1898, chap. 448, 30 Stat. at L. 464, §§ 29, 30) and that of 1916 and 1917 (Act Sept. 8, 1916, 39 Stat. at L. 777, chap. 463, §§ 200-212, as amended March 3, 1917, 39 Stat. at L. 1002, chap. 159, § 300, Comp. Stat. § 6336½b, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 305). With the exception of the New York and Wisconsin decisions the authorities agree with the reported case (PEOPLE v. NORTHERN TRUST CO. ante, 709), that the amount paid the Federal government is an expense of administration, and should be deducted from the estate and the state tax computed on the balance.

Statute of 1898.

The fact that an intestate estate is involved has been held not to change the rule. Re Tyler (1918) — N. J. Eq. —, 104 Atl. 298.

These courts construe the Federal Act of 1916 as a tax upon the estate. In Corbin v. Townshend (Conn.) supra, it is stated that by § 208 of the Federal Act the intent of the act is expressed to be, so far as is practicable, and unless otherwise directed by the will of the decedent, that "the tax shall be paid out of the estate before its dissolution;" that the "executor or administrator must pay the tax out of the estate before the shares of the legatees are ascertained. It is an obligation against the estate and payable like any expense which falls under the head of administration expenses. The tax paid is no part of the estate at the time of distribution; it has passed from the estate, and the share of the beneficiary is diminished by just so much." The court in People v. Pasfield (1918) 284 Ill. 450, 120 N. E. 286, states that "as the duty is made payable by the executor or administrator to the collector or deputy collector by the express provisions of the statute, the duty is an expense or charge against the estate of the decedent, and not an express charge against the shares of the legatees or distributees of the decedent. The legatees and distributees cannot in any sense be held to have 'received' any part of the duty that is paid to the government by the executor or trustee or administrator as such estate tax, and there is no language in the act that will permit a construction that the duty is levied upon each share of the legatees or distributees of the decedent as was given the Federal Act of 1898 by the court in Knowlton v. Moore (1900) 178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747. The Federal Estate Tax Act of September 8, 1916, necessarily operated to lessen by the amount of such tax the clear value of the beneficial interest which passed to the heirs and legatees in the instant case and prevented their receiving any part of that tax, and the ruling of the county court that the same should be deducted before computing the state tax was correct." The court in Re Roebling (1918) — N. J. Eq. —, 104 Atl. 295, states that the value of the net estate is the unit of taxation under the Federal act, that "there is no apportionment of it among the various transferees, nor is the real estate devised or descending liable to contribution. On the contrary, the collector may recover the tax by a sale of the land, and in that event the devisee or heir at law shall be reimbursed out of any part of the personal estate unadministered or by an equitable contribution by those whose interest is subject to equal or prior liability for the payment of taxes, debts, or other charges against the estate. . . . To be more precise, it is imposed upon the estate transferred by death, and not upon the succession resulting from death."

The state statutes of these states, on the other hand, are construed to tax the property passing to the beneficiary. In State ex rel. Smith v. Probate Ct. (1918) 139 Minn. 210, 166 N. W. 125, the state statute is said to "impose a tax upon the transfer of property 'by will or by the intestate laws' from the person who died possessed thereof, and provides that the tax shall be a specified per centum of the clear value of the beneficial interest in the property which passes to the beneficiaries designated by the will or the statute. Gen. Stat. 1913, §§ 2271, 2272." And the court, discussing the character of this statute, says that "according to the statute the tax is to be computed only upon the clear value of the property or the interest therein which actually passes to the beneficiaries. And is not to be computed upon the amount expended in administering the estate or in paying proper charges against it. . . . The Federal tax operated to lessen by the amount of such tax the clear value of the beneficial interest which passed to the two children, and the ruling of the probate court was correct." The court in Re Roebling (N. J.) supra, states that under the state statute the tax is not imposed upon the immediate transfer of property occasioned by death, "but upon the transfer to any person or corporation when the transfer is the subject of a legacy or devise of distribution or descent). In other words, it is not on the transitory succession of the executor or administrator, but upon the separate successions of the transferees, whether the succession be of the whole of the estate—a universal succession—or of the singular succession of a legatee or devisee. . . . The tax is not upon the aggregate value of the estate transferred, apportioned among the transferees, but is assessed upon the value of the several interests and is levied upon kindred at varying rates depending upon the relationship of the transferees to the decedent. Each transferee is liable for the tax upon his share of the estate, which is to be deducted from the legacies or distributive shares by the executor, and for the payment of which he is personally liable." The inheritance taxes due the state of Connecticut under its statute are stated in Corbin v. Townshend (1918) 92 Conn. 501, 103 Atl. 647, to be measured by the amount of property passing to the beneficiary.

One of the courts taking the foregoing view under the Statute of 1916-1917 makes a distinction between the provisions of that act and that of 1898. People v. Paseld (1918) 284 Ill. 450, 120 N. E. 286. But the theory that the Federal tax must be deducted before computing the state tax has been adhered to under the Act of 1898. Hopper v. Shaw (1900) 176 Mass. 190, 57 N. E. 361. In holding that a tax payable under the Statute of 1898 is deductible and that a state tax should be computed on the balance, the court states that "whatever the nature of the state succession tax, it is admitted and is obvious that the value of the property concerned is made the measure of the tax. This appears from the words of the act, which also show at what moment the value is to be taken. The words are 'property . . . which shall pass . . . to any person.' Without throwing doubt upon the power of the state to adopt a harsh rule such as has been applied to some of the surrogates in New York, we are of opinion that these words most naturally signify the property which the legatee actually would get were it not for the state tax imposed by the sentence in which the words occur. . . . The question is not one of precedence between the commonwealth and the United States, as it was put by the assistant attorney general. It is in substance one of justice, and in form one of construction. The United States recognizes, as it ought, the same principle by deducting the state succession tax before computing its own."

In New York and Wisconsin it is held that the Federal tax cannot be deducted and the state tax computed only on the balance, but that the state tax must be computed without deduction of the Federal tax.

Statute of 1916-1917.

Re Bierstadts (1917) 178 App. Div. 836, 166 N. Y. Supp. 168; Re Sherman (1917) 179 App. Div. 497, 166 N. Y. Supp. 19, affirmed without opinion in (1917) 222 N. Y. 540, 118 N. E. 1078; Re Week (1919) — Wis. —, 172 N. W. 732.

In holding that the amount of the Federal tax under the Act of 1898 could not be deducted before computing the amount of the state tax, the court of appeals of New York in Re Gihon (1902) (N. Y.) supra, emphasizes the similar character of the state and Federal tax. The court says: "The Federal tax is of exactly the same nature as the state tax,—a tax, not on property, but on succession; that is to say, a tax on the legatee for the privilege of succeeding to property. Knowlton v. Moore (1900) 178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747. The Federal tax is necessarily of this character, for a direct tax, unless apportioned according to population, would be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Under that statute also it is the amount of the legacy, not of the estate, that determines the rate of taxation. Therefore, though the administrator or executor is required to pay the tax, he pays it out of the legacy for the legatee, not on account of the estate."

The court in Re Bierstadts (1917) 178 App. Div. 836, 166 N. Y. Supp. 168, as well as the court in Re Sherman (1917) 179 App. Div. 497, 166 N. Y. Supp. 19, affirmed without opinion in (1917) 222 N. Y. 540, 118 N. E. 1078, treats the Federal estate tax under the Act of 1916-1917 as a tax imposed upon the transfer of property. The court in Re Sherman states that it is imposed upon the transfer of the net estate, that the fact that it is to be paid out of property does not render it a tax on property. The court argued further with reference to the Federal tax that if the Federal government "may impose an inheritance tax which is entitled to be deducted from the estate prior to the assessment of the state transfer tax, it has interfered with such conditions and has diminished the amount which the state has appropriated as a condition of the transfer being had by the percentage upon the sum appropriated by the Federal government. The state transfer tax will thus have become one, not upon the whole estate transmitted, but one upon the whole estate less the amount of the Federal tax. This lessening of the transfer tax, while not large in the case at bar would aggregate a very considerable sum when applied to all the estates subject to tax within the state. The constitutionality of the Federal act entitled to such a construction and effect might well be doubted." And the court concludes, as above stated, that the Federal tax cannot be deducted before computing the state tax.

The court in Re Week (1919) — Wis. —, 172 N. W. 733, states that "if the Federal estate tax, so-called, should be deducted in ascertaining the amount upon which the inheritance tax of this state is to be computed, it must be by force of our own statute. . . . The question, therefore, is this: Does our statute provide for the deduction of the Federal estate tax in ascertaining the amount upon which the state inheritance tax shall be computed? There is no express provision to that effect. Is one implied? Our inheritance tax law was enacted pursuant to the power of the legislature to reasonably regulate transfers of property and business transactions as stated in Nunnemacher v. State (1906) 129 Wis. 190, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 121, 108 N. W. 627, 9 Ann. Cas. 711. It is a tax imposed on a transaction; the transaction being the passing of property from the dead to the living. It is not a tax upon the property itself, and consequently neither the property nor the value thereof necessarily and inherently constitutes the basis for the amount of the tax. The tax being based on a transaction, however, some basis must be fixed by the legislature by which the tax shall be determined. The legislature has made such basis the clear market value of the property at the time of the transfer. The transfer contemplated occurs at the instant of death. . . . There is no provision made in the statute for any deduction from the value of the estate as it may be determined to be as of the date of the death of the deceased, and we see no warrant for reading into the statute provisions for the deduction of any amount which the legislature did not see fit to insert." The court then states that a different conclusion might be necessary if, under the Wisconsin statute, the tax were computed upon the value of the property finally and as of the time of passing to the legatee or devisee, and states that it was this consideration which largely influenced the conclusion announced by the courts of Illinois, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Minnesota, supra. As shown above these courts have come to a conclusion contrary to that of the Wisconsin court. It is not altogether clear that the view taken in these cases as to the basis of the computation of the tax is due to different statutory provisions than those involved in the Wisconsin case.

The Wisconsin court further states that there may be some difficulty in reconciling its conclusion "with the prevailing practice of deducting expenses of administration. We realize that our logic would lead to a rejection of such deduction. We have no disposition, however, to disturb the practice that has uniformly prevailed."

A situation similar to that arising under our form of government exists in Australia, and it has there been held, in accord with the New York and Wisconsin cases, that the tax due the commonwealth should not be deducted before computing the tax due to a province. Commercial Bkg. Co. v. Federal Comr. (1917) 23 C. L. R. (Austr.) 102. W. A. E.

CITY OF PARKERSBURG, Appt.

(— W. Va. —, 100 S. E. 394.)

1. Where the owner of property abutting upon a city street constructs the building upon his property  $3\frac{1}{4}$  feet back from the street line, and paves the same in the same manner as the sidewalk is paved, and permits the public using such sidewalk to also use such paved strip between the front of his building and the street line as a sidewalk, he will not be held to have thereby dedicated the same to the public by implication, unless it be further shown that the public authorities, with his knowledge, exercise acts of dominion thereon indicative of their belief that the same has been dedicated to the public.

— dedication — necessity of intent.

2. The law recognizes two classes of dedications of a street to a city, express and implied, the intent to dedicate being essential to both, though in the latter case it may be shown by acts of the owner justifying the public authorities in believing the intention exists, where they act upon such belief, even though the owner may never have actually intended a dedication.

— clarity of proof.

3. Dedication being an exceptional and peculiar mode of passing title to interest in land, the proof thereof must be full and clear; and the acts proved, which it is claimed constitute such dedication, must be inconsistent with any construction other than that of a dedication. Merely building the front of one's house back from the property line is, alone, not sufficient to prove intent to dedicate to the public the strip of land between the property line and the front of the house.

— paved strip adjoining — right to use.

4. A municipal corporation cannot prevent the use by its owner, in a lawful way, of a paved strip between the street line and a building set a few feet back from the street, where it is not shown that the strip has become a part of the highway, or that the municipal authorities have so treated it.

Tax — on dedicated strip — effect.

5. Payment of taxes assessed by a municipality upon a strip of land claimed to have been dedicated to it, while evidence tending to defeat the presumption of a dedication, is, under most circumstances, of little probative force.

[See 8 R. C. L. 902.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wood County in favor of plaintiffs in a suit brought to enjoin defendant from interfering with them in making certain contemplated improvements. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. McCluer & McCluer, for appellant:

Dedication of properties for public use is express or implied.

McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 1539, note 8; Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. 431, 8 L. ed. 452; Athens v. Burkett, — Tenn. —, 59 S. W. 404; Richmond v. Stokes, 31 Gratt. 713; Campbell v. Elkins, 58 W. Va. 308, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 159, 52 S. E. 220; Harper's Ferry v. Kaplon, 58 W. Va. 482, 52 S. E. 492; Yates v. West Grafton, 33 W. Va. 507, 11 S. E. 8; Phillips v. Huntington, 35 W. Va. 406, 14 S. E. 17; Post v. Clarksburg, 74 W. Va. 50, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 773, 81 S. E. 562.

Intent to dedicate may be inferred by mere user by the public.

McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 1563, note 10; Boyd v. Woolwine, 40 W. Va. 282, 21 S. E. 1020; Wheeling v. Campbell, 12 W. Va. 36.

The right of the public to the use of the property as a public street has been repeatedly recognized by the owners thereof, and the doctrine of estoppel applies.

Champ v. County Ct. 72 W. Va. 475, 78 S. E. 362; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Perdue, 40 W. Va. 442, 21 S. E. 755; Briar Creek R. Co. v. Kanawha C. R. Co. 70 W. Va. 227, 73 S. E. 726; Mylius v. Koontz, 69 W. Va. 621, 73 S. E. 319.

The statutory method must be followed where it becomes necessary to buy or condemn lands for street purposes, but this does not deprive the municipality of its right to streets by common-law dedication.

McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 1583; 23 Cent. L. J. p. 3; Yates v. West Grafton, 33 W. Va. 507, 11 S. E. 8.

The owners will not now be permitted to retract dedication heretofore made.

Pence v. Bryant, 54 W. Va. 263, 46 S. E. 275.

Payment of taxes assessed by the municipality, while evidence tending to defeat the presumption of a dedication, is, under most circumstances, of little probative force.

McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 1567; Boise City v. Hon, 14 Idaho, 272, 94 Pac. 167; San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 170, 13 Pac. 405; Myers v. Ocean-side, 7 Cal. App. 87, 93 Pac. 686.

There is, therefore, nothing in plaintiffs' contention that the erection of the balcony by plaintiffs could not, in any event, operate against the city's rights in the premises.

Messrs. Van Winkle & Ambler, for appellees:

The city had no power to widen the east side of Market street, between Fourth and Fifth streets, except in the manner and form prescribed, and subject to the limitations of the power conferred upon it, by the several acts and charters. It could not widen the sidewalk in front of only a few properties under its charters.

Va. 335, L.R.A.1918C, 77, 94 S. E. 497.

The burden of proof is upon the city to prove that there was a contract between all of the landowners on the east side of Market street between Third and Fifth streets, to set their buildings back from the established street line, and to dedicate the intervening strip to the public, and that there was a dedication and acceptance of the strip in front of the Fred Rose (now Morlang) property, to the city of Parkersburg.

There was no dedication, express or implied, of the property in controversy.

Standard Fuel Supply Co. 140 Ga. 353, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 470, 78 S. E. 906.

The use of a strip of land between the sidewalk and buildings, by the public, in conjunction with the owners' use of such strip for steps, billboards, or a place to display goods, will not effect a dedication; but the use is permissive.

Ritz, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the year 1878, one Fred R. Rose was the owner of a lot situate in the city of Parkersburg, fronting 23 feet on the east side of Market street, and extending back a distance of 90 feet. This lot is part of what is known on the original plat of the city as inlot No. 92, and is between what is now known as Fourth street and Fifth street in said city, the north line of the same being at a distance of 49 feet from the corner of said Market street and Fifth street. At that time, to wit, in the year 1878, there were erected upon this lot, and upon the adjoining lots to the north and south of it, frame structures which were used for various sorts of retail mercantile business. In May of that year a fire occurred which destroyed all of the buildings from the corner of Fifth street down to a point more than halfway in the block, where a brick building stood owned by one Randolph Logan. Immediately thereafter the owners of the lots began to erect new buildings thereon. Rose, who owned the lot in question, as well as the lot next to it on the south, when he erected his new buildings, placed the front of them back  $3\frac{1}{2}$  feet from the street line. The two buildings on the two lots north of Rose, and between his lots and the corner of Fifth and Market streets, were erected upon the old line. South of Rose's the buildings were erected on a line  $3\frac{1}{2}$  feet from the street line down to the Logan brick building, which was not destroyed. This brick building stood some distance back from the street, and was occupied as a residence. Shortly after this time Logan extended this building to the street line, and it was occupied in this condition for many years as a cigar store. In 1913, it was torn down and replaced by a large brick building, the front of which was placed at a distance of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  feet from the street line. South of this Logan property new buildings have been erected at various times upon the lots, the fronts of none of which were placed upon the actual street line, being from  $2\frac{1}{2}$  to 3 feet back therefrom. In the block between Third and Fourth streets, on the east side thereof, all of the buildings are placed 3 feet back from the actual line of the street. After Rose and the adjoining property owners had erected the buildings, as above indicated, they paved the space between their buildings and the curb with brick, at their own expense, making the sidewalk in front of their premises  $14\frac{1}{2}$  feet wide, instead of 11 feet, as it had been prior to that time. In the year 1888, Rose sold the lot in controversy, together with the house thereon, to Theodore Morland, the husband of one of the plaintiffs and the father of the other two. At that time the space in front of the building, between it and the curb, was paved with brick, and the whole thereof used as a sidewalk. Some time after this Morlang and the owners of the adjacent properties took up the brick paving, and put down concrete pavement in front of their premises. This pavement was extended clear back to the front of the buildings. The building on the lot immediately to the north of the Morlang lot extended out to the street line—that is,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  feet further than the Morlang building—and that condition has existed up until this time. The space of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  feet between the front of the Morlang building and the actual street line is in no way distinguished from the other part of the sidewalk. It is paved with the same character of material, and there are no marks to indicate where the street ends and the Morlang lot begins. A number of years ago the Morlangs built a balcony on the front of their building, at the level of the second floor, extending out over this  $3\frac{1}{2}$  feet of space. No permission was asked of the city authorities to construct this balcony, nor was any objection made to the construction thereof by the city authorities without permission, although an ordinance of the city requires that permission be obtained from the city authorities before any structure may be erected overhanging any of the streets or public places of the city. It is further shown that this lot has been assessed and taxes paid thereon at all times as a lot 23x90 feet, no deduction having ever been made therefrom because of this  $3\frac{1}{2}$ -foot strip. It is further shown that at various times this controverted strip was used by the merchants and others doing business in the buildings along this street for the display of their wares and merchandise, for the storage to some extent of boxes and barrels thereon, but it does not appear that this was done to any greater extent than was done by other merchants in other parts of the city, where the buildings were erected flush with the street line.

There is some evidence indicating that in 1878, at the time of the fire above referred to, Rose, who was then the owner of the lot in question, had conversations with some of the owners of adjoining lots in regard to setting their buildings back. Some refused to do so, and some apparently followed the example set by Rose. The witnesses who testify upon this question say that they understood Rose's purpose to have been to create better conditions for the conduct of the business carried on in the buildings. Some of the witnesses say that Rose expressed the view that by setting the buildings back the owners would always have a clear space where the occupants of the store-rooms could display their merchandise without obtaining permission from the public authorities to use part of the street. Not one of them testify that he ever suggested that the strip of land left between the building line and the actual street line was to be dedicated to the city or become a part of the public street. No ordinance was ever passed by the city of Parkersburg widening Market street at this point, nor is there any evidence that the city or its officers ever acted upon any supposed dedication of this strip to the city by Rose and the adjoining property owners. In 1914 Rose's tenant desired to extend the front of the building out to the street line. He was engaged in the business of selling ladies' wearing apparel, and this business required his goods to be displayed in such manner that passers-by would have a ready view thereof. This could not be with the wall of the adjoining building on the north projecting out  $3\frac{1}{2}$  feet. Prior to the time this tenant went into the building it was occupied as a saloon. At the request of this tenant the owners of the property made application to the mayor of the city of Parkersburg for permission to erect the front upon this  $3\frac{1}{2}$ -foot strip. They were informed by the mayor that he would submit the matter to the council. This was done, and the council, upon the advice of the city's attorney, refused the permission, claiming for the first time, so far as this record shows, that this 3½-foot strip had been dedicated to the city as a public street. The owners of the property, when informed by the mayor of this contention, immediately repudiated the same, and insisted that it was their private property, and that they would build thereon. Much is made in argument of the fact that they made the application to the city instead of proceeding with the building as above indicated. They say that it was their understanding that it was necessary to get a permit from the city authorities to make any such extensions or improvements to a building, and it was for such permission that they were applying. We cannot doubt their statements in this regard, inasmuch as the mayor to whom they made this application is not introduced by the city, and in no way contradicts their statements. Again, in 1917, when new city officers came in, they took it up with the city authorities through the new mayor, for the purpose of seeing if authority would not be granted to them to make this improvement of the building without, as they say, having a lawsuit. They had a conference with him and explained the situation, submitted to him a plan of the improvements contemplated, and, as they state, he advised them that he saw no objection thereto, but that he would submit the same to the council for its action. This was done, and the council, upon the advice of the city solicitor, refused to grant the permit. This action of the council was communicated to the plaintiffs by the mayor, and he advised them that it seemed to be a difference of opinion between the city's lawyer and the plaintiffs' lawyer as to who had the right to control the 3½-foot strip; that in his view the proper way to test it would be for the plaintiffs to go on with the improvements, regardless of the city's action in refusing the permit, and, when the city attempted to stop them, to apply for an injunction to enjoin the city's interference therewith. Plaintiffs adopted the mayor's advice in this regard. These negotiations with the mayor by the plaintiffs are testified to fully by them, and are in no wise contradicted by that officer. Plaintiffs did begin to make the improvements in accordance with the plan submitted to the mayor as aforesaid. The city authorities immediately stopped them from going on with the work, and the plaintiffs thereupon filed their bill, asking that the city and its agents be enjoined from interfering with them in making the improvements contemplated. A temporary injunction was granted, and the improvements proceeded with, when the city made application for a counter injunction to prevent the plaintiffs from making the improvements pending the litigation. This injunction was also granted, but was subsequently modified so as to allow the improvements to be so far completed as to prevent damage to the building. Upon the hearing of the case the circuit court dissolved the injunction granted upon the city's cross application, and perpetuated the injunction granted to the plaintiffs, holding that the strip of land belonged to the plaintiffs, and that the city had acquired no easement therein.

The chief reliance of the city upon this appeal is that there was an implied dedication of this strip of land to the city for public use, which implied dedication was accepted by the user thereof. There is no contention that there was an express dedication, either in writing or orally, nor that there was an express acceptance of any dedication by the city. Upon the other hand, the plaintiffs contend that there has never been any such conduct upon their part, or upon the part of their predecessors in title, in connection with this strip of land, as would imply a dedication thereof to the public. That an owner of real estate, under circumstances like this, may dedicate an easement therein to the public without any expression of his intent in that regard, or without dedication—necessity of

any writing conveying the same, there is no doubt. It must be borne in mind that title to real estate, or any interest therein, is ordinarily passed by deed or will, and, while one may lose his land without an actual conveyance of the same, the acts and conduct upon his part, and upon the part of the one claiming to have acquired such title in such way, must be so unequivocal and positive as to leave little doubt that it was the intention of the owner to dedicate the same to the public use, and the intention of the public authorities to accept the same for that purpose. McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, § 1568, and authorities there cited. It may be said that, in order to the validity of such implied dedication, it must be shown that the owner intended to part with the easement in his property for the public use. By this we do not mean that an expression of such intent upon his part need be proven. In fact, he may not have actually had such purpose in his mind, but his acts and conduct in regard to the property must be of such character that the public, dealing with him upon the strength of such conduct, could not but believe that his intention was to vest an easement therein in the public. There seems to be no trouble about this general principle of law, but it is the application of it to the facts existing here which leads to the controversy.

—clarity of

Counsel for the city contend that the owners' conduct in connection with and treatment of this 3½-foot space, since the year 1878, was such as to indicate the clear intent and purpose upon their part to dedicate it to the public for public use, while the plaintiffs contend that the conduct shown is entirely consistent with the permissive use thereof by the public. As above stated, it is not proven that the plaintiffs, or Rose, under whom they claim, ever made any declaration of dedication of this property, nor is anything further shown than that Rose, in connection with some of the adjoining owners in erecting their buildings, left this space in front thereof. His purpose in doing so, some of the witnesses say, was to widen the sidewalk in order that the business conducted in the buildings might be more advantageously carried on. By others it is said that the purpose was to leave a space in front of the buildings so that merchants doing business therein could display their goods upon the outside without trespass upon the city street, and without getting any leave from the city therefor. That this space was used in the display of goods there can be no question. It appears that the balcony above referred to was erected, extending over this space, without permission from the city authorities. It also appears that cellar gratings were put in in front of the building in this space, without any authority from the city. The only thing which it can be said that the owners of the property have done upon which an implied dedication can rest is that they permitted the public to travel over this part of the sidewalk constructed by them at their own expense, and not under any requirement imposed upon them by the city. Will a dedication be implied from this state of facts? Counsel for the respective parties, with commendable zeal and thoroughness, have examined the authorities bearing upon this question, and have given the result of their efforts to this court, not only in oral argument at the bar, but in elaborate printed briefs. From the textbooks may be gleaned the general statements of law above declared, but we must look to the decided cases to discover the application that has been made of these general principles to particular states of fact.

Counsel for the city cite and rely upon many cases wherein municipal corporations were held liable for damages for personal injury upon proof of a user of a street by the public, and insist that such proof is sufficient to show title to the public in the easement over the land. There is quite a different question involved when a contest arises between the owner of the fee and the public claiming an easement thereover, than the one that arises between the public and a party injured because of the improper condition of what is used as a public street. As between a citizen using a street laid out and worked by the public officers as a public street, it has been frequently held that proof of the exercise of acts of dominion over the street by the public is sufficient to charge liability upon a municipal corporation for an injury received because of the bad condition of such street. Proof that the city authorities expended the public moneys in improving such street or in working thereon has been held sufficient to establish it as a public street for the purpose of recovery for an injury caused by defects, but it could not be said that such proof would be sufficient to deprive the owner of land of his title thereto unless it could be further shown that he knew of such acts of ownership by the public and acquiesced therein. The proof in this case on behalf of the city is far short of that which has been required in the suits to recover damages for injuries above referred to. In those cases it has generally been required that it be shown that the public authorities have exercised dominion over the particular street or way by expending the public moneys thereon in the way of improvements, or by some such unequivocal conduct. In this case it is not shown that any public officer ever did anything indicating the intention upon the part of the city authorities to claim an interest in this strip of land. No public moneys were ever expended thereon. No public officer ever made any declaration or committed any act which indicated an intention upon the part of the public authorities to adopt <sup>-paving strip</sup> adjoining walk <sup>-effect.</sup> this strip of land as a public way, but, even if they had, it would not be conclusive against the landowner, unless done with his full knowledge and acquiescence.

The case of Denning v. Roome, 6 Wend. 651, is cited and relied upon by counsel for appellant as controlling in this case. It is true, that case in its facts is somewhat similar to the case here. However, it has its distinguishing characteristics, and it is because of these elements, existing there, which do not exist here, that there was held to be an implied dedication of the strip of land involved. In that case a street 40 feet wide extended in front of the plaintiff's property. This street by an ordinance was widened to the width of 60 feet, and after the passage of this ordinance so widening the street, which took a strip off the front of the plaintiff's lot, the same was used in this widened condition for a period of nineteen years. During that time the street thus widened had been paved by the city, and an assessment for the cost thereof made against the abutting property owners, including the plaintiff, which assessment plaintiff paid without objection. It will thus be seen that in that case not only was the strip of land involved used by the public, but the public authorities, by passing an ordinance widening the street to 60 feet, incorporated it in the street as thus laid down, and by paving the same exercised dominion over it entirely inconsistent with the plaintiff's contention that the city had no easement therein, and by his payment of this assessment for improving the street in its widened condition he acquiesced in the adoption of the same as a public street. Had the city of Parkersburg passed an ordinance widening Market street the additional distance of 3½ feet in front of the plaintiffs' property, and paved the same for this additional distance, and assessed the cost thereof against the plaintiffs or their predecessor, and collected such costs from them, it might be said that by the passage of such ordinance, and the making of such improvements, the city unequivocally claimed the right to the street in its widened state, and by the payment of such assessment the plaintiffs or their predecessor acquiesced in and approved that contention of the public authorities. These elements, however, which were controlling in that case, do not exist here.

This case is more like that of Keppler v. Richmond, — Va. —, 98 S. E. 747. In that case the plaintiff owned a lot fronting on one of the streets of the city, and extending back along another of the city streets to an alley. More than fifty years before the litigation arose plaintiff had built upon this lot a building fronting on the street in front thereof, and three other buildings fronting on the street at the side of the lot, leaving a space extending all the way across the rear of his lot, 11 feet wide, unoccupied by any building. About the time the buildings were erected the alley at the rear of the lot was paved by the plaintiff with cobblestones, including not only the public part of the alley, but the strip off the rear of his lot above referred to. A sidewalk next to the building about 3 feet wide was made, and a side entrance into the building from this walk. This paving, including the public alley and the strip off the rear of plaintiff's lot, was all of the same character. The public used all of the space thus paved, that part of it on the plaintiff's lot as well as the part thereof included in the public alley, and it so used the same for more than fifty years. There had been no improvement made upon this land of the plaintiff by the public authorities, and dominion had never been exercised thereover by such authorities. It will thus be seen that that case in its facts is very nearly like the case at bar. In the case we have here the erection of the balcony a few years ago, extending out over the 3½-foot strip, by the plaintiffs, indicates upon their part that they did not consider this strip of land as belonging to the public. This element was lacking in the case above cited. In a well-reasoned opinion, in which the authorities are numerous cited and commented upon, the court of appeals of Virginia held that the public acquired no easement in the plaintiff's land by reason of the use of it for all that time; that this use was merely permissive, and was not inconsistent with his right to claim the same thereafter.

The case of Weiss v. South Bethlehem, 136 Pa. 294, 20 Atl. 801, is very similar in its facts to the case here. There a strip off of plaintiff's lot had been used for many years by the public in connection with the use made thereof by himself, but, because of the fact that such public use was not inconsistent with the idea that it was permissive upon the part of the plaintiff, an implied dedication of the easement therein was denied. A similar holding was made upon a very similar state of facts in Griffin's Appeal, 109 Pa. 150.

In the case of Gowen v. Philadelphia Exch. Co. 5 Watts & S. 141, 40 Am. Dec. 489, the supreme court of Pennsylvania had before it a very similar question. The controversy there arose between adjoining property owners. The Philadelphia Exchange had erected a building upon its property, leaving in front thereof a space which had been paved by it and used in connection with the sidewalk in front of the same. The public had continuously used this space for many years, as though it had been part of the public sidewalk, without objection upon the part of the owners of the building; but it did not appear that the public authorities had ever laid any claim to the property or had ever done anything thereon. The owner of the adjoining property, whose building extended out to the actual street line, made a side door, opening upon this vacant space in front of the defendant's property. The defendant thereupon built a brick wall upon its property in front of this door, extending the same to the street line, blocking up plaintiff's side door. Suit was then brought to compel the removal of this wall, upon the theory that the defendant had impliedly dedicated the strip of land in front of its building to the public, and that the plaintiff had a right to have access to his building from this public street. The court, however, denied the relief, holding that there was no such state of facts as would raise a dedication by implication.

In the case of Palmer v. Chicago, 248 Ill. 201, 93 N. E. 765, it appeared that the public had been allowed to travel over a strip of plaintiff's land, lying vacant adjoining a public street, for a long time, without objection upon his part. During all of the time there had been no denial of the right of the public to travel over the land. No public street was ever extended over the same, nor had the public authorities ever exercised any dominion thereover. It was held that such public use was not inconsistent with the ownership thereof by the plaintiff, and the theory of an implied dedication was denied. In the case of Rose v. Elizabethtown, 275 Ill. 167, 114 N. E. 14, a similar holding upon a very analogous state of facts to that involved here was made.

In the case of Clatskanie v. McDonald, 85 Or. 670, 167 Pac. 560, the supreme court of Oregon had before it the question of an implied dedication arising from the use of a strip of land in front of a building, and held that where the owner of land built his hotel back from the street with a sidewalk to the street line, and with a roof over it, and induced other builders to conform to his building line, he was not es-topped from claiming the title to the actual street line, in the absence of a showing that the other property owners constructed their buildings on the line because of their belief that they could use the sidewalk in front of the hotel. It was also held in that case that the fact that the whole of the lot continued to be assessed for taxation without any deduction for the part thus claimed to have been dedicated was evidence tending to rebut the presumption of the dedication. We think the probative force of such evidence would ordinarily be very slight, however.

From these authorities it would seem clear that to create a dedication by implication the owner of the real estate must have done some act from which a positive intent upon his part to dedicate the land to the public can be drawn. The fact that the public was permitted to use a strip of land under circumstances such as exist here, without objection by the owner, is not sufficient from which to imply a dedication. It is not shown that either the plaintiffs, or Rose, under whom they claim, ever did anything of an affirmative character, expressing an intention to dedicate, but during the time that the public have been permitted to use this strip of land it appears that the owners of it have made uses of it inconsistent with the theory that they had dedicated it to the public use. It is shown that the ordinance of the city of Parkersburg required anyone desiring to erect any structure overhanging a street or sidewalk to obtain permission to do so. The owners of this property erected such a structure overhanging this space without obtaining this permission, and without their right thereto being questioned by the authorities. It is shown that they put in cellarways on this strip without authority from the city, and without their right thereto being questioned. During all of the time that the public have been permitted to use this strip of land the plaintiffs, and Rose, under whom they claim, have paid the taxes thereon to the city of Parkersburg; and while this, of itself, is not very strong evidence, still it is some evidence, that they did not intend to dedicate it to the public, and likewise that the public authorities did not accept the dedication, else they would not have collected taxes from the plaintiffs upon the land. The first time, so far as this record discloses, that the public authorities ever asserted an interest or right in this strip of land was when the plaintiffs desired permission to erect an extension to their building over the same, and, instead of acquiescing in the city's claim at that time, the same was resisted and contested by the plaintiffs, and their complete title to the land asserted and claimed.

Counsel for the city rely upon § 56aX of chapter 43 (§ 1777) of the Code, and the construction placed thereon by the case of Yates v. West Grafton, 33 W. Va. 507, 11 S. E. 8, to support the city's contention of an implied dedication in this case. The construction given that statute in that case does not support counsel's contention. It is quite true, as we have above asserted, that if the public was permitted to use this strip of land, and the city had accepted the same and made claim thereto, then a dedication might be implied. In that case it was held that there had been no such user by the public or acquiescence therein by the owner, or recognition or acceptance by the town authorities, as constituted an easement by implication. The theory upon which acts of dominion over the property by the public officers are held to be evidence of an easement by implication is that such acts are inconsistent with any other theory than that the public has such easement in the property, and the owner, being fully cognizant of such acts and acquiescing therein, will be taken, without other proof, to have, by such acquiescence, shown an intent upon his part to appropriate the property to the use which the public is making of it. Nothing of that kind, however, is shown in this case.

Finding, as we do, that the state of facts disclosed by this record is not sufficient to show an implied dedication of this strip of land to the public, the court's decree perpetuating the injunction inhibiting the defendant from interfering with the plaintiffs in the construction of their addition thereon is clearly right, and the same is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Implied or constructive dedication of land between street line and building.

General rule.

Although there are comparatively few cases on the subject, it appears to be the rule that land between the street line and a building is not dedicated by implication to the public, by the fact that the space is used by the public as part of the street, without objection from the owner. It is necessary for the owner to do some act from which can be drawn a positive intent to dedicate the land to the public. Valentine v. Boston (1839) 22 Pick. (Mass.) 75, 33 Am. Dec. 711; Fall River Print Works v. Fall River (1872)

Co.* (1843) 5 Watts. & S. (Pa.) 141, 40 Am. Dec. 489; Duncan v. Hanbest (1857) 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 362; Neill v. Gallagher (1874) 10 Phila. (Pa.) 172; Keppler v. Richmond (1919) — Va. —, 98 S. E. 747. See the reported case (MORLANG v. PARKERSBURG, ante, 717).

Application of rule.

peared that the plaintiffs, when they erected their mill, left a space between the street and the wall of the mill. There was nothing to distinguish this strip from the sidewalk, and it was used by the public in common with the street. The defendants contended that the space had been dedicated to the public use, and that, therefore, the owners were not entitled to compensation when the street was formally widened so as to include this strip. The court held that the space had not become part of the highway by implied dedication, and that instructions to that effect were properly refused.

Compare Valentine v. Boston (Mass.) supra, wherein it appeared that a street in the defendant city was laid out at a width of 35 feet. Subsequently the petitioner's predecessors in title set their buildings back 10 feet, and this space was used as part of the highway for nearly a century. It was held that the public had acquired title by the lapse of time, the court saying: "Now, from the uninterrupted public use of this land for a century, we can entertain no doubt that an easement was established in it. And whether it may have been acquired by a grant, or dedication, or the presumption of a laying out, and whether it may be viewed as a private way for the town or as a highway for the public, seem to us to be useless speculations; for in either event the owners held it subject to a servitude, and the public or the city had acquired an easement over it."

In Baker v. Squire (1895) 77 Mo. App. 329, an action was brought by the owner of a building to enjoin the tenants of a contiguous building from adding a bay window to the same. Several years prior to the institution of the action, the plaintiffs and the defendant's predecessor in title set their respective buildings back several feet from the street line. It was contended by the plaintiffs that this land between the buildings and the street line had been dedicated to the public. The court, in holding that there had been no dedication, said: "The fact of the omission to build on the 4 feet of frontage when the edifice was constructed is not, of itself, evidentiary of a dedication, and, if it could be so construed, it would not become effective as such, in the absence of proof of the further essential fact of acceptance thereof by the public. . . . As to that, the evidence is undisputed that the strip in controversy was used by the present and former tenants for the purposes of displaying merchandise kept in the building, that taxes were regularly paid thereon, and that at the times of the various sales of the lot the measurements of each deed called for this portion, and it was actually pointed out to the vendees as an integral part of the land acquired by them under their respective deeds."

In Clatskanie v. McDonald (1917) 85 Or. 670, 167 Pac. 560, it appeared that the defendants' hotel was set back a distance of 3 feet from the street line, and the plaintiff city claimed title to this strip of land between the building and street line. The strip was included as a part of the sidewalk, and had been used as such by the public for several years. In holding that there had been no dedication of the property, the court said: "In order to sustain the estoppel contended for, the city should have proved that other property owners were induced to construct their buildings substantially in line with defendants' hotel by a belief, induced by defendants, that the strip of land in front of these buildings could be used as a sidewalk without claim thereto by defendants. The evidence fails to establish these facts. There is no evidence that other property owners constructed their buildings on the line selected because of their belief that they could use the sidewalk in front of defendants' hotel."

In Biddle v. Ash (1888) 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 211, it appeared that the defendants' predecessor in title had placed the front wall 5 feet back from the street line, and this line was, by common consent, adopted by the adjoining property owners, and they erected their buildings on a line with it. The defendants had erected an iron railing around the 5-foot space about five years before the institution of the action. The defendants, in rebuilding, attempted to bring the front wall of their buildings 5 feet forward. The plaintiff sought an injunction to restrain the erection of the building on this line, contending that it had been dedicated to the public use. It was held that there was no dedication.

In Gowen v. Philadelphia Exch. Co. (1843) 5 Watts & S. (Pa.) 141, 40 Am. Dec. 489, it appeared that the defendants, in erecting their building, built back from the street line, and paved the intervening space, which was used as part of the walk. The plaintiff, at a later date, built a door in the side of his building which adjoined that of the defendants. Subsequently, the defendants erected a wall on the walk between their buildings and the street line, and thereby shut off the plaintiff's right of passage. Plaintiff brought this action for an injunction to compel its removal. It was held that the space had not been dedicated to the public.

In Duncan v. Hanbest (1857) 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 362, the plaintiff sought an injunction to restrain the defendant from building out to the street line. It appeared that the defendant's building, when erected, was set back from the line of the street about 2½ feet. When the plaintiff and other landowners erected their dwellings, they built on a line with the defendant's property. The defendant had taken steps to extend his building to the street line. In discussing the question whether the space had been dedicated to the public use, the court said: "A considerable part of the space in front of defendant's building is now, and for a long time heretofore has been, used for a cellar door and doorway. This use disproves the intent to dedicate to the public use, and indicates sufficiently the claim of ownership up to the line of the street. The right to extend the building to the line of the street is incident to the ownership of the ground, and is not lost by nonuser; nor can its exercise be prohibited by an allegation that it will inconvenience an adjoining owner."

In Neill v. Gallagher (1874) 10 Phila. (Pa.) 172, an action was brought to restrain the defendant from building a bay window on the first floor of his house. It appeared that the defendant's predecessor in title moved his house back 5 feet from the recorded street line. Subsequently, other houses on the street were erected, all built even with the defendant's. The plaintiff contended that the defendant, by setting his house back 5 feet, had dedicated the space to the public use. The court refused an injunction on the ground that the plaintiff's right was, at best, doubtful, referring to the fact that all the owners had set their buildings back to a uniform frontage "thus practically widening the street," as a circumstance possibly distinguishing earlier cases which held that there was no dedication.

In Keppler v. Richmond (1919) — Va. —, 98 S. E. 747, it appeared that there was an alley in the rear of the plaintiff's property, which was maintained at a width of 10 feet. The plaintiff's buildings did not extend back to this alley, but there existed a space of 11 feet from the building to the alley line. The alley and the 11-foot space had been paved, and were all used by the public. The owner of the strip in question attempted to extend his building line so as to include this strip, but the city claimed that it had been dedicated by implication, to the public use. The court held that there had been no dedication.

In the reported case (MORLANG v. PARKERSBURG, ante, 717), it appeared that the building of the plaintiff was erected 3½ feet from the street line. The space between the street and building was in no way distinguishable from the other part of the sidewalk. Subsequently, the plaintiff sought to extend the front of her building, but was stopped by the defendant city, it claiming that the strip had been dedicated to the public use. It is held that the strip was not dedicated to the city, because, to create a dedication by implication, the owner must have done some act from which a positive intent to dedicate the land to the public can be drawn. 4. A judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction after service of process upon the parties to be affected thereby is conclusive not only upon those who are actually parties thereto, but also upon all who are in privity with them.

— interest acquired before or after judgment.

5. For the purpose of the application of the rule of res judicata to persons because of their privity with the parties to a suit, it must appear that the estate or interest of such a one was acquired from or through such actual party after the litigation. If his interest in the cause of action or the subject-matter of the litigation was acquired prior to the litigation, he will not be bound by the judgment.

— effect on possible counterclaim.

6. A judgment rendered in a suit for the recovery of money is not conclusive of the defendant's right to maintain a subsequent suit to recover a debt claimed to be due to him by the plaintiff in the former suit, when such claim was not pleaded or relied upon therein. The adjudication in such former suit, where the recovery of money is sought, is only conclusive of the matters actually put in issue therein, and such other matters as are defensive to the claim set up, and does not bar a suit upon a different claim which either of the parties may have against the other.

Trial — several issues on pleas in bar.

7. Where there is more than one issue upon pleas in bar in an action at law, they should all be tried together.

Appeal — error in ruling on one issue in plea in bar.

8. Where, however, the court below, with the assent of the parties, proceeds to the trial, without a jury, of only one of such issues, and erroneously finds for the defendant upon such issue, and renders judgment accordingly, this court will reverse the same, set aside the findings of the court below, and remand the cause for a trial upon the remaining issue, or issues.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Harrison County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover a balance alleged to be due by him under an agency contract with plaintiff's assignor. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Robert R. Wilson, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff had the right to enter confession of judgment against defendant in open court under power of attorney, as stipulated in the agent's contract.

Ritz, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 3d of January, 1913, the defendant D. Scott Thompson entered into a contract with the Pennsylvania Sales Corporation, assignor of the plaintiff in this case, by which he became the agent of that concern for the sale of Michigan automobiles and their accessories in certain designated territory. The provisions of the contract, so far as they are material to the determination of the questions involved here, are that Thompson deposited $1,000 with the Sales Corporation, to be held by it as security for the payment of any amount which he might owe, and to be refunded to him by crediting it on the automobiles sold by him, at the rate of $100 for each of such machines so sold. The contract further fixed the price at which such machines and their accessories were to be sold, and the compensation to be allowed to Thompson for making the sales. It further provided that in case of the failure of Thompson to remit the invoice price of the automobiles and parts shipped and sold under the agreement, at the time provided in the contract, he, the said Thompson, authorized any attorney of a court of record selected by the other party to confess judgment in any court of law of competent jurisdiction for the amount of any unpaid balance.

This suit was brought by Edward F. Gerber Company, a corporation, assignee of the Pennsylvania Sales Corporation, to recover a balance alleged to be due by the said Thompson upon the contract aforesaid. An affidavit was filed with the declaration, in which was stated the amount which the plaintiff claimed the right to recover. When the case was called for trial, the plaintiff by its attorney appeared and moved to be permitted to confess judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant, for the sum claimed in the affidavit. The defendant resisted this motion and asked to be allowed to file his counter affidavit and plea of non assumpsit. The court below declined to allow plaintiff's attorney to confess judgment, but permitted the counter affidavit to be filed, together with the plea of non assumpsit. Subsequently the defendant filed his special plea of res judicata. This special plea is based upon an attachment proceeding instituted by the defendant against the Pennsylvania Sales Corporation in December, 1913. It appears that the defendant instituted in the circuit court of Harrison county an action in assumpsit in December, 1913, to recover the $1,000 deposited by him under the contract. No service of process was had upon the defendant, but the jurisdiction was sustained by levying an attachment sued out in said cause on one of the machines shipped to Thompson for sale. Without any appearance on behalf of the Sales Corporation, a judgment was taken condemning the said machine to sale in satisfaction of plaintiff's demand. It was sold, the sale confirmed, and the proceeds thereof paid over to the plaintiff, and this proceeding Thompson now sets up as res judicata in this suit. A trial was had in the court below upon the issue raised by the plea of res judicata alone, and the court found thereon in favor of Thompson, and rendered judgment accordingly, from which judgment this writ of error is prosecuted.

The plaintiff's first contention is that the court erred in not granting its motion to confess judgment by its attorney in its favor, against the defendant, because of the provision in the contract referred to. This contract created the defendant Thompson an agent for the sale of the Sales Corporation's goods, at an agreed price. At the time it was entered into there was no amount due by Thompson, and the provision authorizing the confession of judgment simply provided that when any amount might become due and unpaid, in accordance with the terms of the contract, the plaintiff, through its attorney, might confess judgment in its favor. It will be observed that there is nothing in the contract from which such amount can be determined. It depended entirely upon the future dealings of the parties. Ordinarily, an authority to confess judgment ought to be as certain in its terms as the judgment itself. The amount for which such judgment is to be confessed should be clearly stated, or else facts and figures given in the power itself, from which the amount can be certainly determined. Such is not the case here, and for that reason alone the alleged power of attorney conferred no

—to confess judgment—

authority to confess judgment for any amount. 23 Cyc. 704; 15 R. C. L. 653; Bennett v. Haley, 142 Pa. 253, 21 Atl. 814; Little v. Dyer, 138 Ill. 272, 32 Am. St. Rep. 140, 27 N. E. 905; Fortune v. Bartolomei, 164 Ill. 51, 45 N. E. 274; Holden v. Bull, 1 Penr. & W. 460; Connay v. Halstead, 73 Pa. 354; 11 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 981. The court did not err in denying plaintiff's motion to confess judgment and permitting the de-

The plaintiff, however, contends that the court below erred in finding for the defendant on his special plea of res judicata. As before stated, this special plea relied upon the judgment in an attachment suit brought by Thompson against plaintiff's assignor, in which no service of process was had, but which jurisdiction was sustained by reason of a levy made on one of the automobiles shipped to Thompson by the Sales Corporation. In this suit Thompson filed an account upon which he asked recovery, and it was for the $1,000 advanced by him to the Sales Corporation under the contract. The judgment was in his favor for this sum, with its interest, and adjudged that the property attached was liable to be sold in satisfaction thereof. What is the effect of such a judgment? The defendant contends that it is conclusive of all controversies existing between the parties, while the plaintiff contends that it is conclusive of nothing except the fact that Thompson was entitled to have the particular property upon which the levy was made sold to satisfy his alleged debt. A proceeding by way of attachment partakes somewhat, in its nature, both of a proceeding in rem and one in personam. It is not, strictly speaking, a proceeding in rem, although it partakes more of the nature of such a proceeding, where no service of process has been had, than it does of a proceeding in personam. There is this difference, however. In a pure proceeding in rem, the judgment is conclusive against the world as to the right in the property or thing seized, or the status sought to be determined; while in a proceeding by attachment, where there is no service of process the attachment is only conclusive upon the parties to it and their privies. If a stranger claims to own the property, he would not be bound by the adjudication in the attachment proceeding, while in a pure proceeding in rem, everyone is bound by the adjudication. It will thus be seen that the effect of such a judgment is not as broad as a judgment in a proceeding purely in rem. Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. 308, 19 L. ed. 931; Bigelow, Estoppel, p. 330.

But what is the effect of such a judgment upon the parties to the proceeding? It is for no other purpose, and has no other effect, than to reach the property which a non-resident defendant may have in the state, where there is no personal service of process. It is confined exclusively to such property, and is of no further force

when that is exhausted. It is evidence of nothing beyond this, and does not bind or conclude the defendant as to anything else. A suit could not be maintained on it in any other court in the same state or elsewhere, nor would the plaintiff in such a proceeding, in whose favor the judgment was rendered, be precluded from bringing another action on the original consideration for such balance as may be due after exhausting the property attached. To hold that a judgment thus rendered has any vitality, after exhausting the only thing conferring the jurisdiction, is violative of a principle inherent in our government, which constitutes an inflexible rule of the common law, and that is that no one can be condemned unheard. It cannot be disputed that whatever interest the Pennsylvania Sales Corporation had in the property attached passed by the judgment and sale thereunder, but after exhausting that subject-matter the judgment is of no force or effect, and can afford no advantage to either party as an adjudication of any other matter. 7 Rob. Pr. p. 51; Stone v. Myers, 9 Minn. 303, Gil. 287, 86 Am. Dec. 104.

But the plaintiff argues that, even though the judgment relied upon be treated as one rendered upon default after service of process, it would not be a bar to this suit for two reasons: First, that this suit is brought by an assignee of the defendant in the former suit, and it does not appear whether the rights of the plaintiff here were acquired before or after the institution of the former suit, it being contended that, if such rights were acquired under the assignment before such suit was brought, the same could have no effect upon the plaintiff in this suit; and, second, that the subject-matter of this suit was neither involved nor litigated in the former suit.

It is well settled that a judgment is conclusive, not only upon the parties to the litigation, but also upon effect on privies.

all persons who are in privity with them. Privy is said to be a mutual or successive relationship to the same rights of property, and if it is sought to bind one as privy by an adjudication against his predecessor, in title, it must appear that at the time he acquired the right, or

—interest acquired before or after judgment.

succeeded to the title, it was then affected by the adjudication, for, if the right was acquired by him before the adjudication, then the doctrine cannot apply. Black, Judgm. § 549; Freeman, Judgm. § 162; United States v. Louisville, 169 U. S. 249, 42 L. ed. 735, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 358; Bensimer v. Fell, 35 W. Va. 15, 29 Am. St. Rep. 774, 12 S. E. 1078; Maxwell v. Leeson, 50 W. Va. 361, 88 Am. St. Rep. 475, 40 S. —effect on

seen that it was necessary not only to show that the plaintiff in this suit was the assignee of the defendant in the other suit, but that it became such assignee after the institution of such former suit. This does not appear from the proof submitted, and for that reason the court erred in his findings upon the plea of res judicata.

Nor can it be said, we think, that the matters involved in this suit were in any wise involved in the former proceeding which is set up as a bar to this action. The former litigation had no other object than the recovery of the $1,000 advanced by Thompson to the Sales Corporation as security for property delivered to him for sale. It did not involve, in any wise, amounts which he might owe to the Sales Corporation. It is true the Sales Corporation might have filed these amounts as offsets in that suit, and had this been done the same would have become involved, and the adjudication in that suit would have concluded the Sales Corporation as to the claim set up. But one who is sued upon a claim is under no obligation to plead offsets thereto, or to set up some independent cause of action in defense thereof. Even after he is served with process and allows a judgment to go against him by default, he is only concluded as to such matters as are defensive to the cause of action set up. He could not thereafter say, of course, that he did not owe the money for which suit was brought; but if he has a claim against the plaintiff in such suit, he is not barred from setting it up in another and independent suit to recover the same. 23 Cyc. 1131 et seq.; 15 R. C. L. p. 987; Lawson v. Conaway, 37 W. Va. 159, 18 L.R.A. 627, 38 Am. St. Rep. 17, 16 S. E. 564; Vanfleet, Former Adjudication, § 217. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the court below was wrong in holding that the cause of action here was barred by the former proceeding, for the reason that it was in no wise involved in that proceeding, and there was no adjudication there affecting the cause of action relied upon in this suit.

As before stated, the defendant in this suit pleaded the general issue of non assumpsit, as well as the special defense of res judicata. The issues upon these pleas should have been tried together.

Trial—several issues on pleas in bar.

It is apparent, however, that the trial in the circuit court was only of the issue made upon the special plea of res judicata. Neither party objected to the suit proceeding in this way. In fact, it is apparent that it so proceeded with the consent and the desire of both parties.

Finding that the conclusions of the court below are wrong upon this issue, we will set aside the judgment rendered thereon, and reverse the court's findings; but inasmuch as the issue joined upon the plea of non assumpsit has never been tried, we will not render judgment here in favor of either of the parties, but will remand the cause to the Circuit Court for a trial upon that issue.

Appeal—error in ruling on one issue in plea in bar.

ANNOTATION.

Necessity that warrant of attorney to confess judgment state amount.

There are comparatively few cases dealing directly with the question of preciseness of amount in warrants of attorney to enter judgment. The modern statutes are generally explicit, and most of the cases reported seem to turn on the question whether the "nature of the liability" is sufficiently described. It may be said, however, by way of preface, that there seems to be no objection to authorizing a judgment to be entered for any sum due on a described obligation as "for such amount as may appear to be unpaid thereon" (Pirie v. H. Stern, Jr. & Bro. Co. (1897) 97 Wis. 150, 65 Am. St. Rep. 103, 72 N. W. 370); and, where the warrant of attorney was attached to a bond in a certain sum it was held proper to authorize judgment to be entered for any sum due thereon (Martin v. Belmont Bank (1844) 13 Ohio, 250). So it has been held that a judgment which was entered on a warrant of attorney, giving a copy of a promissory note, and authorizing confession of judgment for such sum as shall appear at the time of confession to be due on such note, could not be collaterally attacked for irregularity. Patterson v. State (1850) 2 G. Greene (Iowa) 492. But in Hancock v. Hillegas (1797) 2 Dall (U. S.) 380, 1 L. ed. 424, Fed. Cas. No. 6,010, where, after several payments on a promissory note in several modes, and before any settlement of accounts, the defendant entered into an agreement that judgment should be entered against him by an attorney, "for the amount that may be due," it was held that the plaintiff, either by arbitration or by a jury, should have proceeded to make the settlement, with notice to the defendant before he entered the judgment, or at least before he issued the execution.

A warrant of attorney to confess judgment should state the amount, or else facts and figures from which it can be certainly determined. Little v. Dyer (1891) 138 Ill. 272, 32 Am. St. Rep. 140, 27 N. E. 905; Harwood v. Hildreth (1853) 24 N. J. L. 51; Conway v. Halstead (1873) 73 Pa. 354; Dalton v. Willingmyre (1913) 23 Pa. Dist. R. 699; EDWARD B. GERBER CO. v. THOMPSON (reported herewith) ante, 730; Dilley v. Van Wie (1858) 6 Wis. 209.

Compare, however, Holden v. Bull (1830) Penr. & W. (Pa.) 460, where it was held that a judgment bond to the county treasurer for $100 was good, although the warrant therein to confess judgment was conditioned that the obligor would pay a fine and bill of costs in a suit by the commonwealth against the obligor, then uncertain as to amount (but that if execution issued before the amount due was ascertained, it would be set aside).

It is held in the reported case (EDWARD F. GERBER CO. v. THOMPSON) that a warrant of attorney to confess judgment for the amount of any unpaid balance from a salesman of the creditor was insufficient, as the amount was uncertain.

A warrant of attorney to confess judgment for $9,200, accompanying a bond in the penalty of $18,400, conditioned for the payment of $9,200 in one year from date, and stating further, that "the above bond is subject to the conditions of an agreement between the parties, of the same date," will not permit the entry of judgment of confession. Harwood v. Hildreth (1853) 24 N. J. L. 51, supra.

Where, on breach of a contract of hire of personal property, the bailor might retake possession, a warrant of attorney to confess judgment would not enable the prothonotary to enter judgment, as the amount of rent might depend upon whether the bailor had retaken possession, and this could not be shown except by going outside the instrument. Dalton v. Willingmyre (1913) 23 Pa. Dist. R. 699, supra.

Where a promissory note read, "subject to the provisions contained in an agreement this day made between said Carter and myself," and the language of the warrant of attorney does not appear, the court said: "Nor does the warrant of attorney help the matter, for the power to confess judgment is only for the amount due, and that must depend upon the equities before mentioned, which would require to be adjusted before the authority of the attorney to confess the judgment would be complete." Dilley v. Van Wie (1858) 6 Wis. 209, supra.

But it was held in State Mut. Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Batterson (1908) 77 N. J. L. 57, 71 Atl. 115, that "where a bond and warrant of attorney to confess judgment is given to secure the payment of a sum of money at such times, in such places, and in such instalments, as may be required by the constitution, by-laws, and regulations of a building and loan association, with the provision that, upon default, the whole may become immediately due at the option of the obligee, judgment may be entered upon the bond and warrant, notwithstanding no definite date of payment is mentioned in the bond."

Where a contract for the purchase of land at a price payable in yearly instalments provided that the buyer, in case of default, does hereby confess judgment for the whole amount unpaid, and showed indorsements, some partial in amount, there being no payments indorsed for some of the years, it was held that this was sufficiently definite to enable the prothonotary to enter judgment. Whitney v. Hopkins (1890) 135 Pa. 246, 19 Atl. 1075.

A power of attorney to confess judgment for the unpaid amount of the price of land purchased, the number of acres to be ascertained by survey, is insufficient to enable the prothonotary to enter judgment. Conway v. Halstead (1873) 73 Pa. 354, supra, where the court referred to the statute making it the duty of the prothonotary, upon the application of the holder of a bond or other instrument containing a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, "to enter judgment against the person or persons who executed the same, for the amount which, on the face of the instrument, may appear to be due," and said: "This act does not confer upon the prothonotary all the power of an attorney at law to confess a judgment, but only authorizes him, without the agency of an attorney, to enter a judgment in the way specified in the act, to wit, for the amount which, from the face of the instrument, may appear to be due. This would probably embrace a case where the sum due can be ascertained by calculation from the face of the writing. . . . But in this case the sum or amount due could by no possible calculation be made to appear from the face of the instrument. It was an agreement for the sale of a tract of land by loosely stated boundaries, and no quantity stated. The price was to be at the rate of $10 an acre, and the number of acres was to be ascertained by a survey. Until the number should be thus determined, a matter wholly outside of the face of the paper, the amount of the purchase money could not be known. The prothonotary had no guide, therefore, in entering the judgment."

A warrant of attorney to confess judgment is void where it gives authority "to confess judgment from time to time for any rent which may be then due by the terms of this lease, with costs, and to waive all errors and all right of appeal from any such judgment or judgments," where, by the terms of the lease, amounts paid by the lessor for water rates, gas bills, and certain expenses were to be "so much additional rent," so that a judicial investigation would be required to fix the amount due under the lease. The court referred to the Illinois statute, providing that "any person, for a debt bona fide due, may confess judgment by himself or attorney duly authorized, either in term time or vacation, without process," and said, inter alia: "The word 'debt,' in this statute, is used as indicative of a sum certain that is owing from one person to another. . . . Our conclusion is that the warrant of attorney contained in the lease here in question attempted to authorize a proceeding which was unknown to the common law and not contemplated by the statute." Little v. Dyer (1891) 138 Ill. 272, 32 Am. St. Rep. 140, 27 N. E. 905, supra (the report is not so clear as might be that the amounts to be "so much additional rent" were included in the confession, but the case is so construed in the Fortune Case (Ill.) infra). But where, under a similar lease, the confession of judgment was simply for instalments of rent, the warrant of attorney was held good for that purpose. Fortune v. Bartolomei (1896) 164 Ill. 51, 45 N. E. 274, followed in Scott v. Mantonya (1897) 164 Ill. 478, 45 N. E. 977.

It may be noted in this connection that authority to confess judgment, contained in a power of attorney attached to a lease, for any rent that may be due by the terms of the lease, does not extend to rent accruing when the lessee is holding over after the expiration of the lease,—especially if the additional term is, by agreement of the parties, not to be under the terms and conditions of the old lease. Weber v. Powers (1904) 213 Ill. 370, 68 L.R.A. 610, 72 N. E. 1070.

In Gambia v. Howe (1846) 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 133, and in Veach v. Pierce (1854) 6 Ind. 48, where it was held that warrants of attorney to confess judgments on promissory notes not fully described were insufficient, the cases seem to rest on the omission of the "nature of the liability," and perhaps not on absence of the amount of the notes.

A note with authority to confess judgment "for such amount as may appear to be unpaid thereon, together with costs and $50 attorney's fees," is not a promissory note in Alberta, because uncertain in amount. Waters v. Campbell (1913) — Alberta, — 14 D. L. R. 448. The court said: "If the authority contained in it is valid, the provision regarding costs, in my opinion, renders the amount payable uncertain. I think it an agreement, not a promissory note, and an agreement which, though I have no doubt it is valid in the state of Illinois where it was made, is, so far as the authority contained in it is concerned, invalid in this jurisdiction, as being contrary to the policy of the law. No doubt it would be good as evidence of a debt to the amount of the principal sum."

It has been held, in Illinois, that where a warrant of attorney allows "a reasonable attorney's fee," the amount should be fixed by the court. Campbell v. Goddard (1886) 117 Ill. 251, 7 N. E. 640; Campbell v. Goddard (1887) 123 Ill. 220, 14 N. E. 261.

In Allport v. Meutsch (1911) 165 Ill. App. 172, the court expressed the opinion that under a warrant to enter judgment for ——— dollars, attorney's fees, a judgment without attorney's fees would be good. (It may be noted in this connection that it has been held that a warrant of attorney, including power to enter judgment for attorney's fees in a certain sum, will support a confession and judgment including a less amount for attorney's fees than specified in the warrant. Kellogg v. Keith (1879) 4 Ill. App. 386. But in Tucker v. Gill (1871) 61 Ill. 236, where the warrant of attorney recited a note for $26,000 and interest, and the cognovit confessed a judgment for $50,000, it was held error for the clerk to enter judgment for $26,000.)

The following cases, while not strictly in point, are of interest in this connection:

Where a bond for $2,000 was accompanied by a warrant of attorney to confess judgment for $2,000, the condition of the bond being the proper accounting of the obligee's clerk, and judgment was confessed for $357.84, the amount of two sums which were debts before the date of the bond, and not within it, the court said: "It is possible the defendants did not contemplate, when they signed a warrant of attorney authorizing a confession of judgment against them in the penal sum of $2,000, that the plaintiff's attorney would appear for them, the defendants, and proceed to liquidate the damages. Such action was not authorized by the warrant of attorney. Moreover, the record shows that the sum for which the judgment was confessed was for debts which arose prior to the date of the bond, and which were not covered by its conditions. It thus appears upon the face of the record that the judgment was confessed without any lawful authority." Bennett v. Haley (1891) 142 Pa. 253, 21 Atl. 814.

In Chapin v. Clemison (1847) 1 Barb. (N. Y.) 311, a warrant of attorney, absolute on its face to enter judgment for $1,000, had on its back an indorsement, signed by the defendant, stating that the judgment to be entered up thereon, was intended to secure an indebtedness for goods to be sold on the day judgment was entered, to the amount of $500, and also to secure a similar amount for goods thereafter to be sold, and it was agreed that, in case the plaintiff should deem himself insecure, he might issue execution for whatever sum might be due to him for principal and interest. It was held that the judgment did not secure any indebtedness accrued before the date it was entered.

Interest will be allowed where such can be seen to have been the intent of the parties.

Thus, where an old warrant of attorney had been given to secure a debt and interest, the sum for which judgment was to be confessed being for the amount of the debt only, the court granted a rule to enter up judgment for the debt, and so much for interest as the master should find to be due thereon. Chalk v. Walton (1843) 5 Mann. & G. 573, 134 Eng. Reprint, 689, 6 Scot. N. R. 693, 1 Dowl. & L. 39.

Where a warrant of attorney authorized the judgment to be entered up for double the amount of the sum actually due, and contained a defeasance on payment of that sum, with interest, on a certain day, it was held that the judgment creditor was entitled to interest, up to the amount of the penalty of the judgment. Tunstall v. Trappes (1830) 8 Sim. 297, 57 Eng. Reprint, 1010.

Where a statement recited a note, not speaking of interest, and then stated that no part of the note or interest had been paid, it was held that the interest was properly included in the judgment. Rothschild v. Manne-sovitch (1898) 29 App. Div. 580, 51 N. Y. Supp. 253.

But where there was a power to confess judgment for assessments, the court reports the matter as follows: "The agreement authorized judgment for the 'amount expended on the two lots.' The judgment was for $2,936.98. The principal and interest amounted to that sum, but the agreement cannot, we think, be construed to allow judgment for the interest, but only for the sum alleged to have been expended. Powers of attorney to confess judgment must, like other powers, be strictly pursued." Cordray v. Galveston (1894) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 26 S. W. 245. B. B. B.

(232 Pa. 547, 81 Atl. 645.)

Injunction — against nuisance.

1. An injunction may be granted against the threatened establishment of a barn and yard for conducting a horse and cattle business in a residence section of a borough which will be a nuisance to neighboring property, although nothing has yet been done which would support an action at law or which has injured the complainant.

2. Although an injunction will not lie to allay mere fears and apprehension, nevertheless, if it is shown that there is a reasonable and just ground to apprehend the establishment of a nuisance threatened by defendant, and which he has power to commit, and it is reasonably certain that the health and comfort of those complaining will be disturbed by the threatened act, the writ will issue.

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Cumberland County (Swope, P. J.) granting an injunction restraining a threatened nuisance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Jasper Alexander, John W. Wetzel, and Conrad Hambleton, for appellants:

An injunction cannot be issued before the fact of nuisance is determined by a trial at law.

Woodroffe v. Hagerty, 35 Pa. Super. Ct. 579; Baer v. Wilmoth, 39 Pa. Super. Ct. 74; New Castle v. Raney (McClain v. New Castle) 130 Pa. 560, 6 L.R.A. 737, 18 Atl. 1066; Mowday v. Messrs. F. B. Sellers, Jr., and Paul Willis, for appellees:

When the bill is to enjoin a threatened, as distinguished from an existing, nuisance, the requirement of a previous trial at law cannot be applied. No such question can be tried at law. No nuisance exists. The object of the bill is to enjoin the defendants from creating one.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The injunction appealed from followed findings by the court below that the defendants were about to engage in the horse and cattle business in an exclusively residential section of the borough of Carlisle, but not yet compactly built up; that for the purpose of doing so they had erected on a lot owned by them a shed 140 feet in length and 14 feet wide, and were about to build a barn in connection with it 60 feet long and 40 feet wide; that the capacity of the proposed stockyard would be for from forty to fifty head of cattle and for from thirty to thirty-five head of horses; that the defendants proposed to deal in western cattle and horses, to be delivered to them by rail, and such delivery would necessitate a practically constant driving of both cattle and horses in and out of the yard and over the public streets of the borough; that they proposed to occasionally hold public sales of cattle and horses on their premises and to exhibit and sell them on Graham street, on which their yard fronted; that the operation of the yard as proposed by the defendants would result in the breeding of great quantities of flies, would engender noxious odors and occasion disturbance and noise, would render the enjoyment of the plaintiffs' property uncomfortable, and be detrimental to their health; that the use of their property by the defendants for the large business which they proposed to carry on in the sale and exchange of cattle and horses was an unreasonable use of it, and it was selected by them for the purpose of carrying on their business for the sole reason that it was near their residences, and their business could, therefore, be more conveniently conducted by them at that point. The argument of counsel for appellants, in pressing for a reversal of the decree, is largely directed to an effort to show that the foregoing facts ought not to have been found. After a review of all the testimony, we have not been convinced that error was committed in any of the findings complained of. There was testimony in support of all of them, and it was for the court below to weigh the evidence and to determine what facts had been established by it. This the learned trial judge did, and his eighteenth finding of fact is that he had arrived "at the clear and certain conclusion, from all the evidence in the case, that the operation of the proposed yard would work irreparable injury to the complainants by rendering their homes uncomfortable and endangering their health."

The second complaint of the appellants is that the injunction was issued before the existence of a nuisance maintained by them had been established as a fact by a trial at law. At the time the bill was filed no injury had been sustained by the appellees. Nothing had been done by the appellants for which an action at law could have been brought. Actual irreparable damages, actual depreciation of property, did not exist. It was to prevent these consequences and the perpetration of a wrong, for which no adequate remedy existed at law, that this proceeding was properly instituted. Wier's Appeal, 74 Pa. 230; Joyce, Nuisances, § 419; High, Inj. 3d ed. § 23. To sustain the appellants' contention would be to disallow the remedy of injunction in cases where a nuisance had not already been set up, but is merely threatened. While it is true that an injunction will not issue to allay mere fears and apprehension, nevertheless, if it be shown that there is Injunction—against
nuisance. reasonable and just ground to apprehend the establishment of a nuisance, threatened by a defendant and which he has power to commit, and it is reasonably certain that the health and comfort of those complaining will be impaired by the threatened act, the writ will go out. No remedy in an action at law would be adequate in such a case. To hold that such a nuisance as the court below found would follow from what the appellants proposed to do could not be prevented in advance of its actual existence would be but little —against threatened
nuisance. better than a mockery of justice to those to be affected by it. Wahle

v. Reinbach, 76 Ill. 322. "The reasons for preventing a prospective mischief are at least as cogent as those for abating a present one. In the latter instance the courts act more readily because they are sure of their ground. The evil is visible. But the call for protection against an apprehended injury, reasonably certain to befall, is as imperative as that for relief from one now felt. Nor is the complainant required to wait until some harm has been experienced or to show with absolute certainty it will occur. One requirement would make the remedy largely useless and the other impracticable. Miley v. O'Hearn, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 834, 18 S. W. 529. While perhaps proof that it is inevitable or will necessarily ensue may be properly demanded when nothing more than discomfort is anticipated, when danger to health or life is threatened, a reasonable certainty is enough. Wood, Nuisances, § 100. A party does not have to stand by until his family have sickened or died." Holke v. Herman, 87 Mo. App. 125.

The assignments of error are overruled, and the decree is affirmed, at appellants' costs.

NOTE.

The reported case (ECKELS v. WEIBLEY, ante, 739) illustrates well the rule that where acts threatened or in progress will, if continued, inevitably result in a nuisance justifying relief, the court may interfere in advance and restrain the consummation of the nuisance. In the class of decisions which the ECKELS CASE represents, the courts have been cautious in interfering in advance, applying the rule generally that equity will not interfere where the nuisance is contingent and depends on the manner of operation or use of the premises. For a full discussion of the question of the right to enjoin the threatened or anticipated nuisance, see post, 749.

Injunction — condemnation for irrigation ditch — nuisance.

1. The condemnation of a right of way for an open irrigation ditch to take the water from a sewage polluted stream will be enjoined if its use will result in a foul and noisome condition of the ditch inimical to health at times of low water, although the intention is to take the water from the stream only at times of flood, when the sewage is rendered innocuous by the volume of the water.

APPEAL by cross complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Jackson County dismissing their cross bill filed to enjoin the maintenance of actions by defendant to condemn a right of way for an irrigation ditch across certain tracts of land owned by cross complainants. Modified.

Statement by Moore, Ch. J.:

The Rogue River Valley Canal Company, a corporation, commenced actions in the circuit court of the state of Oregon for Jackson county, against Ala R. Phipps and her sons and daughters, to condemn a right of way for an irrigating ditch across tracts of land owned by them in severalty in the northwest part of the city of Medford. The defendants in that action, having filed answers therein, also as plaintiffs instituted this suit in equity, in the nature of a cross bill, to enjoin the maintenance of such actions. The latter cause, being at issue, was tried, and from the testimony taken the court made findings of fact, inter alia, that the contemplated ditch, when constructed and used at the time and in the manner intended, would not constitute a nuisance, and thereupon dismissed the suit, from which decree the plaintiffs appeal.

Mr. W. E. Phipps, for appellants:

The proposed ditch was a nuisance. Joyce, Nuisances, § 2; Wessinger v. Mische, 71 Or. 239, 142 Pac. 612; Caraduc v. Schanen-Blair Co. 66 Or. 313, 133 Pac. 636; Bernard v. Willamette Box & Lumber Co. 64 Or. 228, 129 Pac. 1039; Baines v. Marshfield & Suburban R. Co. 62 Or. 510, 124 Pac. 672; Bourne v. Wilson-Case Lumber Co. 58 Or. 48, 113 Pac. 52, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 245; Ulmen v. Mt. Angel, 57 Or. 547, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 140, 112 Pac. 529; Kane v. Littlefield, 48 Or. 303, 86 Pac. 544; Blagen v. The ditch, if constructed, will menace the health of the plaintiffs and community, and become a nuisance by reason of irreparable injury and damage to plaintiffs' property.

The fact that the defendant has condemnation actions pending against plaintiffs renders it no less amenable to the process of injunction, for the injury sought to be done is irreparable and cannot be compensated in damages.

Messrs. Neff & Mealey for respondent.

Moore, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence shows that Bear creek, a non-navigable stream from which the defendant's proposed irrigating ditch is designed to divert water, flows northerly through Jackson county. This stream receives the sewage of Ashland, Talent, Phoenix, and Medford, and the street litter and compost of the latter city also are discharged by storm sewers into the creek. The rains and melting snow on the mountains keep up quite a volume of water in Bear creek until the warm weather dries up that stream in most places, leaving, however, pools of stagnant water and sand and gravel bars, which places, by reason of the heat, cause the sewage and foul matter cast into the stream to become very offensive. The water in the creek usually becomes low in June of each year, and continues in that condition until about September, when the drought is broken. The defendant owns a series of ditches, which take water from Fish lake, Four Mile lake, and the surplus from the north and south forks of Little Butte creek and from Antelope creek. From these streams a sufficient quantity of water cannot always be obtained properly to irrigate about 70,000 acres of arable land which lie under the ditches mentioned. In order to augment the supply the defendant secured from the state engineer permission to divert from Bear creek the surplus water after the measure of lower prior appropriators on that stream had been satisfied. Thereupon a survey and plat were made of the proposed supplemental ditch; the point of diversion being located on Mrs. Phipps's land and thence crossing northwesterly the premises of the other plaintiffs. As no agreement could be reached as to the compensation which should be paid for the easement demanded, actions at law to condemn the right of way were instituted by the defendant. In order to prevent the maintenance of such actions at law, this suit in equity was instituted, terminating in a decree as hereinbefore stated.

It is contended by appellants' counsel that to permit the filthy water from Bear creek to flow in an open ditch across the plaintiffs' premises will at all times create such a stench as to render the atmosphere impure, producing sickness, and causing the contemplated diversion to become a nuisance, and, such being the case, an error was committed in dismissing the suit. Such anticipated consequences are denied by defendant's counsel, who maintain that the intended diversion will be undertaken only when the water flowing in the creek is at a high stage, thereby carrying off through the ditch the sewage, which will be rendered innocuous by the then volume of the current; that the plaintiffs' apprehension of injury is not sufficient to authorize equitable intervention, and, this being so, no error was committed as alleged. One of the cases relied upon by defendant's counsel to support the legal principle last asserted is Eason v. Wattier, 25 Or. 10, 34 Pac. 756, where it was ruled that in order to justify a court of equity in interfering by injunction to abate a nuisance, the thing that unlawfully worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage must be an actual existing offense, and not merely apprehended. In that case it was insisted that by erecting in a stream a dam the water thus to be impounded would become foul, stagnant, and unhealthy, thereby impregnating the atmosphere with malaria, which noxious exhalation would render the plaintiff and his family liable to sickness. The dam so referred to had not been completed when that suit was commenced, and whether or not the consequences supposed would necessarily result was only problematical.

Where, however, it appears from the evidence that water confined by a dam has produced malaria causing illness, a court of equity will intervene to prevent a continuance of the injury. Richards v. Daugherty, 133 Ala. 569, 31 So. 934. In that case it was decided that where the erection of dams, which affect the natural flow of a running stream, results in injury to the health of persons living in the vicinity, such obstruction constitutes a nuisance and may be abated by a suit in equity by a person the health of whose family is injured thereby, without waiting the trial of the issue of nuisance vel non by an action at law. "It is difficult," says a text-writer, "to define just what degree of injurious influence must be reached in order to warrant the court in determining what circumstances constitute a nuisance. A condemnation for irrigation ditch—

mere tending to injury is not sufficient; there must be something actually appreciable, which of itself arrests the attention, that rests not merely in theory, but strikes the common sense of the ordinary citizen. The determination, however, of the question rests in sound judgment and depends upon common sense in each case. . . . If property cannot be enjoyed unless the health is endangered thereby, a nuisance exists. It is not necessary, however, in order to constitute a nuisance, that the annoyance should be of such a character as to endanger the health of a person or persons, or of the neighborhood; the act need not be positively unhealthy. It is sufficient if it occasions that which is offensive to the senses, and that it in any way renders the enjoyment of life and property uncomfortable, or that it prevents its enjoyment in as full and ample a manner as before, that it invades or violates a vested right and materially interferes with the ordinary comfort of human existence or renders one's dwelling house unfit for habitation; and if the enjoyment of life and property has been so rendered uncomfortable, it is not indispensable to sustain a right of action that one should, by the annoyance or alleged nuisance, have been driven from his dwelling or habitation. So even that which causes a well-founded, reasonable apprehension of damage may be a nuisance." Joyce, Nuisances, § 19. To the same effect see the first head-note to the case of Melker v. New York, 190 N. Y. 481, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 621, 83 N. E. 565, 13 Ann. Cas. 544. A danger which is apparent and real, as distinguished from an imaginary fear of injury, from an alleged nuisance, may warrant equitable relief. Cheatham v. Shearon, 1 Swan, 213, 55 Am. Dec. 734.

An excerpt from the brief of plaintiffs' counsel is, in our opinion, fully justified, and reads: "The testimony herein of four physicians is to the effect that the ditch, if constructed, will menace the health of the plaintiffs and community, and fourteen other witnesses assert it will be a nuisance by reason of irreparable injury and damage to plaintiffs' property."

The infliction of "irreparable injury," such as a court of equity will enjoin, includes also that degree of wrongs of a repeated or continuing kind which produce

—against threatened nuisance.
hurt, inconvenience, or damage that can be estimated only by conjecture, and not by any accurate standard of measurement. 29 Cyc. 1224; Bernard v. Willamette Box & Lumber Co. 64 Or. 225, 129 Pac. 1039.

Most of plaintiffs' witnesses, who on direct examination had testified as to the offensive odor emanating from the pools and bars to be found in Bear creek in the dry season, admitted on cross-examination that when the water in that stream was high they had not perceived such stench. Dave Phipps, one of the plaintiffs, however, who had lived near that stream many years, and evidently had a better opportunity than any other witness of observing the disgusting odor, testified that during the summers he was obliged to go to the mountains to avoid the prevailing foul atmosphere.

He was asked: You have worked a great deal in and around Bear creek there, haven't you?

He answered: Yes, sir.

Q. You have been marketing sand and gravel, have you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You may tell the court whether or not the water of Bear creek is foul and offensive at all times of the year.

A. Well, I won't let my cow drink out of it for milk for my own use.

Q. That did not answer the question. I want to know whether it is foul and offensive at all times of the year.

A. I think so.

Q. When were you down in there getting gravel the last time?

A. Last Saturday [referring to the week preceding February 1, 1915, when the trial of this cause was commenced].

Q. And what was the nature of Bear creek at that time and in this sand and gravel that you got out of there?

A. Why, the odor is so bad it is pretty hard for a fellow to stay to shovel on a load where I was loading.

This testimony is not contradicted in any manner, except by the cross-examination of the witnesses, to which reference has been made. Though the contemplated open ditch may be used by the defendant only during the high water in the stream, when the volume recedes there will be found on the bottom and sides of the artificial conduit an accumulation of filth which, being exposed to the summer heat, must necessarily cause an offensive scent, not merely to be apprehended, but certainly to be expected, thereby —against irreparable injury.
creating an intolerable nuisance, the maintenance of which a court of equity will enjoin in the proposed manner of the use.

The defendant will therefore be restrained from prosecuting its actions at law against the several plaintiffs, except on condition of conducting the water in suitable and safe pipes from the proposed intake on Bear creek to the ditch into which the water is to be discharged. In order to insure a faithful compliance with this requirement, it is ordered that the defendant give to the plaintiffs a good and sufficient bond, executed by some reputable bonding company, in the sum of $12,000, the probable cost of putting in such pipes, the bond to be approved by the court and to serve as indemnity, in addition to the several sums to be awarded the plaintiffs in the condemnation actions. When the ditch is thus completed to the satisfaction of the court, the specified bond may be canceled upon the substitution of another like bond, executed in the same manner, for the sum of $2,000, and conditioned for the maintenance of the conduit, as here indicated, without further damages to the plaintiffs, or to any of them.

The decree appealed from will be modified, and one entered here in accordance with the view hereinbefore expressed.

Benson, Burnett, and McBride, JJ., concur.

NOTE.

The reported case (PHIPPS v. ROGUE RIVER VALLEY CANAL Co. ante, 741) is in line with many cases holding that a court of equity may enjoin a threatened or anticipated nuisance where it clearly appears that a nuisance will necessarily result from the contemplated act or thing which it is sought to enjoin. And the courts have more readily interfered in cases where injury to health was threatened, as in the PHIPPS CASE, than where the prospective injury was only to property. For a discussion of the question of injunction to restrain a threatened or anticipated nuisance, see post, 749.

HAMILTON CORPORATION, Appt.,

v..

ELLA S. M. JULIAN et al.

Injunction — against threatened bowling alley.

1. One residing in a residence district of a municipality may enjoin the threatened erection of a bowling alley and moving picture theater adjoining his residence if the act complained of will, in the judgment of reasonable men, be naturally productive of actual physical discomfort to persons of ordinary sensibilities and of ordinary tastes and habits, and, in view of all the circumstances of the case, will be in derogation of the rights of the complainant.

— against threatened nuisance.

2. An injunction lies to prevent threatened acts the completion of which will plainly result in a grievous nuisance.

[See 20 R. C. L. 478.]

Nuisance — bowling alley as.

3. Bowling alleys and moving picture theaters, while not nuisances per se, may become so when they create a disturbance to the serious annoyance and physical discomfort of persons of ordinary sensibilities living in the neighborhood.

[See 20 R. C. L. 418.]

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Circuit Court for Baltimore County (Duncan, J.) overruling its demurrer to a bill filed to enjoin the erection and maintenance of a bowling alley and a moving picture theater building upon its lot. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John B. Gontrum, Henry B. Mann, and John S. Biddison for appellant.

Messrs. C. M. Armstrong and J. Elmer Weisheit, for appellees:

A prospective nuisance may be enjoined.

Noise alone, if of such a character as to be productive of actual physical discomfort to a person of ordinary sensibility, may create a nuisance and be the subject of an injunction.

That the establishment of the nuisances objected to will deprive the plaintiffs of the benefit of their property as a means of support, by making it unavailable as a place of residence for their boarders, is ground for an injunction.

Even if the things complained of constitute a public nuisance, the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction upon their allegation of special injury.

Hendrickson v. Standard Oil Co. 126 Md. 535, 95 Atl. 153.

Briscoe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity brought by the appellees against the appellant, in the circuit court for Baltimore county, for an injunction to enjoin and restrain the defendant from erecting, maintaining, and conducting a bowling alley and a moving picture theater building upon its lot in the village of Hamilton, in Baltimore county. The defendant is a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the state of Maryland, and its incorporators reside and own a lot in the village of Hamilton, adjoining the plaintiffs' property. The plaintiffs are also residents of Hamilton, and own a lot therein, improved by a dwelling house, which they occupy as a home, and where they also conduct a boarding house as a means of livelihood. The lot is described as situate on the southwesterly side of Hamilton avenue, having a frontage on this avenue of about 50 feet, and extending then southwesterly, with an even width of 50 feet, about 214.2 feet, and designated as lot No. 8 on the plat of the land of the Lauraville Hall & Land Company of Baltimore County.

The bill alleges that the village of Hamilton is exclusively a residential suburb of Baltimore city, and that the section of the plaintiffs' residence is exclusively a residential neighborhood, except several places of business necessary and suitable for the accommodation of the residents of the community, and that these by their ordinary and proper use are not calculated to interfere with or impair the reasonable use and enjoyment of property in the neighborhood by the owners and occupants thereof. The bill then avers that the defendant corporation is erecting and constructing on its lot adjoining the plaintiffs' property a building in which they are going to conduct public bowling alleys for profit, that the building is of large dimensions, over 100 feet in length by 50 feet in width, and is within 25 feet of plaintiffs' dwelling house, that this building is not susceptible of any other use, and that this use will impair the reasonable enjoyment of the plaintiffs' property as a residence and a boarding house. The bill further charges that the defendant is also about to erect and construct on its lot another building where they will conduct a moving picture theater, and this building will be within 21 feet of plaintiffs' dwelling, and that the uses to be made of both buildings, with the noises incident to such places, will work a special injury to the plaintiffs and their property; that both the bowling alleys and theater, to be located and operated in the manner and way as proposed, will deprive them of the reasonable use and enjoyment of their property rights, render it untenable as a home for themselves, and destroy its use and benefit as a means of support for them, and make it undesirable and unavailable as a place of residence for their boarders and lodgers, and greatly impair its value.

The prayer of the bill is for an injunction restraining and enjoining the defendant, the Hamilton corporation, (1) from establishing, maintaining, or conducting a bowling alley or bowling alleys, upon the lot in the village of Hamilton, in the fourteenth election district of Baltimore county, designated as lot No. 9 on said plat of the Lauraville Hall & Land Company of Baltimore County; (2) that the defendant be enjoined from establishing, maintaining or conducting, or causing to be established, maintained, or conducted, upon the lot, a moving picture theater; (3) that the defendant be commanded and required to remove immediately the bowling alley building now being erected by them upon the lot, and enjoined from erecting hereafter a bowling alley building thereon; (4) that the defendant be enjoined from erecting or constructing on the lot a moving picture theater building; (5) and for other and further relief as their case may require.

Subsequently the case was heard upon the bill and a demurrer thereto, and from an order of court, passed on the 18th day of December, 1916, overruling the demurrer to the bill, with leave to answer, this appeal has been taken.

The cause and grounds of the demurrer are stated to be: (1) That the plaintiffs have not stated in their bill such a case as entitles them to any relief in equity against this defendant. (2) That the allegations of the bill are too general, vague, uncertain, indefinite, argumentative, and inferential to require this defendant to answer the same, or to entitle the plaintiffs to any relief in the premises.

The object of the bill, it will be seen from its recitals, is in substance to enjoin and restrain a prospective, probable, or threatening nuisance, and the single question here involved is whether its averments of fact, as admitted by the demurrer to be true, are sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to the relief sought by the bill. The rules of law controlling the rights of parties under similar facts and circumstances, alleged by the bill in this case, have been settled by numerous decisions of this court. In Adams v. Michael, 38 Md. 123, 17 Am. Rep. 516, it is said: "The general rule is that an injunction will only be granted to restrain an actual existing nuisance; but where it can be plainly seen that acts which, when completed, will certainly constitute or result in a grievous nuisance, or where a party threatens or begins to do, or insists upon his right to do, certain acts, the court will interfere though no nuisance may have been actually committed, if the circumstances of the case enable the court to form an opinion as to the illegality of the acts complained of and the irreparable injury which will ensue." See Dittman v. Repp, 50 Md. 516, 33 Am. Rep. 325; Chappell v. Funk, 57 Md. 465; Susquehanna Fertilizer Co. v. Spangler, 86 Md. 562, 63 Am. St. Rep. 533, 39 Atl. 270; Hendrickson v. Standard Oil Co. 126 Md. 578, 95 Atl. 153; Singer v. James, 130 Md. 382, 100 Atl. 642.

While it is true that bowling alleys and moving picture theaters, kept and conducted for profit, are not nuisances per se, yet they may be and may become so in certain places, when they create a disturbance to the serious annoyance and physical discomfort of persons of ordinary sensibilities living in the neighborhood. 29 Cyc. 1154, 1168, 1183; Harrison v. People, 101 Ill. App. 224; Cleveland v. Citizens'

Gaslight Co. 20 N. J. Eq. 201; Tuttle v. Church (C. C.) 53 Fed. 426; Ladies' Decorative Art Club's Appeal, 10 Sadler (Pa.) 150, 22 W. N. C. 75, 13 Atl. 539. In Miley v. A'Hearn, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 834, 18 S. W. 530, the court held that in similar cases a party is not required to wait until the injury is inflicted. The object of the writ is preventive, and it wards off the injury. The case must be a clear one; but if the danger be probable and threatening, and likely to ensue, the aid of the court may be invoked. Broder v. Saillard, L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 692, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 414, 24 Week. Rep. 1011; Ball v. Ray, L. R. 8 Ch. 471, 28 L. T. N. S. 346, 21 Week. Rep. 282; Crump v. Lambert, L. R. 3 Eq. 409, 15 Week. Rep. 417; St. Helen's Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 11 H. L. Cas. 642, 11 Eng. Reprint, 642, 35 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 36, 11 Jur. N. S. 785, 12 L. T. N. S. 776, 13 Week. Rep. 1083, 25 Eng. Rul. Cas. 144, 11 Mor. Min. Rep. 50.

In the present case, the averments of the bill are sufficient, if they can be sustained by the proper proof, to warrant the granting of the relief sought by the bill.

The real question in all such cases, as stated by the authorities, is whether the nuisance complained of will or does produce such a condition of things as, in the judgment of reasonable men, is naturally productive of actual physical discomfort to persons of ordinary sensibilities and of ordinary tastes and habits, and as, in view of the circumstances of the case, is unreasonable and in derogation of the rights of the party. A prospective or threatening nuisance is subject to the same test, and against which a party would have a clear right to preventive relief in equity.

alley.*

In view of the averments of the bill in this case, and in the absence of answer and proof, we must hold upon the authorities that the court below was entirely right in overruling the demurrer, and in requiring the defendant to answer the plaintiffs' bill.

Order affirmed; the appellant to pay the costs.

The same principle governs the question as to the interference of equity, whether the threatened nuisance is private or public. Atty. Gen. v. Sheffield Gas Consumers' Co. (1853) 3 De G. M. & G. 304, 22 L. J. Ch. N. S. 811, 17 Jur. 677, 1 Week. Rep. 185, 19 Eng. Rul. Cas. 273; Atty. Gen. v. Manchester [1893] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 87, 62 L. J. Ch. N. S. 459, 3 Reports, 427, 68 L. T. N. S. 608, 41 Week. Rep. 459, 57 J. P. 343.

The power of equity to enjoin the doing of acts threatening irreparable injury to property rights, or constituting a public nuisance, is inherent, and cannot be devested because the performance of such acts may be a violation of the criminal law. State ex rel. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Woolfolk (1916) 269 Mo. 389, 190 S. W. 877 (injunction sought against the illegal transportation of intoxicating liquor).

There must be proof of imminent danger, to justify an injunction against the threatened nuisance. Fletcher v. Bealey (1885) L. R. 23 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 688, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 424, 52 L. T. N. S. 541, 33 Week. Rep. 745.

The complainant must establish the prospective nuisance with clearness and reasonable certainty; the danger apprehended must appear to be imminent, and, in the natural course of events, clearly impending, and the injuries in their nature and character irreparable; and it is not sufficient to make out a doubtful or possible case of danger. Rochester v. Erickson (1866) 46 Barb. (N. Y.) 92 (restraining construction of a wall which would obstruct a river); Hough v. Doylestown (1870) 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 333 (refusing to enjoin, at the instance of a mill owner, the diversion of water from a stream by a municipality); Windfall Mfg. Co. v. Patterson (1896) 148 Ind. 414, 37 L.R.A. 381, 62 Am. St. Rep. 532, 47 N. E. 2, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 674 (denying injunction to restrain the drilling of a gas well 152 feet from the complainant's residence).

The court will not act upon speculative proof, or such as furnishes ground only for conjecture. Berger v. Smith (1912) 160 N. C. 205, 75 S. E. 1098 (refusing to enjoin erection of saw-mill).

A showing of probable or contingent injury is insufficient: the injury must be inevitable and undoubted. McCutchen v. Blanton (1881) 59 Miss. 116.

The court, while continuing the injunction, may direct an issue, to determine whether the proposed structure will constitute a nuisance. Miller v. Trueheart (1833) 4 Leigh (Va.) 569 (where a milldam, which had been washed away, had constituted a nuisance, and the question was whether the proposed remedy, if the dam were rebuilt, would obviate the nuisance).

b. Degree of certainty.

See also infra, I. f.

Generally, the court ought not to interfere, where the injury apprehended is of a character to justify conflicting opinions as to whether it will in fact ever be realized. Butler v. Rogers (1853) 9 N. J. Eq. 489 (refusing to enjoin construction of a blacksmith shop).

To authorize an injunction, it must be established by satisfactory evidence that the threatened or apprehended injury will probably result. Braasch v. Cemetery Asso. (1903) 69 Neb. 300, 95 N. W. 646, 5 Ann. Cas. 182.

The complainant must make out a "strong case of probability" that the apprehended mischief will, in fact, arise. Atty. Gen. v. Manchester [1893] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 87, 62 L. J. Ch. N. S. 459, 3 Reports, 427, 68 L. T. N. S. 608, 41 Week. Rep. 459, 57 J. P. 343.

There must be an "extreme probability" of irreparable injury, to justify the granting of an injunction to restrain an alleged threatened nuisance.

Spooner v. McConnell (1838) 1 McLean, 337, Fed. Cas. No. 13,245.

The complainant must establish with a "high degree of probability" that a nuisance will result. Atty. Gen. v. Manchester (Eng.) supra.

There must be a "practical certainty" that a nuisance will result to justify equitable interference. Columbia Ave. Sav. Fund, S. D. Title & T. Co. v. Prison Commission (1899) 92 Fed. 801.

The proposed enterprise must "inevitably" prove a nuisance, to justify equitable interference. Sherman v. Livingston (1910) 128 N. Y. Supp. 581; Heaton v. Packer (1909) 131 App. Div. 812, 116 N. Y. Supp. 46; Harrison v. Brooks (1856) 20 Ga. 537.

It must appear that the business which it sought to enjoin will, under the circumstances, "necessarily" be a nuisance. Alexander v. Tebeau (1903) 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1305, 71 S. W. 427; Wolcott v. Melick (1856) 11 N. J. Eq. 204, 66 Am. Dec. 790.

"We fully agree," said the court in Missouri v. Illinois (1900) 180 U. S. 208, 45 L. ed. 497, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 331, "with the contention of defendants' counsel that it is settled that an injunction to restrain a nuisance will issue only in cases where the fact of nuisance is made out upon determinate and satisfactory evidence; that if the evidence be conflicting and the injury be doubtful, that conflict and doubt will be a ground for withholding an injunction; and that, where interposition by injunction is sought, to restrain that which is apprehended will create a nuisance of which its complainant may complain, the proofs must show such a state of facts as will manifest the danger to be real and immediate."

A bare possibility of injury will not warrant an injunction against an alleged threatened nuisance. Lytton v. Steward (1876) 2 Tenn. Ch. 586.

But, on the other hand, equity will not refuse to enjoin a threatened nuisance because there is a "bare possibility" that the evil may be avoided. In Ripon v. Hobart (1834) 3 Myl. & K. 169, 40 Eng. Reprint, 65, the court said: "Proceeding upon practical views of human affairs, the law will guard against risks which are so imminent that no prudent person would incur them, although they do not amount to absolute certainty of damage. Nay, it will go further, according to the same practical and rational view, and, balancing the magnitude of the evil against the chances of its occurrence, it will even provide against a somewhat less imminent probability in cases where the mischief, should it be done, would be vast and overwhelming." The court, however, in this instance, refused to grant an injunction against the erection and use of a steam engine for drainage purposes, sought on the ground that by the use of the engine instead of windmills, which had previously been used, the water would be pumped in such quantities and so continuously as to injure the banks of a stream which the complainants were bound to keep in repair.

And it was said in Mohawk Bridge Co. v. Utica & S. R. Co. (1837) 6 Paige (N. Y.) 554, that if the magnitude of the injury to be guarded against is great, and the risk so imminent that no prudent person would think of incurring it, the court will not refuse its aid for the protection of the complainant's rights by injunction, on the ground that there is a bare possibility that the anticipated injury from the noxious erection may not happen. To the same effect is Phoenix v. Emigration Comrs. (1855) 1 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 466, which is affirmed in (1855) 12 How. Pr. 1.

Absolute certainty of injury unless an injunction is issued to restrain a threatened nuisance need not be shown to warrant the granting of the injunction: there must be a reasonable probability. Nelson v. Swedish E. Lutheran Cemetery Asso. (1910) 111 Minn. 149, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 565, 126 N. W. 723, 127 N. W. 626, 20 Ann. Cas. 790 (suit to enjoin establishment of cemetery); Miley v. A'Hearn (1892) 13 Ky. L. Rep. 834, 18 S. W. 529; Atty. Gen. v. Manchester (Eng.) supra.

To warrant the granting of an injunction to restrain a threatened nuisance on the ground of deterioration in the value of property, a stronger case must be made out than in cases of threatened injuries to health. Phoenix v. Emigration Comrs. (N. Y.) supra.

And while perhaps proof that the nuisance is inevitable, or will necessarily ensue, may be properly demanded when nothing more than discomfort is anticipated, a reasonable certainty that the nuisance will result unless the injunction is granted is sufficient when danger to health or life is threatened. Holke v. Herman (1900) 87 Me. App. 125 (where an injunction was sought to restrain the establishment of a pond near the complainant's residence).

So, in Elliott v. Ferguson (1904) 37 Tex. Civ. App. 40, 83 S. W. 56, it was held that the complaint need not allege facts showing that a nuisance must "inevitably" result from the establishment of a proposed cemetery; but that such facts must be alleged as show "with cogency, clearness, and reasonable certainty" that the acts threatened, if done, would create a nuisance, and that the complainant would suffer irreparable injury therefrom.

And it was held in Elliott v. Ferguson (Tex.) supra, that an instruction that "the burden of proof is on plaintiffs to show beyond a reasonable doubt that the use of the grounds for cemetery purposes will probably result in poisoning the water in their wells and springs, or in contaminating the atmosphere of their homes," was erroneous as imposing too great a degree of certainty on the complainants.

It was held in Moore v. Coleman (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 195 S. W. 212, that while the evils anticipated must be shown to be such as are imminent and certain to occur, to warrant the granting of an injunction to restrain an improvement such as a cotton gin, yet it is not proper so to instruct the jury.

c. Public inconvenience and comparative injury.

The general question whether the court, in determining the right to an injunction against a nuisance, will regard the public convenience, or compare the amount of injury to the plaintiff from the nuisance with the injury to defendant from the injunction, if one is granted, is beyond the scope of this annotation, as it is not peculiar to anticipated or threatened nuisances as distinguished from existing nuisances; though the courts are perhaps somewhat more apt to be influenced by these considerations in a case involving a threatened or anticipated nuisance than in a case of an actually existing nuisance. In either case, of course, these considerations weigh more heavily upon an application for an interlocutory injunction, than upon an application for a final injunction.

The court is less disposed to interfere where the apprehended mischief is from such establishments and erections as have a tendency to promote the public convenience. Harrison v. Brooks (1856) 20 Ga. 537 (livery stable); Bacon v. Walker (1886) 77 Ga. 336 (jail); Barnes v. Calhoun (1842) 37 N. C. (2 Ired. Eq.) 199 (mill).

This doctrine is approved in a number of cases in North Carolina involving the restraint of mills. Thus, it was held in Wilder v. Strickland (1856) 55 N. C. (2 Jones, Eq.) 386, that the establishment of a mill, which is a convenience and necessity to the public, will not be enjoined on the ground that complainants will sustain injury by overflow of their lands, where the injury is comparatively slight.

And in Atty. Gen. v. Lea (1844) 38 N. C. (3 Ired. Eq.) 301, in refusing to enjoin the erection of a mill, the court said: "When the mischief arising from the erection of a mill, which is a public convenience, does not extend to the neighborhood, but is confined to a particular family, it cannot, as a general rule, under this head, be held a nuisance, to be redressed by abatement or injunction. In the case before us, it does not appear from the evidence that the erection of the mill pond will endanger the health of the neighborhood, or of the relator's family. . . . We cannot, therefore, say we are satisfied that effects so injurious to the health of the neighborhood as to render it a nuisance will result from the erection of this pond. But it appears to us this is a case of private nuisance, if a nuisance at all, in the erection of a mill, which will be a public convenience. And there is nothing to show us that there is so great a disproportion between the private suffering and the public convenience, as would authorize the court to interfere. The legislature considers public mills as public conveniences, and encourages their erection even by taking from another so much of his land upon just compensation as may be necessary, unless the mill when erected will be a public nuisance. . . . In this case the whole of the land on which the mill and pond will be belongs to the defendants, they have a right to use it, as in their discretion may seem right, provided in doing so, they do not injure the public or private individuals, and when the use they make of it is to the public convenience, and the injurious effect confined to a private individual, the interest of the latter must give way to that of the many, unless he can make it manifestly appear that so great a difference exists between his injury and the public convenience as bears no comparison, and that the erection will be followed by irreparable mischief, in which case the court will interfere by injunction."

And the rebuilding of a mill which would be a public convenience and would not injure the health of the neighborhood, although it would that of the complainant and his family, it was held in Atty. Gen. ex rel. Eason v. Perkins (1831) 17 N. C. (2 Dev. Eq.) 38, would not be enjoined, in view of statutory provisions encouraging the building of mills by restraining successive actions for private injury, requiring a minimum of $10 damage annually to sustain an action, and authorizing the court to order the building on lands of another unless the mill would create a nuisance to the neighborhood. The above conclusion was reached especially in view of the fact that the complainant had purchased his property after the original mill was in operation.

It was said in Berger v. Smith (1912) 160 N. C. 205, 75 S. E. 1098, that if the proposed structure will be beneficial to the public, the court will not stop its erection, if it is not a nuisance per se, unless the private injury is greater in proportion than the public benefit. In this case an injunction was refused to restrain the erection of a sawmill.

The court may balance the inconvenience likely to be incurred by the respective parties, in case of a threatened nuisance, and grant or withhold the injunction according to a sound discretion; and the injunction should not issue when the benefit to one party is but small, while it would operate oppressively and to the annoyance and injury of the other party, unless the wrong is so wanton and unprovoked as to deprive the defendant of equitable consideration. This rule is especially true where the alleged threatened nuisance, while highly beneficial to one party, may possibly not be prejudicial to the other. Hough v. Doylestown (1870) 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 333 (refusing to enjoin diversion of water by a municipality for domestic uses, at the instance of a mill owner).

In Dorsey v. Allen (1881) 85 N. C. 358, 39 Am. Rep. 704, the court, in refusing to grant a restraining order to prevent the erection of a planing mill and gin on a lot adjacent to that of complainant's residence, took into consideration the benefit to the community from the projected enterprise as compared with the detriment the complainant might sustain, and stated that when the anticipated injury is contingent and possible only, or the public benefit preponderates over the private inconvenience, the court will not interfere.

Although equity will not usually grant preventive relief in cases of public nuisances, where it is questionable whether a nuisance will result, it has been said that even in these doubtful cases, an injunction will sometimes be granted, to continue until a trial at law, where its denial would be productive of great public inconvenience. State v. Mobile (1837)

That the right of navigation in a canal is of little value to the public compared to the great value to a municipality of an obstruction which it proposes to place across the canal will not prevent equity from enjoining the obstruction at the suit of the state. State ex rel. Lyon v. Columbia Water Power Co. (1909) 82 S. C. 181, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 435, 129 Am. St. Rep. 876, 63 S. E. 884, 17 Ann. Cas. 343.

d. Substantial and irreparable injury.

The general rule with respect to equitable interference in cases involving nuisances, that the complainant must show an injury that is irreparable, or one which cannot be adequately compensated by damages in an action at law, and that he must establish a case of serious mischief, and not mere trifling discomfort (20 R. C. L. § 92), has been applied, or at least approved, in many cases where the nuisance was merely prospective, among which the following are cited by way of illustration:

To justify equitable interference there must be a strong case of pressing necessity, with threatened, substantial, and serious damages. Morris & E. R. Co. v. Prudden (N. J.) and Welton v. Martin (Mo.) supra.

It was held in Randall v. Freed (1908) 154 Cal. 299, 97 Pac. 669, that threatened repeated trespasses, accompanied by offensive and insulting language, would not be enjoined, even if the same constituted a nuisance, in the absence of a showing that there was no prompt and adequate remedy at law.

In holding that an injunction against the rebuilding of a causeway was not justified on the ground that trifling inconvenience or unsubstantial injury might result to the complainant through the overflow of his land, the court in Bigelow v. Hartford Bridge Co. (1842) 14 Conn. 565, 36 Am. Dec. 502, said: "The proof in the case relieves us from the necessity of examining minutely the principles and authorities applicable to bills for injunction founded on apprehended injuries. . . . Of whatever character it is requisite that the injury complained of should be, in order to lay the foundation for this remedy, it is necessary that it should be a substantial, and not merely a technical, or inconsequential, injury. There must not only be a violation of the plaintiff's rights, but such a violation as is, or will be, attended with actual or serious damage. Even although the injury may be such that an action at law would lie for damages, it does not follow that a court of equity would deem it proper to interpose by the summary, peculiar, and extraordinary remedy of injunction."

To warrant the issuance of an injunction to restrain an obstruction or encroachment on a public street or highway, the obstruction or encroachment must not only be clearly illegal, must also be of such a character as to materially and substantially interrupt or impede the public use of the same as a street or highway. Gray v. Baynard (1883) 5 Del. Ch. 499; Philadelphia's Appeal (1875) 78 Pa. 33.

In Janesville v. Carpenter (1890) 77 Wis. 288, 8 L.R.A. 808, 20 Am. St. Rep. 123, 46 N. W. 128, it was held that a complaint for an injunction to enjoin the erection of a building over a river did not state a cause of action which alleged merely that the building would cause the water to set back on complainant's premises "to some extent."

The rule that mere depreciation in the value of adjoining property because of the alleged threatened nuisance is not of itself sufficient to justify an injunction is illustrated by the following cases:

Eq. 338, 40 L. J. Ch. N. S. 294, 24 L. T. N. S. 263, 19 Week. Rep. 346.

That a planing and sawmill on a lot adjacent to a boarding house will injure the prestige of the house, making it less desirable for the better class of boarders, and thus lessen profits, is not a ground for restraining its erection and operation. Duncan v. Hayes (1871) 22 N. J. Eq. 25.

And that a valuable residence property will be greatly depreciated by the establishment of a school on an adjoining lot is not a ground for restraining the establishment of the school as a nuisance. Harrison v. Good (Eng.) supra.

So, the fact that the value of complainant's residence will be lessened by a barn about 10 feet from it which the defendant is erecting will not, of itself, be sufficient to enjoin the erection of the barn. Curtis v. Winslow (Vt.) supra.

That a proposed building will obstruct the view from the highway of a sign maintained by the complainant to advertise his business will not warrant an injunction against the proposed erection. Butt v. Imperial Gas Co. (1866) L. R. 2 Ch. (Eng.) 158, 16 L. T. N. S. 820, 15 Week. Rep. 92.

That the proposed structure will increase the risk to the complainant from fire, and consequently raise his insurance rates, will not warrant a granting of an injunction. Siskiyou Lumber & Mercantile Co. v. Rostel (Cal.) supra; Duncan v. Hayes (N. J.) and Rhodes v. Dunbar (Pa.) supra; Chambers v. Cramer (1901) 49 W. Va. 395, 54 L.R.A. 545, 38 S. E. 691; McBean v. Wyllie (1902) 14 Manitoba L. R. 135.

Mere apprehension of danger from fire was held in Rhodes v. Dunbar (Pa.) supra, not sufficient reason for enjoining the building of a planing mill, even though a former building of the same kind in the same place had been destroyed by fire.

1. In general.

There are expressions in many of the cases to the effect that an injunction will not be granted to restrain a threatened nuisance unless the act or thing which it is sought to restrain will constitute a nuisance per se. St. Louis v. Knapp, S. & Co. (1881) 2 McCrary, 516, 6 Fed. 221, reversed on other grounds in (1882) 104 U. S. 658, 26 L. ed. 883; Cooper v. Whissen (1910) 95 Ark. 545, 130 S. W. 703; Matts v. Fiddler (1902) 24 Ky. L. Rep. 722, 69 N. W. 953; King v. Hamill (1903) 97 Md. 103, 54 Atl. 625; Sherman v. Livingston (1910) 128 N. Y. Supp. 581. However, it is frequently not clear as to just what meaning the court attaches to the expression "nuisance per se." The general rule appears to be that stated in Flood v. Consumers Co. (1903) 105 Ill. App. 559, that ordinarily an injunction will be granted where the act or thing threatened is a nuisance per se, or necessarily will become a nuisance.

And in Bowen v. Mauzy (1889) 117 Ind. 258, 19 N. E. 526, the court said that in a proper case an injunction will lie to prevent the use of property for a business which is a nuisance per se, and even a business not a nuisance per se, if threatened and intended to be conducted in an improper manner, so as to constitute a nuisance.

It was said also in Sutton v. Findlay Cemetery Asso. (1915) 270 Ill. 11, L.R.A.1916B, 1135, 110 N. E. 315, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 559, in holding that an injunction should be granted to restrain the under-drainage of a cemetery into a stream flowing through the complainant's premises, where the evidence left no substantial doubt that injurious contamination would result: "Defendant insists that as a cemetery is not a nuisance per se, but may or may not be a nuisance, according to circumstances, its character as such should have been first established by a judgment in an action at law, before a court of equity would interfere by injunction to restrain or abate it. That this was formerly the rule is undoubtedly true; but that rule has, in more modern times, not been strictly adhered to. In cases where, although the thing sought to be restrained is not a nuisance per se, the right to that relief is so clear as to be free from substantial doubt, the relief will be granted without first resorting to an action at law to declare the thing a nuisance."

So, in Seigle v. Bromley (1912) 22 Colo. App. 189, 124 Pac. 191, an action to enjoin the establishment of a hog ranch near the plaintiff's dwelling, where the evidence showed that the defendant contemplated the feeding of garbage, offal, and dead animals, the court said that the question whether a place so operated was a nuisance per se was not involved, as the trial court had judicially determined that a business so conducted would be such a nuisance as should be enjoined.

2. Erection of structures not nuisances per se.

The rule that equity will not interfere in advance of the creation of a nuisance where the apprehended injury is doubtful or contingent is especially applicable where the anticipated injury arises from the use to which a proposed structure is to be put, and not from the structure itself. In such cases, if the structure itself will not be a nuisance, and is of such a nature that it may be put to a lawful use which would not constitute a nuisance, the courts have generally declined to interfere with its erection on the ground that the contemplated use will necessarily be a nuisance.

New Jersey.—Duncan v. Hayes (1871) 22 N. J. Eq. 25.

North Carolina.—Cherry v. Williams (1908) 147 N. C. 452, 125 Am. St. Rep. 566, 61 S. E. 267, 15 Ann. Cas. 715.

Pennsylvania.—Czarniecki v. Bowlman (1887) 9 Sadler, 32, 11 Atl. 660.

In Czarniecki v. Bowlman (Pa.) supra, the court, while holding that the business of boiling bones and carcasses of horses and other animals in a thickly settled neighborhood would be enjoined, held that the erection of buildings in which the complainant claimed such business was to be conducted would not be enjoined, as the buildings themselves were not a nuisance.

And in Cherry v. Williams (N. C.) supra, a suit to enjoin the construction of a tuberculosis sanatorium in a thickly populated residence section of a city, the court, while holding that all use of the building for the purposes indicated should be restrained until the final hearing of the case, stated that the restraining order might be so modified, if the defendant desired, as to permit him to proceed with the construction of the building at his own risk.

The erection of a building not in itself a nuisance, it was held in De Pierris v. Mattern (N. Y.) supra, would not be enjoined on allegations by the complainant, on information and belief, that the business to be carried on by the defendant in the structure when completed was that of building and repairing wagons and operating a blacksmith and paint shop. The court said that the possibility or probability that the property might be used when the building was completed in a manner detrimental to the complainant's rights was no ground for granting an injunction in the first instance, the building itself not being a nuisance.

And in Siegel v. Wayne Circuit Court (Mich.) supra, the court, in holding that an injunction should not be granted to restrain the erection of an automobile garage in a locality which was changing from a residential to a business section, stated that it was obvious that the erection of a building which could be used for lawful purposes not affecting the complainants' rights ought not to be enjoined because of the possibility that after completion it might be used in such a way as to constitute a nuisance.

The doctrine that an injunction will not lie to prevent the erection of a structure which is not, in itself, a nuisance, on the ground that its contemplated use will render it a nuisance, is supported by the case of Deweese v. Hutton (Ind.) supra. And the court intimated that even though the structure could not be put to any other use than such as would render it a nuisance, its erection would not be enjoined if the building itself would not be a nuisance. In this case an injunction was denied which was sought by the owner of a lot adjacent to a railway right of way, to enjoin the railway company from building on its right of way a coal chute which it was alleged would interfere with the owner's rights in the enjoyment of his property. The court said that no issue was made as to the uses to which the structure might be put, other than coaling purposes, and it had no means of knowing that the company could not use it for other and legitimate purposes; but that it did not decide that an injunction should be granted to prevent the erection of a building, not of itself a nuisance, though the owner could make no other use of the building than that which would constitute a nuisance; but that, on the contrary, it was impressed with a view that a structure not in itself a nuisance might be erected without interference from the courts, if the owner would invest with the chance of a denial of his right to conduct within it a particular business which might be declared a nuisance, or the further chance that he might not find a use for it which would not prove a nuisance.

It was said in Quitman v. Underwood (1918) 148 Ga. 152, 96 S. E. 178, that generally equity will not enjoin the construction of a building not in itself a nuisance, but the person erecting the building will proceed at his peril, the whole subject being one for the jury on the trial.

So, in Duncan v. Hayes (1871) 22 N. J. Eq. 25, the court said that where the building the erection of which it is sought to restrain is itself not a nuisance, the erection will generally not be enjoined, but the defendants will be permitted to continue it at the risk of not being permitted to use it so as to cause a nuisance.

On the other hand, in Cleveland v. Citizens Gaslight Co. (1869) 20 N. J. Eq. 201, the court stated that it was usual and proper, where a building or works are being erected that can only be used for a purpose that is unlawful, to restrain the erection; that the works, if erected, might tempt the owner to use them, and that it seemed like trifling to permit one to continue with a building which he could never be permitted to use.

And a court of equity will interfere if a work is in progress which, though not a nuisance in itself, "must manifestly" end in operations which, when carried into effect, will present that species of nuisance in respect to which the court would give relief. Haines v. Taylor (1846) 10 Beav. 75, 50 Eng. Reprint, 511.

So, in Silliman v. Hudson River Bridge Co. (1877) 4 Blatchf. 74, Fed. Cas. No. 12,851, in granting a preliminary injunction to restrain the erection of a bridge, sought on the ground that the bridge would constitute an obstruction to navigation, the court stated that the work contemplated should be promptly enjoined, if there was any reasonable ground for believing that it might finally be held an obstruction, and hence subject to abatement, as the expense and loss to the defendants might otherwise be ruinous; that a refusal to grant the injunction was an encouragement to continue with the work, and might greatly embarrass the determination on the final hearing.

Equity should not stay the completion of a building externally finished where it is not clear that its use will be a nuisance, and all the injury that the complainant would suffer from its erection would be sustained in its existing condition, while to grant the injunction would result in injury to the defendant. Harrison v. Newton (1851) N. Y. Code Rep. N. S. 207.

f. Pleadings.

The complaint in a suit to restrain an alleged threatened nuisance which is not a nuisance per se must state such facts as will enable the court to determine whether the apprehension of irreparable injury is well founded; general allegations that such injury will result are insufficient; facts, and not opinions or conclusions, must be stated.

"The bill must set forth such a state of facts as leaves no room for doubt upon the question of nuisance, for if there is any doubt upon that point the benefit will be given to the defendant."

Garnett v. Jacksonville, St. A. & H. R. Co. (1884) 20 Fla. 389.

The petition must allege such facts as show "with cogency, clearness, and reasonable certainty that the act threatened, if done, will bring into existence a nuisance, and that the complainant will suffer irreparable injury thereby." Elliott v. Ferguson (Tex.) supra.

It was held in St. Louis v. Knapp, S. & Co. Co. (1882) 104 U. S. 658, 26 L. ed. 883, reversing (1881) 2 McCrary, 516, 6 Fed. 221, that allegations in a complaint for an injunction against the driving of piles and constructing of runways in a navigable river, that the proposed construction would cause a diversion of the river from its natural course, and create in front of the complainant's wharf a deposit of mud and sediment, rendering it impossible for vessels to approach the wharf, was a sufficiently certain statement of the essential facts as against a demurrer, and was not a mere expression of an opinion or apprehension on the part of complainant.

To justify the granting of an injunction against the laying of street railway tracks in a street, at the instance of a lot owner, on the ground of special damage, facts must be set forth to show how and to what extent there will be injury, a general allegation merely that the railroad will injure the lot being insufficient. Coast Line R. Co. v. Cohen (1873) 50 Ga. 451.

a. Amusements.

The application of the rule that a court of equity may grant an injunction to restrain a nuisance which must inevitably result from acts threatened or in progress is illustrated by the following cases involving amusements of various kinds: Weis v. Superior Ct. (1916) 30 Cal. App. 730, 159 Pac. 464 (indecent exposure exhibition); St. John v. North Utica (1910) 157 Ill. App. 504 (carnival and street fair); Com. ex rel. Pratt v. McGovern (1903) 116 Ky. 212, 66 L.R.A. 280, 75 S. W. 261 (prize fight); HAMILTON CORP. v. JULIAN (reported herewith) ante, 746 (bowling alley and motion picture theater); Altschul v. Ludwig (1916) 216 N. Y. 459, 111 N. E. 216 (theater violating building code); Phillips v. Thomas (1890) 62 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 793 (public fair or exhibition).

But it was held in Pfingst v. Senn (1893) 94 Ky. 556, 21 L.R.A. 569, 23 S. W. 358, that an injunction would not be granted to restrain the prospective use of premises as an open-air pleasure resort and beer garden, as a nuisance, since such use of the place would not necessarily constitute a nuisance, although it had been a nuisance as conducted by other parties.

And it was held in Alexander v. Tebeau (1903) 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1805, 71 S. W. 427, that the court would not enjoin the opening of a baseball park on land adjoining the complainant's dwelling, on the ground that the park would be so operated as to constitute a nuisance.

In a suit by a private citizen to enjoin a prize fight as a nuisance, evidence merely that he lives on the same street and within a square of the building in which the prize fight is to be held is insufficient to warrant the granting of the injunction on the ground of special injury. Louisville Athletic Club v. Nolan (1909) 134 Ky. 220, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1019, 119 S. W. 800.

b. Blacksmith shops.

The application of the rule that a court of equity will not interfere where the threatened nuisance is not inevitable, but only contingent, depending on the manner of operation, use, or other future circumstances, is illustrated by the following cases involving blacksmith shops: Ray v. Lynes (1846) 10 Ala. 63; Bowen v. Mauzy (1889) 117 Ind. 258, 19 N. E. 526; Marrs v. Fiddler (1902) 24 Ky. L. Rep. 722, 69 S. W. 953; Rogers v. Danforth (1853) 9 N. J. Eq. 289; Butler v. Rogers (1853) 9 N. J. Eq. 487; Chambers v. Cramer (1901) 49 W. Va. 395, 54 L.R.A. 545, 38 S. E. 691.

It was held in Marrs v. Fiddler (1902) 24 Ky. L. Rep. 722, 69 S. W. 953, that, since a blacksmith shop was not a nuisance per se, its erection near the residence of complainant would not be enjoined. The court said it had never, so far as it knew, been held that a blacksmith shop was a nuisance per se, and that, unless it could so hold, it was well settled that a court of equity would not enjoin its erection.

In Bowen v. Mauzy (1889) 117 Ind. 258, 19 N. E. 526, an action to enjoin the establishment of a blacksmith shop on a lot adjoining that of the complainant, and 28 feet from the residence of the complainant, it was held that the complaint was subject to demurrer, which alleged merely the proximity of the proposed shop to the plaintiff's residence, that its erection and maintenance would destroy the free use of his property and interfere with its comfortable enjoyment, that the gases and smoke from the forges would be offensive and injurious, as would also the noise, boisterous language, and filth, but which contained no allegations as to the manner in which the proposed shop was to be constructed, or that the business could not be conducted in such a way as not to be detrimental to the complainant, or that the defendant was threatening or intending to conduct the business in an improper way. The court regarded the allegations as to injury as mere conclusions, not admitted by the demurrer; and stated that in order to restrain one from beginning the operation of a business in itself legitimate, it should be made to appear that the person about to enter into the business threatened and intended to conduct it in a manner that would constitute a nuisance. It was said also that the business of blacksmithing was a lawful business, and not in itself a nuisance, but became so only when conducted in an improper way; and that the presumptions were that one entering into it would conduct the business in a proper way, so that it would not constitute a nuisance or injure and annoy adjoining property owners.

That a blacksmith shop may be so inartificially or carelessly constructed as to be peculiarly liable to take fire, and thus unnecessarily endanger surrounding buildings, will not be assumed, so as to warrant an injunction to prevent its erection. Ray v. Lynes (1846) 10 Ala. 63.

But in a suit to enjoin the erection of a blacksmith shop within 75 feet of the complainant's residence, the trial court in Whitaker v. Hudson (1880) 65 Ga. 43, granted an injunction restraining the erection of the shop until the final hearing on the merits. It was held that this ruling would not be reversed on appeal, the court saying that while a blacksmith shop was not a nuisance per se, yet there might be circumstances in which it could be shown that it was in fact a nuisance; that the granting of the injunction showed that the evidence in the opinion of the trial court preponderated in favor of the complainant; but that, had the injunction been refused, the judgment would not have been reversed.

c. Cemeteries.

The following cases involving cemeteries illustrate applications of the rule that a court of equity may grant an injunction to restrain a nuisance which must inevitably result from acts threatened or in progress:

Alabama.—Bellevue Cemetery Co. v. McEvers (1910) 168 Ala. 535, 53 So. 272.

Wisconsin.—Pfleger v. Groth (1899) 103 Wis. 104, 79 N. W. 19 (case controlled by statute).

On the other hand, the rule that a court of equity will not interfere where the threatened nuisance is not inevitable, but only contingent, depending on the manner of operation, use, or other future circumstances, has been applied in a number of cases involving cemeteries, of which the following are illustrative:

Alabama.—Kingsbury v. Flowers (1880) 65 Ala. 479, 39 Am. Rep. 14 (private cemetery).

Under the rule above indicated, an injunction was denied, in Begein v. Anderson (1867) 28 Ind. 79, where a municipality sought to restrain the establishment of a cemetery one fourth of a mile outside the city limits.

In a suit to enjoin the establishment of a cemetery, it was held in Clinton Cemetery Asso. v. McAttee (1910) 27

Okla. 160, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 945, 111 Pac. 392, that a complaint was subject to demurrer which alleged that the 30 acres of land upon which it was proposed to establish the cemetery was on the opposite side of a highway from the complainant's residence, that the cemetery grounds were more elevated and drained toward the residence, cistern, and well of complainant, and that unless the defendants were restrained they would proceed to complete the laying out and establishment of the cemetery. The court quoted authority to the effect that to authorize an injunction where the thing sought to be enjoined is not a nuisance per se, there must be clear and convincing proof of probable injury; in other words, it must clearly appear with reasonable certainty that the anticipated injuries will probably occur. And apparently the court regarded the petition as insufficient, in that it failed to show with this degree of certainty that injury would occur to the complainant from the establishment of the cemetery.

And in Kingsbury v. Flowers (1880) 65 Ala. 479, 39 Am. Rep. 14, an injunction was denied to restrain future interment in a private cemetery on the ground that special circumstances were not averred from which the court could be satisfied that such future burial would most probably result in a nuisance, from which the complainant would suffer special injury irreparable by the ordinary remedies at law. The complaint, which was held subject to demurrer, alleged that the nearest grave was 182 feet from the well on complainant's lot, that the burial ground was more elevated than the lot of complainant, there being a fall of from 4 to 5 feet from the surface of the graves to the surface of the well; but it was not averred that there had been any injury to the complainant from the former burials.

To warrant the granting of an injunction to restrain the establishment of a cemetery near the complainant's house, it is not sufficient to allege in general terms probable injury to the health of the plaintiff or his family by the pollution of the air and water, or other injuries; but facts must be stated from which the court can clearly see that such injuries will most probably result. Clinton Cemetery Asso. v. McAttee (Okla.) supra.

Allegations in a complaint in a suit to restrain the establishment of a cemetery that "noisome odors and vapors would arise and pollute and fill with stench and poison the air surrounding" complainants' homes are mere conclusions, and insufficient to show a nuisance, in the absence of an allegation as to the contemplated mode of sepulture. Elliott v. Ferguson (1904) 37 Tex. Civ. App. 40, 83 S. W. 56.

In a suit to restrain the establishment of a cemetery, an allegation in the petition that the cemetery land is higher than the land of the complainant, and descends toward the same, is insufficient, without a further allegation by which it will appear that the complainant's lands are in such close proximity to the cemetery as to make it reasonably certain that injury will accrue to them by reason of the alleged threatened nuisance. Ibid.

And the mere fact that property is rendered less valuable by the proposed establishment of a cemetery near it is not a ground for an injunction to restrain the establishment of the cemetery. Dunn v. Austin (1889) 77 Tex. 139, 11 S. W. 1125; Elliott v. Ferguson (Tex.) supra.

The erection within a few feet of a dwelling house of a mausoleum for the burial of the dead, it was held in Rea v. Tacoma Mausoleum Asso. (1918) 103 Wash. 429, 1 A.L.R. 541, 174 Pac. 961, cannot be enjoined as a nuisance, although its presence will cause the inmates of the dwelling unpleasant thoughts and seriously affect the value of the property, if there will be no fumes or drainage to affect the physical senses or health of those in the neighborhood.

But in Bellevue Cemetery Co. v. McEvers (1910) 168 Ala. 535, 53 So. 272, it was held that a complaint to enjoin the establishment of a cemetery was not subject to demurrer, where it alleged that the land proposed for a cemetery adjoined the residence of the complainant, that it was higher than complainant's land, that a great part of it was of a boggy, swampy, and quagmire nature, that complainant's land was of a porous and gravelly nature, that subterranean streams flowed through the proposed cemetery lands into the well of complainant, and that the burial of bodies on such land, for these reasons, would pollute the subterranean stream flowing into complainant's well, and render it unfit for use.

And to warrant the granting of an injunction to restrain the use of land for a cemetery, it is not necessary for the complainant to show to a moral certainty that contamination would necessarily follow from the use of the land as a cemetery; it is sufficient if he shows a reasonable probability thereof. Nelson v. Swedish E. Lutheran Cemetery Asso. (1911) 111 Minn. 149, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 565, 126 N. W. 723, 127 N. W. 626, 20 Ann. Cas. 790.

The establishment of a cemetery will be enjoined where the evidence is clear that the proposed interment of dead bodies therein would probably result in contaminating the water of complainant's well and those of others in the vicinity, with disease germs, and thus endanger the health and lives of complainants and their families. Lowe v. Prospect Hill Cemetery Asso. (1899) 58 Neb. 94, 46 L.R.A. 237, 78 N. W. 488.

Conceding that the evidence left it doubtful whether a proposed cemetery would constitute a nuisance, the court in Palmer v. Hickory Grove Cemetery (1903) 34 App. Div. 600, 82 N. Y. Supp. 973, later appeal in (1905) 106 App. Div. 618, 95 N. Y. Supp. 1150, held that nevertheless, in an action to enjoin its establishment, the complainants were entitled, in view of the injury they would receive from the depreciation of their property, to inquire into the sufficiency of the cemetery corporation's compliance with the Membership Corporation Law, under which it claimed the right to work the injury apprehended.

Under a statute prohibiting the establishment of a cemetery nearer than 200 yards from a dwelling house, without the consent of the owner, it was held in Henry v. Parry Twp. (1891) 48 Ohio St. 671, 30 N. E. 1122, that an owner of a dwelling house within the limits prescribed might enjoin the establishment of a cemetery in violation of the statute.

The rule that a court of equity will not interfere where the threatened nuisance is not inevitable, but only contingent, depending on the manner of operation, use, or other future circumstances, is illustrated by its application in the following cases involving cotton gins: Rouse v. Martin (1883) 75 Ala. 510, 51 Am. Rep. 463; Swaim v. Morris (1910) 98 Ark. 362, 125 S. W. 432, 20 Ann. Cas. 930; Dorsey v. Allen (1881) 85 N. C. 358, 39 Am. Rep. 704; Robinson v. Dale (1910) 62 Tex. Civ. App. 277, 131 S. W. 308; Moore v. Coleman (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 196 S. W. 212 (rule recognized, but injunction granted); Strieber v. Ward (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 196 S. W. 720.

In a suit to restrain the erection of a cotton gin, the court in Moore v. Coleman (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 196 S. W. 212, stated that in cases of this nature an injunction should not issue unless it is shown that the evils anticipated from the construction and operation of the gin are imminent and certain to occur; and that it is not sufficient that they may probably occur. The injunction, however, was granted in this case, there being evidence which the court said was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the construction and operation of the gin would certainly result in at least some of the evils complained of, so as to constitute a nuisance.

An injunction to prevent the erection of a cotton gin was denied in Strieber v. Ward (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 196 S. W. 720, where it appeared that the proposed location was in a mill and factory district in which there were only three residences about 200 feet therefrom, belonging to the complainants, and the proposed gin was of the most modern and improved pattern, with appliances for minimizing dust and noise.

So, in Robinson v. Dale (1910) 62

Tex. Civ. App. 277, 131 S. W. 308, it was held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain a judgment enjoining the erection of a cotton gin 72 feet from the residence of one of the complainants, and at distances varying from 125 to 318 feet from the residences of the other complainants, where the proposed gin contained features designed to minimize, if not entirely obviate, vibration and the escape of smoke, dust, lint, etc.

e. Dams, diversion of watercourses.

The application of the rule that a court of equity may grant an injunction to restrain a nuisance which must inevitably result from acts threatened or in progress in cases involving dams is illustrated by the following authorities:

Alabama. — Rosser v. Randolph (1838) 7 Port. 238, 31 Am. Dec. 712.

Georgia. — Norwood v. Dickey (1855) 18 Ga. 528; De Vaughn v. Minor (1886) 77 Ga. 809, 1 S. E. 433.

Maryland. — Lamborn v. Covington Co. (1848) 2 Md. Ch. 409.

Mississippi. — Whitfield v. Rogers (1853) 26 Miss. 84, 59 Am. Dec. 244.

New Jersey. — Quackenbush v. Van Riper (1835) 3 N. J. Eq. 350, 29 Am. Dec. 716.

North Carolina. — Atty. Gen. v. Blount (1826) 11 N. C. (4 Hawks) 334, 15 Am. Dec. 526.

Tennessee. — Philips v. Stocket (1806) 1 Overt. 200.

Wisconsin. — Wisconsin River Improv. Co. v. Lyons (1872) 30 Wis. 61; Potter v. Menasha (1872) 30 Wis. 492.

On the other hand, the rule that a court of equity will not interfere where the threatened nuisance is not inevitable, but only contingent, depending on the manner of operation, use, or other future circumstances, has been applied in a number of cases involving dams:

United States. — Spooner v. McConnell (1838) 1 McLean, 337, Fed. Cas. No. 13,245; Woodman v. Kilbourn Mfg.

Co. (1867) 1 Biss. 546, Fed. Cas. No. 17,978.

Alabama.—Ogletree v. McQuaggs (1880) 67 Ala. 580, 42 Am. Rep. 112.

Maryland.—Warren Mfg. Co. v. Baltimore (1913) 119 Md. 188, 86 Atl. 502.

Missouri.—Welton v. Martin (1842) 7 Mo. 307.

New Jersey.—McNeal v. Assiscunk Creek Meadow Co. (1883) 37 N. J. Eq. 204.

North Carolina.—Frizzle v. Patrick (1863) 59 N. C. (6 Jones, Eq.) 354.

Oregon.—Esson v. Wattier (1893) 25 Or. 7, 34 Pac. 756; Blair v. Boswell (1900) 37 Or. 168, 61 Pac. 341.

Virginia.—Talley v. Tyree (1843) 2 Rob. 500.

Wisconsin.—State v. Eau Claire (1876) 40 Wis. 533.

The construction of a dam and sluiceway across a creek, for the purpose of securing land against overflow from tides, under legislative sanction, will not be enjoined where the evidence leaves a doubt whether such construction will increase the danger to the health of those living in the community. McNeal v. Assiscunk Creek Meadow Co. (1883) 37 N. J. Eq. 204.

It was held in Vanwinkle v. Curtis (1836) 3 N. J. Eq. 422, that an injunction would not lie to restrain the diversion of part of the water of a stream which ran through a corner of the complainant's farm, a quarter of a mile from his dwelling, where it appeared that the stream flowed through low, marshy, swampy ground, and had never been applied to any practical use, since there was not such great, immediate, or permanent injury threatened as would authorize the remedy by injunction.

The courts have refused to enjoin the construction of a dam in a navigable river, authorized by the legislature, on the ground that the dam could not be so built but that it would obstruct navigation. Woodman v. Kilbourn Mfg. Co. (1867) 1 Biss. 546, Fed. Cas. No. 17,978; State v. Eau Claire (1876) 40 Wis. 533.

f. Garages and automobile supply stations.

The following cases illustrate the rule that a court of equity will not interfere where the threatened nuisance is not inevitable, but only contingent, depending on the manner of operation, use, or other future circumstances, as applied to public garages and automobile supply stations: Siegel v. Wayne Circuit Judge (1909) 155 Mich. 459, 119 N. W. 645; Bourgeois v. Miller (1918) — N. J. Eq. —, 104 Atl. 383; Sherman v. Livingston (1910) 128 N. Y. Supp. 581; Hanes v. Carolina Cadillac Co. (1918) 176 N. C. 350, 97 S. E. 162 (auto supply station).

It was held in Sherman v. Livingston (1910) 128 N. Y. Supp. 581, that the establishment of a public automobile garage on the opposite side of the street from complainant's residence, and about 70 feet therefrom, would not be enjoined, where it appeared that the residence was a brick, slate-roofed building, that the garage was a substantial fireproof structure of brick and concrete, and it did not appear that the defendant proposed to store gasoline in quantities,—especially where the evidence failed to establish the alleged strictly residential character of the district.

And it was held in Siegel v. Wayne Circuit Judge (Mich.) supra, that adjacent property owners were not entitled to an injunction to restrain the erection of an automobile garage, where the lot on which it was proposed to erect the garage was subject to no restrictions as to its use, and the locality was one which was changing from a strictly residential to a business section.

The establishment of a public supply station for automobiles in a residential section, it was held in Hanes v. Carolina Cadillac Co. (N. C.) supra, will not be enjoined, since such a business is not a nuisance per se, and equity will not interfere if the injury apprehended is merely eventual or contingent. In this instance, however, the defendant's storage of gasoline was limited by the court to 1,500 gallons at one time.

And in Bourgeois v. Miller (1918) — N. J. Eq. —, 104 Atl. 383, it was held that an injunction would not be granted to restrain the erection of a public garage in a residential and closely built up section of a city, within 20 feet of the hotel of one of the complainants and within 68 feet of a hotel owned by another complainant, although the building was capable of holding from 70 to 100 automobiles, and was equipped with two 500-gallon gasoline tanks, the court taking the position that the probability of a nuisance because of noise, odors, and fumes was not shown with sufficient certainty to justify an injunction, and that the same was true with reference to danger from an explosion under the present improved methods in the storage and handling of gasoline.

But the establishment of a public automobile garage in an exclusively residential section of a city, near large churches and schools, was enjoined in Prendergast v. Walls (1917) 257 Pa. 547, 101 Atl. 826, the court finding that the noises, odors, and other disagreeable features of the garage would seriously interfere with the enjoyment of the complainant's residences, would endanger the safety of children attending the schools, interfere with services in the churches, and increase danger of fire because of the storage of gasoline.

And it was held in Wright v. Lyons (1916) 224 Mass. 167, 112 N. E. 876, that a petition to restrain the erection of a public garage on premises adjoining those of the complainant in a city was not subject to demurrer, where it was alleged that the defendant had filed a petition for a permit to erect the garage, and for a license to keep and sell 500 gallons of gasoline in an underground tank on his premises, and that a nuisance would result because of the noise, confusion, and distasteful odors and the storage of the gasoline.

And where the defendant was proceeding to erect a private garage within 9 feet of the complainant's dwelling, when his permit from the city authorities provided that a garage must not be erected within 20 feet of a residence, it was held that the trial court had not abused its discretion in granting a temporary injunction to restrain the construction of the garage until

The rule that a court of equity will not interfere where the threatened nuisance is not inevitable, but only contingent, depending on the manner of operation, use, or other future circumstances, as applied to nuisances relating to gas and oil wells and gas works, is illustrated by the following cases: Windfall Mfg. Co. v. Patterson (1896) 148 Ind. 414, 37 L.R.A. 381, 62 Am. St. Rep. 532, 47 N. E. 2, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 674 (gas well); Cleveland v. Citizens Gaslight Co. (1869) 20 N. J. Eq. 201 (gas works); Smith v. Bellows (1910) 20 Pa. Dist. R. 383 (oil well near refinery); Pope Bros. v. Bridgewater Gas Co. (1902) 52 W. Va. 252, 43 S. E. 87 (oil well); Haines v. Taylor (1846) 10 Beav. 75, 50 Eng. Reprint, 511 (gas works).

It has been held that an injunction will not issue to prevent the drilling of a gas well 152 feet from a dwelling, on account of the noise, stench, pollution of the air, and danger from fire and explosions, or of overflow of water or oil from the well, where it is not shown that a gas well could not be so managed and maintained in that proximity to a dwelling house as to render it of not more than slight, or barely possible, danger or annoyance to those living in the house. Windfall Mfg. Co. v. Patterson (Ind.) supra.

And the construction of gas works in a residential section, the gas tank being 180 feet from the complainants' houses, and the other manufacturing works being from 300 to 400 feet from such houses, it was held in Cleveland v. Citizens Gaslight Co. (1869) 20 N. J. Eq. 201, would not be enjoined, except the use of the lime process in purifying the gas, which the court was convinced would be a nuisance. However, the court expressed great doubt as to whether the proposed process of purifying the gas by oxid of iron, and the proposed means of obviating offensive gases and smoke, would be efficient to prevent a nuisance. The defendants were permitted to continue the erection of the buildings at their own risk, being enjoined only from using the lime process, as above indicated, and from manufacturing gas in any way that would produce any annoyance to persons dwelling in complainants' houses by smoke, gases, other effluvia or odors.

The mere possibility that it might become necessary to open a completed gas well, for the purpose of making repairs, before a gas well on adjoining premises could be completed, and that a conflagration would result if the opening was made while the boiler used in drilling, and located 77 feet from the completed well, was in operation, was held in Pope Bros. v. Bridge-water Gas Co. (1902) 52 W. Va. 252, 43 S. E. 87, insufficient to warrant the granting of an injunction to restrain the operation of the boiler in that proximity to the completed well, where it was not shown that there had ever been a refusal, or intention to refuse, to put out the fire at any time that it might become necessary to open the completed well.

But the drilling of an oil and gas well within 100 feet of the complainant's residence, and within 25 feet of his barn, was enjoined in Cline v. Kirkbride (1901) 12 Ohio C. D. 517, on the ground that such a well, because of its close proximity to the plaintiff's premises, would be a nuisance. And the court said that the fact that an ordinance prohibited the drilling of gas or oil wells within 200 feet of a dwelling furnished an additional reason for granting the injunction.

And the prospective storage of 20,000 gallons of gasoline by a laundry company in underground tanks within 11 feet of complainant's residence, in a purely residential district of a city, it was held in Whittemore v. Baxter Laundry Co. (1914) 181 Mich. 564, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 930, 148 N. W. 437, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 818, would be enjoined, although every precaution had been used in the construction of the tanks.

It was held in Hendrickson v. Standard Oil Co. (1915) 126 Md. 577, 95 Atl. 153, that a cause of action for preventive relief was stated by allegations in a complaint that the defendant had recently purchased land adjacent to that of the plaintiff, who was informed and believed that the defendant intended to construct in immediate proximity to the plaintiff's houses a tank in which would be stored vast quantities of highly inflammable and explosive oils, whereby the value of the plaintiff's property would be destroyed.

h. Hospitals and pesthouses.

The rule that a court of equity may grant an injunction to restrain a nuisance which must inevitably result from acts threatened or in progress is illustrated by its application in the following cases involving hospitals and pesthouses: Stotler v. Rochelle (1910) 83 Kan. 86, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 49, 109 Pac. 788 (cancer hospital); Baltimore v. Fairfield Improv. Co. (1898) 87 Md. 352, 40 L.R.A. 494, 67 Am. St. Rep. 344, 39 Atl. 1081 (pesthouse for leprosy); Barth v. Christian Psychopathic Hospital Asso. (1917) 196 Mich. 642, 163 N. W. 62 (insane hospital); Gilford v. Babies' Hospital (1888) 21 Abb. N. C. 159, 1 N. Y. Supp. 448; Cherry v. Williams (1808) 147 N. C. 452, 61 S. E. 267, 125 Am. St. Rep. 566, 15 Ann. Cas. 715 (tuberculosis sanatorium); Youngstown v. Youngstown (1903) 25 Ohio C. C. 518 (pesthouse).

On the other hand, the rule that a court of equity will not interfere where the threatened nuisance is not inevitable, but only contingent, depending on the manner of operation, use, or other future circumstances, has been applied in a number of cases involving hospitals. Le Bourgeois v. New Orleans (1919) 145 La. —, 82 So. 268 (tuberculosis hospital); Board of Health v. North American Home (1910) 77 N. J. Eq. 464, 78 Atl. 677 (same); Northfield v. Atlantic County (1915) 85 N. J. Eq. 47, 85 Atl. 745 (same); Heaton v. Packer (1909) 131 App. Div. 812, 116 N. Y. Supp. 46 (insane hospital); State ex rel. Woolery v. Brenner (1916) 6 Ohio App. 209, affirmed in (1917) 96 Ohio St. 598, 118 N. E. 1087 (tuberculosis hospital); Baines v. Baker (1752) 1 Amb. 158, 27 Eng. Reprint, 105 (smallpox hospital); Anonymous (1752) 3 Atk. 750, 26 Eng. Reprint, 1230 (building for smallpox inoculation); Atty. Gen. v. Manchester [1893] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 87, 62 L. J. Ch. N. S. 459, 3 Reports, 427, 68 L. T. N. S. 608, 41 Week. Rep. 459, 57 J. P. 343.

The establishment of a hospital for the care of infants, including any who might develop, after admission, contagious disease, was enjoined in Gilford v. Babies' Hospital (1898) 21 Abb. N. C. 159, 1 N. Y. Supp. 448, at the instance of the owner of an adjoining dwelling, where the locality was one wholly devoted to private residences, and there appeared reasonable probability of the spread of contagious disease.

And the erection of an additional building for a pesthouse 50 feet from a highway, on the opposite side of which was a public school, was enjoined in Youngstown v. Youngstown (1903) 25 Ohio C. C. 518, although the original buildings used for a pesthouse, which were established 300 feet from the highway before the schoolhouse was erected, the court refused to abate as a nuisance.

The erection and maintenance of an insane asylum on land adjoining a city, in a residential district, in "close proximity" to complainants' residences, was held, in Barth v. Christian Psychopathic Hospital Asso. (1917) 196 Mich. 642, 163 N. W. 62, to constitute such a threatened nuisance as would be enjoined.

And the establishment of a cancer hospital in a residence district in a city, within 78 feet of the complainant's dwelling, was enjoined in Stotler v. Rochelle (1910) 83 Kan. 86, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 49, 108 Pac. 788, on the ground that the fear of infection, for which there was reasonable ground under the circumstances, would interfere with the reasonable enjoyment of adjoining property for residential purposes, however carefully the hospital might be conducted.

The placing by a city of a woman afflicted with leprosy in an advanced stage on a 20-acre tract in a residential district near the city, in charge of a laborer and his wife, who were unskilled people, with no authority to restrain their charge from wandering about, and who had several small children in the family, was enjoined in Baltimore v. Fairfield Improv. Co. (1898) 87 Md. 352, 40 L.R.A. 494, 67 Am. St. Rep. 344, 39 Atl. 1081, because of the danger of dissemination of the disease and the consequent serious injury to residents of the neighborhood.

But the erection of a hospital for treatment of pulmonary tuberculosis the court refused to enjoin in Northfield v. Atlantic County (1915) 85 N. J. Eq. 47, 95 Atl. 745, where it appeared that the proposed site was in a sparsely settled municipality, that the hospital grounds extended at least 250 feet in all directions from the building, and that the nearest residence was 900 feet distant from the proposed building.

And the establishment of a tuberculosis hospital 600 feet from complainant's residence, in a sparsely settled residential district of a city, will not be enjoined on the ground that the hospital may be so operated as to constitute a nuisance. Le Bourgeois v. New Orleans (1919) 145 La. —, 82 So. 268.

So, an injunction to restrain the establishment of a temporary smallpox hospital was denied in Atty. Gen. v. Manchester (Eng.) supra, where it appeared that the proposed site was in a sparsely inhabited district, there being only fifteen houses within a half-mile radius, that the nearest house was 256 yards away, that there was no other available site which could be acquired within a reasonable time, and that there was an epidemic of smallpox; although the hospital would be within 200 yards of a frequented highway, and about 90 yards from a much used portion of a cemetery.

A complaint to enjoin the use of buildings under erection for an insane asylum was held subject to demurrer in Heaton v. Packer (1909) 131 App. Div. 812, 116 N. Y. Supp. 46, where it was alleged that the complainants owned and occupied land in a high class residential district, adjoining land on which the defendants were erecting an insane hospital, that the value of complainants' property would be depreciated and the residential character of the neighborhood destroyed, and that various dangerous and disagreeable things would result, among which were that it would be dangerous for women and children to go upon the streets adjacent to the hospital, and that the health of the residents would be impaired.

In Heaton v. Packer (N. Y.) supra, it was contended that the various things which the complaint alleged would happen in case the hospital should be established were admitted by the demurrer. In reply to this, the court said: "The difficulty with applying this rule is that from the nature of the allegations they are not allegations of existing facts, but only allegations of what will transpire in the future. Where allegations of this character are made, it cannot be that the demurrer admits that the things will actually occur as alleged; but it is left open for the court to say whether or not, from the nature of things, they probably and necessarily will happen. In our view the demurrer does not admit that all the disagreeable and dangerous things set forth in plaintiffs' complaint will actually arise. Nor does it appear to us that they will necessarily arise from the use to which the defendants propose to put their property. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiffs have failed to state a cause of action entitling them to an injunction."

1. Mills, factories, and warehouses.

The rule that a court of equity will not interfere where the threatened nuisance is not inevitable, but only contingent, depending on the manner of operation, use, or other future circumstances, is illustrated by its application in the following cases involving mills and factories;

California.—Middleton v. Franklin (1853) 3 Cal. 238 (flour mill under auction sale).

Florida.—Thebaut v. Canova (1866) 11 Fla. 143 (steam mill).

Georgia.—Mygatt v. Goetchins (1856) 20 Ga. 350 (steam sash and blind factory); Cunningham v. Rice (1859) 28 Ga. 80 (flour mill).

Louisiana.—Bell v. Riggs (1886) 38

La. Ann. 555 (steam engine in cistern maker's establishment).

Maryland.—Adams v. Michael (1873) 38 Md. 123, 17 Am. Rep. 516 (felt-roofing factory).

New Jersey.—Wolcott v. Melick (1856) 11 N. J. Eq. 204, 66 Am. Dec. 790 (agricultural implement factory); Duncan v. Hayes (1871) 22 N. J. Eq. 25 (planing and saw mill).

North Carolina.—Barnes v. Calhoun (1842) 37 N. C. (2 Ired. Eq.) 199 (mill); Atty. Gen. v. Lea (1844) 38 N. C. (3 Ired. Eq.) 301 (mill); Wilder v. Strickland (1856) 55 N. C. (2 Jones, Eq.) 386 (mill); Dorsey v. Allen (1881) 85 N. C. 358, 39 Am. Rep. 704 (planing mill and cotton gin); Berger v. Smith (1912) 160 N. C. 205, 75 S. E. 1098 (sawmill).

Pennsylvania.—Rhodes v. Dunbar (1868) 57 Pa. 274, 98 Am. Dec. 221 (planing mill); Carpenter v. Cummings (1856) 2 Phila. 74 (steam boiler).

As regards manufacturing concerns, it has been stated that there must be a very strong case, marked by very peculiar features, to justify a court of equity in interfering by injunction on the ground that the proposed factory will be a nuisance to an adjoining dwelling house. Wolcott v. Melick (1856) 11 N. J. Eq. 204, 66 Am. Dec. 790. In this case the court refused to enjoin the erection of a factory for the making of agricultural implements in a section of the city which was sparsely settled, where the nearest dwelling house was 132 feet from the proposed factory.

In Adams v. Michael (Md.) supra, a suit to enjoin the erection of a factory for the manufacture of felt-roofing in the "immediate vicinity" of the complainant's dwelling, it was held that allegations that, owing to the dirt, odor, smoke, and appurtenances of such factory, together with the inflammable nature of the material used in the manufacture of felt-roofing, the property of the complainant would be utterly destroyed as dwellings, and irreparable injury result, were too indefinite and general to enable the court to determine whether the nuisance would be of the nature and character supposed, so as to warrant the issuance of an injunction.

And in a suit by a paper manufacturer to enjoin the threatened pollution of a stream by alkali works, it was held in Fletcher v. Bealey (1885) L. R. 28 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 688, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 424, 52 L. T. N. S. 541, 33 Week. Rep. 745, that, although pure water was essential to the complainant, and the defendant was depositing on leased land a mile and a half up the stream, higher than the stream and close to it, refuse from the alkali works, and although from this refuse a very noxious liquid would in course of time flow, and, if it entered the stream, would greatly injure the complainant, an injunction would not be granted to restrain the deposit of such refuse, since it did not appear but that the flow of this liquid into the river might be prevented, or that some means of rendering it innocuous might be discovered before any injury resulted.

The erection of a planing and saw mill, to be driven by steam, with chips and shavings of pine boards as fuel, on a lot adjacent to that of the complainant's dwelling and boarding house, it was held in Duncan v. Hayes (N. J.) supra, would not be enjoined, where the chimney of the proposed mill was 50 feet high and 200 feet from the dwelling of complainant, as it was not certain that a nuisance would result from the operation of the mill.

And in Dorsey v. Allen (1881) 85 N. C. 358, 39 Am. Rep. 704, the court refused to enjoin the erection of a planing mill and cotton gin on a lot adjacent to that of complainant's residence, in view of the benefit to the community from the projected enterprise as compared with the detriment which the complainant might sustain.

But in a suit to enjoin the erection of a planing mill, it was held that the complaint was sufficient which alleged that the mill was to be located in a residence portion of the city, within 90 feet of the complainant's dwelling, that its operation would necessarily create a great amount of steam, dust, dirt, smoke, and noise, which would penetrate the complainant's house, making it necessary to keep his windows and doors closed at all times, and rendering his home unfit for habitation. Rogers v. John Week Lumber Co. (1903) 117 Wis. 5, 93 N. W. 821.

And it was held in Ross v. Butler (1868) 19 N. J. Eq. 294, 97 Am. Dec. 654, that an injunction would lie to restrain a threatened nuisance in the operation of a pottery in which pine wood would be burnt, producing large volumes of dense smoke loaded with cinders, which would fall on the dwellings of the complainants located at distances of from 40 to 200 feet from the proposed pottery, even though the smoke would not be emitted more than twelve hours every two weeks, and then mostly at night, and although the locality was in the neighborhood of wharves, coal and lumber yards, and, although thickly settled, was not one in which wealthy and luxurious inhabitants resided, but was occupied by business men and mechanics of moderate means, some of whom used their houses and lots for business purposes.

It was held also in Cunningham v. Rome R. Co. (1859) 27 Ga. 499, that a complaint to enjoin the erection of a flouring mill within 7 or 8 feet of the track stated a cause of action, where it was alleged that the railway company had acquired by purchase a right of way through the land in question, and that the proposed mill would interfere in the repair and construction of the railroad.

An owner of a city lot adjoining a railroad right of way was held in McBean v. Wyllie (1902) 14 Manitoba L. R. 132, not entitled to enjoin the construction of a warehouse on the right of way in front of and about 10 feet from the lot line, although the complainant's view of the river on the other side of the right of way would thereby be obstructed.

J. Powder magazines.

The construction of a powder magazine within half a mile of a borough, in a neighborhood not thickly settled, but rapidly filling with residences, within 95 feet of a turnpike road and 510 feet of a dwelling, was enjoined in Wier's Appeal (1873) 74 Pa. 230.

But in Dilworth's Appeal (1879) 91

Pa. 247, an injunction to restrain the erection of a powder magazine in a sparsely settled region where there was as little danger to persons as in any site that could be chosen, although a nearly abandoned highway was near, was refused.

And it was held in Daw v. Enterprise Powder Mfg. Co. (1894) 160 Pa. 479, 28 Atl. 841, that a preliminary injunction to enjoin the completion of a building for the storage of blasting powder in a borough, and the storage therein of powder, should not be granted, where there was evidence that blasting powder was not a high explosive, that the building was of stone and iron, that the powder stored therein was to be packed in cartridges and placed in fireproof cases, and that there were other similar storehouses in the borough.

k. Privies.

The rule that a court of equity may grant an injunction to restrain a nuisance which must inevitably result from acts threatened or in progress is illustrated by its application in the following cases involving privies: De Give v. Seltzer (1879) 64 Ga. 423; Wahle v. Reinbach (1875) 76 Ill. 322; Radican v. Buckley (1894) 138 Ind. 582, 38 N. E. 53; Miley v. A'Hearn (1892) 13 Ky. L. Rep. 834, 18 S. W. 529.

On the other hand, the rule that a court of equity will not interfere where the threatened nuisance is not inevitable, but only contingent, depending on the manner of operation, use, or other future circumstances, has been applied in a number of cases involving privies, of which the following are illustrative: Edelen v. Barber (1886) 8 Ky. L. Rep. 268; Davis v. Adkins (1896) 18 Ky. L. Rep. 73, 35 S. W. 271 (school privy); Iliff v. School Directors (1892) 45 Ill. App. 419 (school privy); Biddulph v. St. George's Parish (1863) 3 De G. J. & S. 492, 46 Eng. Reprint, 726, 33 L. J. Ch. N. S. 411, 9 Jur. N. S. 953, 8 L. T. N. S. 558, 11 Week. Rep. 739 (public urinal near residences); British Canadian Securities v. Victoria (1911) 16 B. C. 441 (comfort station).

In Miley v. A'Hearn (Ky.) supra, an injunction was granted to restrain the erection of a privy on a lot adjoining that of complainant, within 10 feet of her well, and within 13 feet of her dining room and bedroom.

And it was held in Radican v. Buckley (1894) 138 Ind. 582, 38 N. E. 53, that an injunction should be granted to restrain the erection of a privy on a lot adjoining that of complainant, within 3½ feet of his dining room and kitchen, and almost in front of the main entrance to his house.

But allegations in a petition to enjoin the erection of a schoolhouse and outbuildings, including a privy, that complainant's spring, about 150 feet distant, will be injured by the flowing into it of surface and underground waters from the school site, are too indefinite, in that they do not show clearly that such damages would inevitably result as to warrant the granting of an injunction. Davis v. Adkins (1896) 18 Ky. L. Rep. 73, 35 S. W. 271.

And one who would not otherwise have the right to enjoin the construction of a privy 30 feet from his dwelling does not obtain such right by reason of a town ordinance prohibiting the building or use of a privy within 30 feet of a dwelling without permission of the trustees, and authorizing abatement of the privy as a nuisance on complaint of any citizen. Edelen v. Barber (Ky.) supra.

The application of the rule that a court of equity may grant an injunction to restrain a nuisance which must inevitably result from acts threatened or in progress, to cases involving sewage, is illustrated by the following authorities: Missouri v. Illinois (1900) 180 U. S. 208, 45 L. ed. 497, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 381; Dwight v. Hayes (1894) 150 Ill. 273, 41 Am. St. Rep. 367, 37 N. E. 218; New York C. & H. R. Co. v. Rochester (1891) 127 N. Y. 591, 28 N. E. 416; PHIPPS v. ROGUE RIVER VALLEY CANAL CO. (reported herewith) ante, 741; Rush Springs v. Bentley (1919) — Okla. —, 182 Pac. 664; Morton v. Chester (1870) 2 Del. Co. Rep. (Pa.) 459; Pierce v. Gibson County (1901) 107 Tenn.

224, 55 L.R.A. 477, 89 Am. St. Rep. 946, 64 S. W. 33; Atty. Gen. v. Metropolitan Bd. of Works (1863) 1 Hem. & M. 298, 71 Eng. Reprint, 130, 2 New Reports, 312, 9 L. T. N. S. 139, 11 Week. Rep. 820.

On the other hand, the rule that a court of equity will not interfere where the threatened nuisance is not inevitable, but only contingent, depending on the manner of operation, use, or other future circumstances, has been applied in a number of cases involving sewage, illustrated by the following:

United States.—Columbia Ave. Sav. Fund, S. D. Title & T. Co. v. Prison Commission (1899) 92 Fed. 801 (prison threatening contamination of public water supply).

Kansas.—Hutchinson v. Delano (1891) 46 Kan. 345, 26 Pac. 740.

Maryland.—Pope v. Clark (1913) 122 Md. 1, 89 Atl. 387.

New Jersey.—Newark Aqueduct Board (1889) 45 N. J. Eq. 393, 18 Atl. 106, affirmed in (1890) 46 N. J. Eq. 552, 20 Atl. 54, 22 Atl. 55.

North Carolina.—Vickers v. Durham (1903) 132 N. C. 880, 44 S. E. 685; Little v. Lenoir (1909) 151 N. C. 415, 66 S. E. 337 (rule recognized).

Tennessee.—Lytton v. Steward (1876) 2 Tenn. Ch. 586.

England.—Atty. Gen. v. Kingston-upon-Thames (1865) 11 Jur. N. S. 596, 12 L. T. N. S. 665, 13 Week. Rep. 888.

It was held in Pierce v. Gibson County (1901) 107 Tenn. 224, 55 L.R.A. 477, 89 Am. St. Rep. 946, 64 S. W. 33, that the intended discharge of water-closets through a sewer onto the complainant's land, to his injury, might be enjoined, although, when the bill was filed, the building in which the closets were to be located was not finished, and the closets had not yet been built.

And the condemnation of a right of way for an open irrigation ditch to take the water from a sewage-polluted stream will be enjoined if its use will result in a foul and noisome condition of the ditch, inimical to health at times of low water, although the intention is to take the water from the stream only at times of flood, when the sewage is rendered innocuous by the volume of the water. PHIPPS v. ROGUE RIVER VALLEY CANAL CO. (reported herewith) ante, 741.

It was held in Quitman v. Underwood (1918) 148 Ga. 152, 96 S. E. 178, that an injunction to restrain the completion of a garbage crematory was authorized, although the plant had proceeded to within two days of completion and was being erected under a guaranty that the plant, when completed, would consume the garbage of the city without offensive odors, where it appeared that the plant was situated about 300 yards from the business center of the city, that the complainants lived within 100 yards of the crematory, that there were other available vacant lots in a more remote section of the city, away from the business and residential section, and that the hauling of the garbage past the residences of the complainants would cause flies, noxious fumes, and poisonous gases, annoying them, endangering their health, and depreciating the value of their property.

And it was held in San Antonio v. Hamilton (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 180 S. W. 160, that the trial court had not abused its discretion in granting a temporary injunction to restrain the establishment of a garbage incinerator plant in a city within four blocks of the complainants' residences, where the evidence tended to show that the operation of the plant would endanger the health and comfort of the complainants, although the garbage was to be transported to the plant in covered wagons, and the contract with the incinerator company required that the plant should operate in a clean, sanitary, and odorless manner, the city not being obliged to accept it unless it so operated.

In Rush Springs v. Bentley (1919) — Okla. —, 182 Pac. 664, the court enjoined the erection in a municipality of a sewer basin and septic tank within about 500 feet of the complainants' residences, where the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the contemplated works would emit odors which would be very obnoxious to the complainants and others living in the vicinity.

In Sayre v. Newark (1899) 58 N. J. Eq. 136, 42 Atl. 1068, the discharge by a municipality of sewage into a stream was enjoined on the ground that a nuisance would thereby be created from which the complainant would sustain special injury. The decision was reversed, however, in (1900) 60 N. J. Eq. 361, 48 L.R.A. 722, 83 Am. St. Rep. 629, 45 Atl. 895, on the ground that the city was acting under legislative authority, and that the consequential damages sustained were without redress,—a point not within the scope of this note.

But an injunction was refused to restrain the erection of a prison near a creek, at the instance of a lower riparian owner which furnished water to a city, on the ground that contamination would result, where it appeared that the prison buildings were  $\frac{1}{2}$  of a mile from the creek, that there was no sewer or stream connection between the prison and the creek, and that the intervening land was to be cultivated. Columbia Ave. Sav. Fund, S. D. Title & T. Co. v. Prison Commission (1899) 92 Fed. 801.

And in Hutchinson v. Delano (1891) 46 Kan. 345, 26 Pac. 740, an injunction was denied to prevent the emptying by a municipality of sewage into a creek which flowed through the complainants' premises, where there was no present injury, although injury might result to the complainant if, as was contemplated, at some future time the sewer system was extended so that the sewage of the entire city was emptied into the creek.

The rule that a court of equity may grant an injunction to restrain a nuisance which must inevitably result from acts threatened or in progress has been applied in cases involving slaughterhouses, stockyards, and similar establishments, illustrated by the following authorities: Seigle v. Bromley (1912) 22 Colo. App. 189, 124 Pac. 191 (hog ranch); Atty. Gen. v. Steward (1869) 20 N. J. Eq. 415, perpetual injunction granted in (1871) 21 N. J. Eq. 340 (slaughterhouse and stock pens); Catlin v. Valentine (1842) 9 Paige (N. Y.) 575, 38 Am. Dec. 567 (slaughterhouse); Peck v. Elder (1849) 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 126 (fat-melting establishment); Czarniecki v. Bollman (1887) 9 Sadler (Pa.) 32, 11 Atl. 660 (bone-boiling establishment); ECKELS v. WEIBLEY (reported herewith) ante, 739 (barn and cattle yard); Sellers v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1875) 10 Phila. (Pa.) 319 (slaughterhouse; rule approved); Burntisland Whale Fishing Co. v. Trotter (1831) 5 Wils. & S. (Scot.) 649 (establishment to boil whale blubber); Swinton v. Pedie (1837) 15 Sc. Sess. Cas. 1st series, 775 (slaughterhouse).

On the other hand, the rule that a court of equity will not interfere where the threatened nuisance is not inevitable, but only contingent, depending on the manner of operation, use, or other future circumstances, has been applied in a number of cases involving slaughterhouses, stock pens, and dairies, of which the following are illustrative: Richmond v. House (1917) 177 Ky. 814, 198 S. W. 218 (stockyards); Beckham v. Brown (1897) 19 Ky. L. Rep. 519, 40 S. W. 684 (slaughterhouse); McDonough v. Robbins (1894) 60 Mo. App. 156 (dairy in residential section); Atty. Gen. v. Steward (1869) 20 N. J. Eq. 415, perpetual injunction granted in (1871) 21 N. J. Eq. 340 (slaughterhouse and stock pens); Sellers v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1875) 10 Phila. (Pa.) 319 (same).

In an action to enjoin the establishment of a hog ranch near the plaintiff's residence, where the evidence showed that the defendant contemplated the feeding of garbage, offal, and dead animals, and was then conducting a similar ranch in that vicinity, it was held that an injunction was properly issued against conducting the ranch in such a manner as would be offensive or dangerous to the health of the plaintiff and of the public, although the defendant's testimony was that he proposed to sterilize the garbage, the efficiency of this method to prevent a nuisance being doubtful.

And in Swinton v. Pedie (1837) 15 Sc. Sess. Cas. 1st series, 775, the court refused to permit the experiment to be tried, as to whether an extensive slaughterhouse proposed by the defendant in the suburbs of a city, near a large school and residences, could be operated without being a nuisance, although the defendant claimed that by new processes the proposed establishment could be so conducted as to avoid offensive sights and smells or other objectionable features.

But in a suit to enjoin the establishment of a dairy in an alleged residential section of a city, it was held that the petition was subject to demurrer where it alleged merely the proximity of the complainants' property to the proposed dairy, that the operation of the dairy, by reason of noxious odors and gases necessarily engendered and the unbearable stench, would poison the air in the neighborhood and render complainants' dwellings uninhabitable, that there were no sewers adjacent to the proposed dairy site, nor could sewer connections be made therewith, and that the operation of a dairy without such connection would cause contagious sickness and death. McDonough v. Robbins (1894) 60 Mo. App. 156. These allegations were regarded as opinions, and as failing to set forth such facts as to enable the court to determine that injurious consequences would necessarily follow so as to constitute a nuisance.

And the court in Atty. Gen. v. Steward (1869) 20 N. J. Eq. 415, refused to enjoin the erection of buildings intended for use as a slaughterhouse, with pens for keeping hogs, except that it restrained the defendants from permitting the blood of the hogs slaughtered on the premises to flow into an adjacent creek, since a nuisance would probably thereby result, where the proposed slaughterhouse was 700 feet from the nearest dwelling of any of the complainants, although one of them owned a building lot within 250 feet of the proposed structure, and the extent of the slaughtering business was 500 hogs per week, which the defendants claimed they would keep in clean pens only a "few hours" before they were slaughtered. The injunction granted in this case was made perpetual in (1871) 21 N. J. Eq. 340.

n. Stables.

The rule that a court of equity may grant an injunction to restrain a nuisance which must inevitably result from acts threatened or in progress has been applied in cases involving livery stables, illustrated by the following: Coker v. Birge (1851) 9 Ga. 425, 54 Am. Dec. 347, subsequent decision to same effect (1851) 10 Ga. 336; Caskey v. Edwards (1908) 128 Mo. App. 237, 107 S. W. 37; Collins v. Cleveland (1893) 2 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 380; Aldrich v. Howard (1861) 7 R. I. 87, 80 Am. Dec. 636.

On the other hand, the rule that a court of equity will not interfere where the threatened nuisance is not inevitable, but only contingent, depending on the manner of operation, use, or other future circumstances, has been applied in a number of cases involving stables, of which the following are illustrative:

United States.—Flint v. Russell (1879) 5 Dill. 151, Fed. Cas. No. 4,876 (livery stable).

Alabama.—St. James Church v. Arrington (1860) 36 Ala. 546, 76 Am. Dec. 332 (private stable near church).

Georgia.—Harrison v. Brooks (1856) 20 Ga. 537 (livery stable); Rounsaville v. Kohlheim (1882) 63 Ga. 668, 45 Am. Rep. 505 (private stable).

Illinois.—Sheldon v. Weeks (1893) 51 Ill. App. 314 ("carriage repository and boarding stable").

Indiana.—Keiser v. Lovett (1882) 85 Ind. 240, 44 Am. Rep. 10 (horse stall).

Iowa.—Shiras v. Olinger (1879) 50 Iowa, 571, 32 Am. Rep. 138 (livery stable).

Kentucky.—Albany Christian Church v. Wilborn (1902) 112 Ky. 507, 66 S. W. 285 (private stable near church); Hyden v. Terry (1908) 32 Ky. L. Rep. 1193, 108 S. W. 241.

78 So. 844 (stable for horses of military organization).

Maryland.—King v. Hamill (1903) 97 Md. 103, 54 Atl. 625 (private stable); Gallagher v. Flury (1904) 99 Md. 181, 57 Atl. 672 (same).

New York.—Stilwell v. Buffalo Riding Academy (1888) 21 Abb. N. C. 472, 4 N. Y. Supp. 414 (livery stable).

Tennessee.—Kirkman v. Handy (1850) 11 Humph. 406, 54 Am. Dec. 45 (livery stable).

Vermont.—Curtis v. Winslow (1866) 38 Vt. 690 (barn 10 feet from residence).

An injunction may be granted against the threatened establishment of a barn and yard for conducting a horse and cattle business in a residence section of a borough which will be a nuisance to neighboring property, although nothing has yet been done which would support an action at law, or which has injured the complainant. BOOKER v. WEBLEY (reported herewith) ante, 789.

It was held in Coker v. Birge (1851) 9 Ga. 425, 54 Am. Dec. 347, that a prospective nuisance such as warranted equitable interference was made out by allegations in a bill to enjoin the erection of a livery stable that the defendant had begun building the stable, with a plank floor, on a lot adjoining complainant's hotel, and about 65 feet therefrom; that the complainant's property is chiefly valuable for hotel purposes; that the erection of the stable would result in the loss of health to complainant's family and of patronage to the hotel, in consequence of the unhealthy effluvia, swarms of flies, and interminable stamping of horses, from the stable. These sworn allegations, the court said, must be considered as facts for the purposes of granting the injunction, and the injuries could not be said to be improbable or unreasonable. On a subsequent appeal (1851) 10 Ga. 336, it was held error to dissolve the injunction on the filing of the answer, in which the defendant set out that he had removed the plank floor from the stable and intended to take precautionary measures to prevent injury to the complainant by the sprinkling of lime water, keeping the stalls neat and clean, etc. The court stated that the ad interim injunction should have been continued to the final hearing, and if the jury were of the opinion that the stable was not a nuisance of itself, but might be kept in such a manner as to make it unobjectionable, they would no doubt by their verdict require that the defendant should give bond, or in some other manner provide adequate protection to the complainant.

And it was held in Aldrich v. Howard (1861) 7 R. I. 87, 80 Am. Dec. 636, that a complaint, in a suit to enjoin the construction of a livery stable, was not subject to demurrer, which alleged that the proposed stable was to be erected within 28 inches of the complainant's dwelling house, within 6 inches of a block of stores owned by him, and within 42 feet of his hotel, and that, by the establishment of the stable, the complainant would suffer irreparable damage by reason of the odors, filth, flies, and noises, and other nuisances proceeding from the stable.

But where the allegations of the complaint in a suit to enjoin the erecting of a livery stable on a lot adjacent to the complainant's dwelling, in a residential district, that the proposed stable would be a nuisance, were denied in the answer under oath, the court in Flint v. Russell (1879) 5 Dill. 151, Fed. Cas. No. 4,876, held that a preliminary injunction should not be granted, since such a structure was not a nuisance per se, and whether or not it would become a nuisance would depend on circumstances thereafter to be ascertained.

And in Kirkman v. Handy (1850) 11 Humph. (Tenn.) 406, 54 Am. Dec. 45, an injunction was refused to restrain the completion and use of a building in a residential part of a city for a livery stable on a lot adjoining that of complainant, within a foot or two of complainant's residence, and fronting on the same street; the court being of the opinion that the nuisance was contingent, depending on the manner of use of the stable.

So, an injunction was denied in Keiser v. Lovett (1882) 85 Ind. 240, 44 Am. Rep. 10, to restrain the erection of a building on a lot adjoining that of the complainant, to be used as a wood and buggy shed, with a horse stall about 25 feet from the complainant's well, and about 28 feet from his residence.

And an injunction was denied in Harrison v. Brooks (1856) 20 Ga. 537, to restrain the erection of a livery stable on a lot on the opposite side of the street from the plaintiff's hotel, and about 80 feet therefrom, where the stable was to be separated from the street by a carriage house built in front of the stable.

It was held also in Hyden v. Terry (1908) 32 Ky. L. Rep. 1198, 108 S. W. 241, that an injunction would not be granted to restrain the erection of a stable across the street from the residence of the complainant, and 42 feet distant therefrom, since whether the stable would become a nuisance depended on the condition in which it was kept.

And it was held in Gallagher v. Flury (1904) 99 Md. 181, 57 Atl. 672, that the erection of a private stable 18 feet from the complainant's residence would not be enjoined, where the proposed structure was to be covered with corrugated iron as a safeguard against fire, and was to be connected with a city sewer.

In Shiras v. Olinger (1859) 50 Iowa, 571, 32 Am. Rep. 138, it was held that an injunction would not be issued to restrain the rebuilding of a livery stable, which had been burned, although, as previously constructed, the stable was a nuisance to the complainant, since it abutted upon an alley adjacent to his premises, with doors opening upon the alley within 40 feet of his house; and that, since it did not appear but that, by an alteration of the structure and method of its use a nuisance might be avoided, an injunction should be issued to restrain only such use as would be substantially similar to that which had theretofore been made of the premises, and which the court found was a nuisance.

In Rounsaville v. Kohlheim (1880) 68 Ga. 668, 45 Am. Rep. 505, the court, in holding that an injunction was properly refused to restrain the erection of a private stable on a lot adjoining that of the complainant, recognized the possibility that a private stable may be so located and improperly kept as to become an actionable nuisance, but stated that "the mere probability that it will become so is insufficient to deprive the owner of a lot of the right to erect a stable for his own use, although it may be on the line of his lot, and quite near the dwelling of an adjacent owner. It is true that he who thus builds must at his peril guard against such construction as that its ordinary use would disturb adjacent owners by the noises produced, or manage it in such way as to permit offensive stenches to emanate therefrom, and float over his neighbor's premises, to his serious annoyance and discomfort."

It was held in Saier v. Joy (1917) 198 Mich. 295, L.R.A.1918A, 825, 164 N. W. 507, that the opening of a morgue and undertaking establishment in a residence district, to the depreciation of the value of neighboring property, may be enjoined as a nuisance.

And in Densmore v. Evergreen Camp (1900) 61 Wash. 230, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 608, 112 Pac. 255, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1206, it was held that the maintenance of an undertaking establishment in the residence part of the city within a few feet of the neighboring residences may be enjoined by their owners as a nuisance, in view of the depressing effect such business would probably have upon them, and the escape of noxious odors and gases from the chemicals used. And it was also held that it was immaterial that the owner of the business intended to occupy the upper stories of the building as a residence.

The rule that a court of equity may grant an injunction to restrain a nuisance which must inevitably result from acts threatened or in progress has been applied in various cases involving prospective nuisances of a miscellaneous nature.

United States.—St. Louis v. Knapp, S. & Co. Co. (1882) 104 U. S. 658, 26 L. ed. 883, reversing (1881) 2 McCrary, 516, 6 Fed. 221 (obstruction of wharf); Silliman v. Hudson River Bridge Co. (1857) 4 Blatchf. 74, Fed. Cas. No. 12,851, subsequent proceedings (1859) 4 Blatchf. 395, Fed. Cas. No. 18,852 (bridge across navigable stream); *Illinois & St. L. The possibility that the manner in which a jail is kept near private residences will render it a nuisance is insufficient to warrant the granting of an injunction against its erection, at the instance of the owners of the residences. Bacon v. Walker (1886) 77 Ga. 386.

A brewery not being a nuisance per se, a complaint, in a suit to enjoin its erection, is subject to demurrer, which does not set out the location of the complainant's residence with reference to the proposed structure with sufficient definiteness to show that the annoyances threatened would be appreciable, and which fails to allege any threat, or any facts from which a threat can be inferred, on the part of the defendant, so to conduct the brewery as to render it harmful to the complainants from the manner of its operation. The mere allegation that the brewery "would necessarily become a nuisance" is mere conjecture. O'Reilly v. Perkins (1901) 22 R. I. 364, 48 Atl. 6.

It was held in Janesville v. Carpenter (1890) 77 Wis. 288, 8 L.R.A. 808, 20 Am. St. Rep. 123, 46 N. W. 128, that an injunction would not be granted to restrain the erection of a building on piles in the bed of a river on defendant's land, which would damage no one, merely because others might follow the defendant's example, and a row of similar buildings might be erected, which might give rise to danger from fire and flood and to the public health.

The planting of willow trees on a railroad right of way, within 3 feet of the line, was enjoined in Brock v. Connecticut & P. R. Co. (1862) 35 Vt. 373, in a suit brought by the owner of the adjoining land, where it appeared that the trees were planted with the expectation of nailing boards to them when grown, and thus making a fence along the right of way, that there was no necessity for this particular kind of fence, and that the trees when grown would cause injury to the complainant's land by the spreading of the roots and tops.

It was held in Davis v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1905) 102 Md. 371, 62 Atl. 572, that an injunction would not be granted to restrain the construction of a railroad siding near complainant's residence, where the proximity of the railroad to the residence was not shown except that the track was to be constructed along a county highway on which the complainant's property abutted, and was to pass in front of said property, and it did not appear whether the railroad would be used frequently or otherwise; allegations being too indefinite which are merely to the effect that the construction and operation of the siding would greatly depreciate the complainant's property by reason of the noise and danger incident to the operation of cars and engines passing immediately in front of her residence, and would result in danger to her when driving on the highway.

A court of equity will not enjoin the construction by a city of a fire-engine house in a residential section, at the instance of an adjoining property owner, on the ground that by improper use the structure may become a nuisance, even though the building could be placed within a block or two of the proposed site, among shops and small stores. Van De Vere v. Kansas City (1891) 107 Mo. 83, 28 Am. St. Rep. 396, 17 S. W. 695.

In a suit to enjoin the construction of a pond on a lot adjacent to the complainant's residence, it was held in Holke v. Herman (1900) 87 Mo. App. 125, that the complaint was insufficient which alleged that the water in the pond would be only 12 feet from the complainant's residence, that it would become stagnant, would breed disease, detract from the beauty and comfort of the complainant's home, would be a nuisance injurious to the health of complainant's family, and render his dwelling unfit for habitation, where there was no allegation as to the sources of the water in the pond, or as to the condition and uses of the defendant's premises. But after judgment granting an injunction the court declined to dismiss the petition, but reversed the judgment and remanded the cause with directions permitting the plaintiff to amend, since the evidence showed that the pond must be fed from impure sources, that no stream or spring emptied into it, and that it had no outlet; so that the proposed establishment of a nuisance injurious to health appeared with sufficient probability.

That a city market house 100 feet from a residence, and on the opposite side of the street therefrom, will render the latter less "eligible" as a dwelling house, will not authorize the granting of an injunction to restrain the erection of the market. Higgins v. Princeton (1850) 8 N. J. Eq. 309.

Swearing and the use of obscene language which would constitute a nuisance may be enjoined, if indulgence therein by the defendant is probable, even though he has not threatened to continue them. Barnard v. Finkbeiner (1914) 162 App. Div. 319, 147 N. Y. Supp. 514.

It was held in Houlton v. Titcomb (1906) 102 Me. 272, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 580, 120 Am. St. Rep. 492, 66 Atl. 733, that the erection within the fire limits of a wooden building, contrary to a municipal ordinance, might be enjoined, where the statute made such act a nuisance.

When the right to the use of a highway is admitted, or easy of ascertainment, an injunction will be granted to restrain its obstruction, in favor of adjacent owners, where such obstruction works a special injury to them; but where the right to the use of the highway has not been established at law, or is not clear nor easy of ascertainment, but is contested by the answer and proofs, an injunction will not be granted. Walt v. Foster (1885) 12 Or. 247, 7 Pac. 24.

v.

SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 113, Labette County.

Kansas Supreme Court — October 11, 1919.

(105 Kan. 343, 184 Pac. 480.)

School — power of board to drill well.

1. Under the statute authorizing a school board to provide the necessary appendages for a schoolhouse, it may bind the district to pay for the drilling of a well in the school yard for the purpose of supplying drinking water, even although no suitable water is found, and the well is, on that account, entirely useless.

Well — contract to drill — construction.

2. Language to the effect that a contractor agrees to drill a "water well," guaranteeing first-class work and a well produced by a machine of a specified make, payment to be made at the completion of the well, does not imply that he undertakes that water shall be found suitable for the use intended.

3. A well drilled under such a contract must be deemed to be completed, in such sense as to entitle the contractor to his pay, when it is made to appear that water of the kind sought cannot be found at a reasonable depth, and this condition must be regarded as established, so far as he is concerned, when the other party directs a discontinuance of the work.

School — power of district to contract.

4. The power of a school district to contract is only such as is conferred by statute expressly or by fair implication, and persons dealing with it are chargeable with notice of this limitation.

[See 24 R. C. L. 601 et seq.]

Headnotes 1-3 by MASON, J.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Labette County sustaining a demurrer to the evidence in an action brought to recover the balance alleged to be due under a contract for the drilling of a well. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John Madden, John Madden, Jr., and C. E. Cooper for appellant.

Messrs. W. D. Atkinson and John T. Pearson for appellee.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

L. F. Schofield entered into a written contract with the board of school district No. 113 of Labette county to drill a well in the school yard; the purpose being to provide a supply of drinking water. No water suitable for the purpose was found, and by direction of the board the drilling was abandoned at the depth of 293½ feet. The price agreed upon for the work was $1.25 a foot. The contractor, who had received $100, brought an action against the district for the balance of the agreed price of $1.25 a foot, also asking a further recovery on account of extra work, and delay occasioned by the fault of the board. A demurrer to his evidence was sustained, and he appeals.

The grounds on which the defendant's liability is contested, assuming the plaintiff's evidence to be true, are (1) that a school district has legal authority to pay for constructing a well only on the theory that it is a necessary appendage to the schoolhouse, and that a well which produces no water fit to drink is useless, and cannot be regarded as covered by that term; and (2) that the language of the contract made the plaintiff a guarantor that a supply of drinking water would be produced.

The power of a school district to contract is, of course, only such as is conferred by statute, expressly or by fair implication; and persons dealing with it are charged with notice of this limitation. 35 Cyc. 949, 951. The district board is authorized to "provide the necessary appendages for the schoolhouse during the time a school is taught therein." Gen. Stat. 1915, § 8976. This court has held that the word "appendage," as used in the statute, should be construed broadly, so as to include a well on the school premises; its necessity in a particular case being a question of fact. Hemme v. School Dist. 30 Kan. 377, 1 Pac. 104.

The defendant, however, argues that a well which produces no water fit for drinking purposes, being absolutely useless, cannot fairly be considered an appendage to a schoolhouse, and certainly not as a necessary appendage. The argument has plausibility, but proceeds upon a quite literal interpretation, which we think would result in confining the discretion of the school board within too narrow limits. The evidence shows that a cistern holding rainwater had formerly supplied drinking water for the school, but was not considered sanitary. This obviously justified the officers of the district in making reasonable efforts to procure a more satisfactory supply.

They could not be sure that sinking a well would answer the purpose, but they might naturally and reasonably suppose the chances were all in favor of it. The only way to find out was to make the attempt. We cannot say that as a matter of law they had no right to risk the money of the district in drilling the well, unless they were sure it would meet the purpose for which it was intended. We think the authority to provide a well implied the authority to bind the district for the amount expended in an endeavor to construct one, following reasonable and usual methods, notwithstanding it resulted in a complete failure so far as practical results were concerned. Although in a particular case it might be possible to find a contractor who would carry the risk himself, this would presumably involve a considerable increase in the price, and the question as to whether that plan should be followed would be one calling for the exercise of sound business judgment. We conclude that the board had authority to make the contract, and the district was liable upon it if the contractor duly performed his part.

The material part of the contract read as follows: "For and in consideration of one dollar and twenty-five cents ($1.25) per foot, first party [Schofield] agrees to drill one water well on school yard east of schoolhouse. First party agrees to furnish dry pipe suitable for casing out all surface water. Dry pipe to be 6½ inch, I. D. First party guarantees first-class work and a stra well. In case of objectionable water other than surface water, second parties [the district board] agree to furnish all necessary casing for completion of well. Payment for said well to be cashed on completion of said well."

The evidence tended to show that at a depth of 24 feet surface water was found, which was not suitable for drinking, and was cased out in accordance with the contract and the wish of the members of the board. At about 80 feet salt water was struck, and the board, after a delay to give opportunity for analysis, caused the plaintiff to proceed with the drilling, which was finally stopped by order of the director at 293½ feet, no usable water having been reached.

No explanation is offered of the combination of letters "stra" appearing in the contract. It may have been intended for "star," for the plaintiff testified that he used a Star drill machine. At all events, no force is attached to it by either party. The defendant argues that an undertaking on the part of the plaintiff that water should be produced is fairly implied from the agreement to drill a "water well," and from the stipulation that payment was to be made on its "completion." The expression "water well" might naturally be employed to distinguish the contemplated operation from an effort to reach oil or gas. "The use of the term 'well' . . . is not conclusive that a producing well was intended." Federal Betterment Co. v. Blaes, 75 Kan. 69, 73, 88 Pac. 556. Contracts for the digging or drilling of a well often provide that payment shall depend upon the obtaining of water; but to be given that effect such a purpose ought to be made to appear by express statement or very clear implication, especially where the contractor does not choose the site. "If the agreement is executed without provision that a specific flow of water shall be obtained, . . . then the labor and materials must be paid for as per contract, be the flow of water little or much." Omaha Consol. Vinegar Co. v. Burns, 49 Neb. 229, 233, 68 N. W. 493. See also Gregory v. United States, 33 Ct. Cl. 434; Chapin v. L. Candee & Co. 14 Misc. 453, 35 N. Y. Supp. 1018. Contra, Jarrard v. Hill, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 575. Even a guaranty that water shall be produced has been held not to mean that the water shall be suitable for the purpose in view. American Well-Works v. Rivers (C. C.) 36 Fed. 880; Blum v. Brown, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 463, 33 S. W. 145; Electric Lighting Co. v. Elder Bros. 115 Ala. 138, 21 So. 983. In a situation having some features similar to those here presented, this language has been used:

"Defendant founds his argument upon his construction of the word 'well,' that plaintiffs agreed to drill a 'well,' that a 'well' is a hole in the ground, containing water other than surface water; that when plaintiffs agreed to drill a 'well' they contracted to furnish an article meeting that definition; and that, if they did not produce a hole in the ground containing water other than surface water, they did not drill a 'well,' and cannot recover. . . . The defendant himself selected the site for the proposed well. Nothing was said about plaintiffs undertaking to reach water. All that can be gleaned from the conversations of the parties is that plaintiffs were to dig a well. From this contract, and the circumstances, to construe an undertaking on the part of the plaintiffs to reach water or receive no pay seems to us to do great violence to language, and to the ordinary transactions of sane men. . . . When plaintiffs went to dig a well, when they took a site selected by defendants, when no guaranty of reaching water was made, when no price was fixed for performing the services or reaching water, can a court for a moment regard it as within the contemplation of the parties, as shown from their words or their acts, that they used the word 'well' as meaning a hole in the ground, containing water other than surface water? We think not. Bouvier's Law Dictionary defines a 'well' as 'a hole dug in the ground in order to obtain water.' This is, to our mind, the only practical view. The object of a well is to obtain water. The well may be unsuccessful. The object of a mining shaft is to develop a mine that will pay—an object not always attained. Under the circumstances of the case, we cannot construe the word 'well' as defendant insists." Littrell v. Wilcox, 11 Mont. 83, 84, 27 Pac. 396.

The provisions of the contract relative to casing out water unfit for use serve to show that only water suitable for drinking was sought, but in our judgment do not further affect the question under consideration. They indicate that the finding of undesirable water at different depths was anticipated, and the purpose of their insertion was obviously to determine upon whom should fall the cost of the additional material thereby made necessary.

Even under a contract to prosecute the work of boring a well until the other party should be satisfied, or until water was found, it has been said that no obligation was created to go beyond a reasonable depth. Bohrer v. Stumpff, 31 Ill. App. 139. Here we think the well contracted for must be regarded as completed, when it became apparent that good water could not be obtained within a reasonable depth—a condition established, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, by the order of the director to discontinue the drilling.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings.

All the Justices concur.

I. In general.

The power to erect, lease, or repair school buildings is not within the scope of this annotation; nor does it include the right of school authorities to purchase textbooks for general use.

School authorities are generally empowered by the statutes in the several states to provide such apparatus and equipment for the public schools and to furnish such accommodations and facilities for carrying on the work of the schools as are reasonably necessary and useful for the comfort and convenience of teachers and pupils; but the extent of their powers in this respect depends in any particular case on the specific provisions of the controlling statute.

The authority of the township trustee to purchase school supplies will not be extended, nor his powers enlarged, by intendment, or by a strained construction of the statute. First Nat. Bank v. Adams School Twp. (1896) 17 Ind. App. 375, 46 N. E. 832.

II. Need of articles purchased.

School authorities can bind the school district or school township in the purchase only of such school apparatus and equipment as are reasonably necessary and useful. State ex rel. Cohen v. Hawes (1887) 112 Ind. 323, 14 N. E. 87; Oppenheimer v. Greencastle School Twp. (1904) 164 Ind. 99, 72 N. E. 1100; Litten v. Wright School Twp. (1890) 1 Ind. App. 92, 27 N. E. 329 (denying recovery for purchase price of tellurians); Noble School Furniture Co. v. Washington School

Twp. (1891) 4 Ind. App. 270, 29 N. E. 985; First Nat. Bank v. Adams School Twp. (1896) 17 Ind. App. 375, 46 N. E. 832; First Nat. Bank v. Osborne (1897) 18 Ind. App. 442, 48 N. E. 256; Gibson v. School Dist. (1877) 36 Mich. 404; Honaker v. Board of Education (1896) 42 W. Va. 170, 32 L.R.A. 413, 57 Am. St. Rep. 847, 24 S. E. 544.

While, under the Indiana statute, township trustees are authorized to provide suitable equipment for schools, the duty must be discharged with discretion and economy, and they have no power to purchase anything except needful and appropriate articles. Therefore, to recover the value of a heating apparatus sold to the township trustees for school purposes, a complaint is insufficient if it does not show the necessity for procuring that kind of a heater, or any other kind, for the use of the schools. Oppenheimer v. Greencastle School Twp. (1904) 164 Ind. 99, 72 N. E. 1100.

However, the case of Johnson School Twp. v. Citizens Bank (1882) 81 Ind. 515, supports the proposition that, under the Indiana statute authorizing the township trustee to buy school furniture, he is the judge as to whether the furniture is needed, and, in the absence of fraud, may bind the township by contracts for such furniture.

III. Necessity for authorization by electors or others.

Under the statutes of some states, the purchase of charts, maps, and other school apparatus must be authorized by the electors of the school district to render it liable therefor. First Nat. Bank v. Whisenhunt (1910) 94 Ark. 583, 127 S. W. 968 (charts); Taylor v. Wayne (1868) 25 Iowa, 447 (maps and other apparatus); Taylor v. Otter Creek (1868) 26 Iowa, 281, (same); Manning v. Van Buren (1869) 28 Iowa, 332 (same); School Dist. v. Perkins (1879) 21 Kan. 536, 30 Am. Rep. 447 (stereoscope; see this case under V. a, infra); Western Pub. House v. School Dist. (1892) 94 Mich. 262, 53 N. W. 1108 (charts for anatomical study); Kane v. School Dist. (1881) 52 Wis. 502, 9 N. W. 459.

In Manning v. Van Buren (1869) 28 Iowa, 332, it was held that school directors had no authority to purchase maps, globes, and other school apparatus, without the previous authorization of the electors of the district, where the statute empowered the electors, when assembled in district township meeting, to vote a tax for certain purposes, among others, "for the payment of any debts contracted for the erection of schoolhouses, and for procuring district libraries and apparatus for the schools."

Also in Taylor v. Otter Creek (1868) 26 Iowa, 281, it was held that school directors could not purchase maps, charts, globes, and other school apparatus without the authorization of the electors of the district.

And that a school board had no authority to purchase maps, unless the authority so to do was conferred by the electors of the district, was conceded in Taylor v. Wayne (1868) 25 Iowa, 447, where the question involved was as to ratification of the purchase by use of the maps.

It was held in Jefferson School Twp. v. Litton (1888) 116 Ind. 467, 19 N. E. 323, that a statute, providing that whenever it was necessary for a township trustee to incur, on behalf of the township, any debt the aggregate amount of which was in excess of the fund on hand to which such debt was chargeable, and of the fund to be derived from the tax assessed against the township for the year in which the debt was incurred, the trustee should first procure an order from the board of county commissioners authorizing him to contract the indebtedness, limited the power of township trustees to incur debts on behalf of school townships in the purchase of school apparatus.

And where a contract was made with school directors for the sale of school charts, and the statute provided that before expenditures could be made for maps, charts, etc., the approval of the state superintendent must be secured and the expenditure authorized by the electors of the school district, but this approval and authorization were not secured, it was held that the contract was void. First

But the purchase of school desks by the school directors of the district, without an authorization to do so by the electors at their annual meeting, was held authorized in A. H. Andrews Co. v. Delight Special School Dist. (1910) 95 Ark. 26, 128 S. W. 361, under statutes providing that the directors shall "have charge of the school affairs and school educational interests," and shall make the necessary arrangements to have the school carried on, that the clerk of the school board shall keep an account of the expenditures made by the board, the items to include expenditures for "houses, fences, stove, wood, maps, charts, blackboards, dictionary, and other necessities for a school," and authorizing the directors to draw warrants for the payment of teachers' wages, "or for any lawful purpose."

And it was held in Myers Pub. Co. v. White River School Twp. (1901) 28 Ind. App. 91, 62 N. E. 66, that the school trustees could purchase music charts without the matter first being considered by the county board of education, although the statute provided that "said board shall consider the general wants and needs of the schools and school property of which they have charge, and all matters relating to the purchase of school furniture, books, maps, charts," etc. The determination of the board the court regarded as only advisory. See this case also under V. e. infra.

IV. Purchases on credit.

The general question of the power of school districts to make purchases on credit and to contract debts is, of course, beyond the scope of the note.

A contract for the purchase of school apparatus, consisting of a set of stereoscopic views, for a sum payable in six months, with interest, was held unauthorized and void in Clark v. School Directors (1875) 78 Ill. 474, under a statute authorizing the school directors to appropriate to the purchase of libraries and apparatus, any surplus funds after all necessary school expenses were paid, where it did not appear that at the time the contract was made there were any surplus funds. The court said that the wording of the statute seemed to be a limitation of the power to make purchases of this kind to the circumstances named, and to be an implied denial of any power to purchase generally on credit.

And in the absence of a showing that at the time the contract was made there were unappropriated contingent funds on hand, the purchase by a school district, on credit, of an anatomical chart for the study of the effect on the human body of alcoholic drinks and narcotics, was held not authorized in Yaggy v. Monroe (1890) 80 Iowa, 121, 45 N. W. 553, although it was required by statute that the effect of alcoholic drinks, stimulants, and narcotics on the human system should be included in the branches of study to be taught, where the statute also provided that the board of directors might use any unappropriated contingent fund in the treasury to purchase charts and apparatus for the use of the schools, but should contract no debt for this purpose. See, however, Bellmeyer v. Independent Dist. (1876) 44 Iowa, 564, where, although the contract of purchase provided for payment at a future date, the court indulged the presumption that a school board had not exceeded its powers in purchasing an organ when there was no unappropriated contingent fund on hand, it not appearing whether or not there was such an unappropriated fund.

But, under the Code adopted in 1897, the purchase by a school board of an atlas for use in the school, even if there was no contingent fund on hand at the time the order was given, was held authorized in Hanna v. Wright (1902) 116 Iowa, 275, 89 N. W. 1108, the statute providing that school townships might purchase dictionaries, library books, maps, charts, and apparatus for the use of the schools, to a specified amount, and should provide by levy of contingent fund therefor.

And following Hanna v. Wright (Iowa) supra, the court in Johnson v. Cedar (1902) 117 Iowa, 319, 90 N. W.

713, held that a school township had power to contract for school supplies, although it had no contingent fund on hand at the time the contract was executed.

See also Jefferson School Twp. v. Litton (Ind.) under III. supra, and School Dist. v. Western Tube Co. (Wyo.) under V. d, infra.

V. Particular terms and applications.

a. Appendages.

It was held in Gibson v. School Dist. (1877) 36 Mich. 404, that the term "necessary appendage" in a statute, making it the duty of a school director to provide the necessary appendages for the schoolhouse and keep the same in good condition and repair, did not include a set of "national business multiplication charts," consisting of charts or cards containing the multiplication table, practical forms of business contracts, and brief mention of prominent historical events, which proved to be of no practical use or value as a means of instruction.

And a stereoscope is not an "appendage" which a district school board can supply without a vote of the electors of the district, under a statute authorizing the district board to provide the "necessary appendages for the schoolhouse" during the time the school is in session, where other statutory provision is made for the purchase of blackboards, maps, and apparatus, after the school district meeting has voted a tax for supplying the school with these conveniences. School Dist. v. Perkins (1879) 21 Kan. 536, 30 Am. Rep. 447.

But the term "appendages" in a statute authorizing school districts to furnish schoolhouses with the necessary fuel and appendages, and providing that the district board shall supply the necessary appendages for the schoolhouse during the time school is taught therein, may include a mathematical chart to be hung upon the walls of the schoolhouse. School Dist. v. Swayze (1883) 29 Kan. 211.

And a well on school premises may be a necessary appendage within the meaning of a statute providing that the district board shall provide the necessary appendages for the schoolhouse during the time the school is taught therein. It was, therefore, held to be error in Hemme v. School Dist. (1883) 30 Kan. 377, 1 Pac. 104, to instruct the jury that a well is not a necessary appendage to a schoolhouse, the question whether or not it is such an appendage being one for the jury in the particular case.

So, under a statute authorizing a school board to provide the necessary appendages for a schoolhouse, it may bind the district to pay for the drilling of a well in the school yard for the purpose of supplying drinking water, although no suitable water is found, and the well is on that account entirely useless. Schofield v. School Dist. (reported herewith) ante, 788.

A line fence to separate school premises from those adjoining was held a "necessary appendage" in Craeger v. Wright School Dist. (1886) 62 Mich. 101, 28 N. W. 794, under a statute authorizing the school director "to provide the necessary appendages for the schoolhouse," and keep the same in repair. The court said that the word "appendage," as used in school statutes, did not mean simply the school apparatus to be used inside the building, but should be construed in a broad sense to include fuel, fences, and necessary outhouses.

The term "appendage" in a statute authorizing a school board to provide the "necessary appendages" for a schoolhouse should be construed in a broad and comprehensive sense. Hemme v. School Dist. (Kan.) supra.

b. Apparatus and furniture.

The question as to what constituted "apparatus," which, under the Ohio statutes, a board of education was authorized to purchase in a limited amount in any one year, and what was "school furniture," which the board might purchase without such limitation, has arisen in several cases. The statutes authorized boards of education to make appropriations from the contingent fund, to a certain amount, for the purchase of books, other than schoolbooks, as they might deem suitable for the use of scholars and teachers, and for the purchase of philosophical or other "apparatus" for the demonstration of such branches of education as might be taught in the schools; also to build, repair, and "furnish the necessary schoolhouses," and make all other necessary provisions for the schools.

It was held in First Nat. Bank v. Board of Education (1897) 15 Ohio C. C. 561, 8 Ohio C. D. 283, that "Yaggy geographical cabinets," consisting of maps on a spring roller, with a cylinder to protect them when not in use, were furnishings and not apparatus under the above statutes.

So, reading charts for use in schools were held in State ex rel. Prosecuting Atty. v. Treasurer (1887) 2 Ohio C. C. 363, 1 Ohio C. D. 532, to be articles which the board of education was authorized to "furnish," and not to be "apparatus."

But under these statutes, it was held in State ex rel. Dunn v. Freed (1895) 10 Ohio C. C. 294, 6 Ohio C. D. 550, that "Kenedy's mathematical blocks," for the demonstration of lessons in arithmetic, were apparatus, which the board of education could purchase only in a limited amount, and not articles which the board could "furnish" without statutory limitation of expenditure.

And the mechanism known as "Andrews's tellurian globes," consisting of globes so arranged as, when operated, to explain the movements of the earth and heavenly bodies with respect to each other, was held in Board of Education v. Andrews (1894) 51 Ohio St. 199, 37 N. E. 260, to be an apparatus, under the above statutes.

The term "furniture," as used in the statute authorizing school trustees to purchase furniture for a schoolhouse, was held in McGee v. Franklin Pub. Co. (1897) 15 Tex. Civ. App. 216, 39 S. W. 335, not to include a "normal series grammar chart." The court said that the term "furniture," as used in the statute, was evidently intended to embrace only such articles as were generally understood to be in general use in schoolhouses as a part of the furniture of the house, as distinguished from appliances and apparatus that might be used in instructing the scholars.

It was held in Com. v. School Bd. (1909) 109 Va. 346, 63 S. E. 1081, that a grant of power conferred by the state legislature on the state board of education, "to select" school furniture for the public schools of the state, was not taken away by implication by the enactment, two days later, of a statute empowering city school boards "to provide" school furniture, as the statutes might be so construed that effect could be given to both.

The purchase by a school director of new seats for a schoolhouse was held authorized in McLaren v. Akron (1882) 48 Mich. 189, 12 N. W. 43, by a resolution passed at the annual school meeting "to fit up the schoolhouse for the winter term."

It was held in Rex v. Easton [1913] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 60, 82 L. J. K. B. N. S. 618, 108 L. T. N. S. 471, 77 J. P. 177, 29 Times L. R. 200, 57 Sol. Jo. 225, 11 L. G. R. 279, that when persons other than a local educational authority provide a new school under statutory provision, the local educational authority has power to provide and pay for the furniture required to equip it as a public elementary school, by reason of the obligation imposed on it by statute to "maintain and keep efficient all public elementary schools within their area, which are necessary."

c. Appliances.

Charts were held to be appliances which a school board was authorized to purchase, in Honaker v. Board of Education (1896) 42 W. Va. 170, 32 L.R.A. 413, 57 Am. St. Rep. 847, 24 S. E. 544, under a statute authorizing the board of education of every district to purchase schoolhouses and grounds, and to provide such furniture, fixtures, and "appliances" for the schoolhouses as the comfort and convenience of the scholars require. The court stated, however, that "the appliance must be something like a blackboard, map, or dictionary, in that one or two may be enough for the use of the whole school, and can be used by the teacher in giving instruction to the pupils. . . . But there are still other necessary restrictions. It must not be a school book in disguise. . . . They must not only be genuine appliances, but they must be shown to be suitable and reasonably necessary for the use of the public schools, for the board has no authority to buy any appliance which is not suitable and necessary; for example, an appliance or apparatus suitable to some branch of learning not required to be taught."

But the purchase of "reading circle books" by a township trustee, for use of the schools of the township, was held unauthorized in First Nat. Bank v. Adams School Twp. (1896) 17 Ind. App. 375, 46 N. E. 832, under a statute giving the trustees "charge of the educational affairs" of the township, empowering them to employ teachers, establish and locate schools, and provide suitable furniture and apparatus," and other articles and educational appliances necessary for the thorough organization and efficient management of said schools." This case was followed without discussion, on similar facts, in Bannister v. Adams School Twp. (1897) 17 Ind. App. 701, 46 N. E. 1154. See also First Nat. Bank v. Osborne (1897) 18 Ind. App. 442, 48 N. E. 256, where it was sought to hold the trustee liable for the purchase price of "reading circle books," purchased for the schools.

d. Heating plants.

It was held in Scola v. Board of Education (1908) 77 N. J. L. 73, 71 Atl. 299, that under the Public School Act of 1903 a board of education had the power to build a central heating plant, from which heat should be distributed through pipes to a group of schoolhouses, situated in the vicinity of, but not adjoining, the central plant.

And in the absence of a statute prohibiting a school district from incurring a debt in excess of the revenue or taxes for the current year, and of a statute authorizing the building of schoolhouses only out of funds provided for that purpose, it was held in School Dist. v. Western Tube Co. (1904) 13 Wyo. 304, 80 Pac. 155, that a school district which was authorized by special legislative authority to construct a school building at a cost of $25,000, and which had issued bonds to this amount, and spent the proceeds in the construction of the building, could incur an indebtedness for a heating plant for the building at an expense of $2,650, it not appearing that this was an unreasonable or extravagant expenditure. The power to incur the indebtedness, it was said, was incident to the power to provide the heating apparatus.

See also Oppenheimer v. Greencastle School Twp. (Ind.) under II. supra.

The purchase by a board of trustees of a piano for use in a high school was held authorized in Knabe v. Board of Education (1887) 67 Mich. 262, 34 N. W. 568, under statutes authorizing the board of trustees to prescribe the course of study to be pursued, to classify and grade pupils and cause them to be taught in such schools or departments as they might deem expedient, and to audit and order the payment of all accounts of the director for incidental or other expenses incurred by him in the discharge of his duties.

And implied power on the part of school authorities to purchase musical instruments, such as an organ, was held to exist in Bellmeyer v. Independent Dist. (1876) 44 Iowa, 565, under statutes providing for examinations of teachers in certain branches of learning, as reading, writing, arithmetic, etc., and providing that each district township at its annual meeting should have power to determine what additional branches should be taught in the schools, and that the board of directors might use any unappropriated contingent fund in the treasury to purchase records, dictionaries, maps, charts, and apparatus for the use of the schools in their district.

So, the purchase by township trustees of music charts for use in the schools was held authorized in Myers Pub. Co. v. White River School Twp. (1901) 28 Ind. App. 91, 62 N. E. 66, under a statute giving trustees charge of the educational affairs of the township, and authorizing them to provide suitable apparatus and other articles and educational appliances necessary for the thorough organization and efficient management of the schools, although music was not one of the branches required to be taught, where a statute authorized the school trustees to provide for the teaching of certain studies such as reading, writing, and arithmetic, and "such other branches of learning" as the advancement of the pupils might require and the trustees might from time to time direct, and this statute had been construed as authorizing the school trustees to provide for the teaching of music in the schools. See this case also under III. supra.

The purchase of land by a board of education for playgrounds and athletic sports, one and one-half blocks from a schoolhouse site, and not contiguous thereto, was held authorized in Reiger v. Board of Education (1919) 287 Ill. 590, 122 N. E. 838, under a statute authorizing boards of education "to buy or lease sites for schoolhouses with the necessary grounds." The contention, which was overruled, was that the power conferred by the statute to acquire "necessary grounds" could only be exercised in connection with the purchase or lease of "sites for schoolhouses," and that the "necessary grounds" must be connected with and contiguous to such sites.

And under the Washington statutes, school districts may acquire land for athletic and playground purposes by purchase (Sorenson v. Perkins (1915) 72 Wash. 16, 129 Pac. 577); or by condemnation proceedings (State ex rel. School Dist. v. Superior Ct. (1912) 69 Wash. 189, 124 Pac. 484).

The grading and fencing of a school lot, the furnishing of a supply of drinking water, and the equipping of the schoolhouse with school furniture are all a legitimate part of the construction of a schoolhouse and the proper equipment of school property, and within a statute empowering a school district to issue bonds for the purpose of purchasing land and building a schoolhouse. State, Chamberlain, Prosecutor, v. Board of Education (1895) 57 N. J. L. 605, 31 Atl. 1033. On error, in (1896) 58 N. J. L. 347, 33 Atl. 923, the judgment was reversed, but was modified as to the above proposition only to the extent of holding that bonds could not be issued for ordinary movable furniture of a school which was not fixed to the building. The court of appeals took the position that the fencing, grading, and furnishing of water were a part of the construction of the schoolhouse, as was also "any furniture which may be constructed with, and permanently affixed to, the building, such as slates and blackboards built in the walls."

As to line fence for school premises as an "appendage," see Creager v. Wright School Dist. (Mich.) under V. a, supra.

A statute giving the school committee of a town, unless the town otherwise directs, general charge and superintendence of the schoolhouses therein, and providing that they shall keep such schoolhouses in good order and provide fuel and all other things necessary for the comfort of the pupils, gives the committee, unless the town otherwise directs, the right to occupy and care for the school grounds, so far as is reasonably necessary for the safe and convenient use of the building, and the health and comfort of the scholars. Day v. Greenfield (1919) — Mass. —, 124 N. E. 481; McKenna v. Kimball (1888) 145 Mass. 555, 14 N. E. 789 (school committee may order the cutting of a tree on the schoolhouse lot).

That school boards may cause the drilling of wells on school premises under statutory authority to provide the necessary appendages for a schoolhouse, see Hemme v. School Dist. (Kan.) under V. a, supra, and Schofield v. School Dist. (reported herewith) ante, 788. See also State, Chamberlain, Prosecutor, v. Board of Education (N. J.) under V. f, supra.

It is held in Neubauer v. Union Twp. (1898) 8 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 349, that a school board may authorize the local school director to make a contract for the sinking of a well, and that a contract entered into for this purpose with the director is binding on the board.

A. Miscellaneous.

The expenditure of money by the directors of an independent school district to secure the establishment of a public highway by the schoolhouse, there being no highway located by it, was held authorized in Independent Dist. v. Kelley (1881) 55 Iowa, 568, 8 N. W. 426, and McShane v. Independent Dist. (1888) 76 Iowa, 383, 41 N. W. 83.

And the power of an independent school district to incur expenditure for the purpose of opening a highway to the school is not limited to cases where the schoolhouse is not on a highway, nor to cases where a private right to pupils to pass is refused, under a statute authorizing the school board to obtain such highway as it deemed necessary, after a vote of the electors. Bogaard v. Independent Dist. (1895) 93 Iowa, 269, 61 N. W. 859.

It was held in Thompson v. Lamar County Agri. High School (1918) 117 Miss. 621, 78 So. 547, that trustees of an agricultural high school had no power to contract an indebtedness for boarding students, under a statute providing that the trustees should have control of the property, elect and fix salaries of teachers, and "shall have full power to do all things necessary for the successful operation" of the school. The boarding of pupils, it was said, was not a public purpose, nor one for which the funds of the institution could be used.

A contract imposing on a school trustee the duty of providing suitable and convenient privies for the school does not preclude him from consulting the taxpayers of the school district, and accepting their decision in respect to the location of a privy and the material out of which it should be built, so as to render void a contract entered into for the building of a privy pursuant to the decision at the school meeting. Rauscher v. Cronk (1888) 21 N. Y. S. R. 529, 3 N. Y. Supp. 470.

The court was of the opinion in Buncombe County v. Malone (1919) — N. C. —, 101 S. E. 552, that power conferred on municipal authorities "to raise the means and erect a new building for school purposes included the right to procure and pay for the ordinary school equipment. This conclusion was not, however, indispensable to the result reached in the case.

The creation of a department of supplies in a municipality, with the power to purchase "all articles of personal property required in the conduct of the business of the city," was held in Board of Public Education v. Ransley (1904) 209 Pa. 51, 58 Atl. 122, not to affect the power of the board of education to order school supplies. To the same effect is Board of Education v. Shoyer (1903) 18 Pa. Dist. R. 170.

A school board has no power to purchase pencils, copybooks, and other writing material for free distribution and use by the pupils under statutory authority to build, repair, and furnish schoolhouses, purchase sites therefor, "and make all other provisions necessary for the convenience and prosperity of the schools," and to determine the amount of money necessary to be levied for the purchase of sites, the erection and furnishing of schoolhouses, "and for other school expenses." Parker v. Board of Education (1884) 12 Ohio L. J. 186.

And a statute providing that each board of education shall establish a sufficient number of schools "to provide for the free education of the youth of school age within its district" does not authorize the board to purchase books and writing materials for free distribution and use by the pupils, in order to comply with the requirement for "free education." Ibid.

Highway — original grade — nonabutting property — injury — liability.

There is no exemption from liability for injury to nonabutting property by bringing a highway to an original grade, which is due to negligence in the performance of the work.

(Ellis, Ch. J., and Main, J., dissent.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County (Ralston, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for injury to plaintiffs' property alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence in the original grading of a street. Reversed. The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Saunders & Nelson, for appellants:

Defendant is not exempt from liability for the injury to plaintiffs' property.

Morris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal from a judgment entered upon the sustaining of a challenge to the sufficiency of the testimony in an action brought to recover damages for injuries claimed to have been sustained in the original grading of a street. The pertinent facts may be briefly stated as follows: Appellants are the owners of three lots abutting upon the west side of Arrowsmith avenue, Seattle. Arrowsmith avenue is parallel to and one block west of Rainier boulevard, and on a hillside above the boulevard. In January, 1914, the city graded and improved Rainier boulevard according to certain plans and specifications which it had adopted and which required a deep cut in that portion of the boulevard east of and opposite to plaintiffs' lots. The soil stratification along Rainier boulevard at the point of the cut is blue clay overlaid by a foot or two of vegetable mold. Soon after the cut was made and this clay bank exposed it began to disintegrate and slough off gradually, continuing until it involved all of the block between Rainier boulevard and Arrowsmith avenue, and then extended across Arrowsmith avenue until it seriously involved appellants' property. The extent of this slide is not material, as the only question involved is whether or not appellants can recover.

The second amended complaint upon which the case was tried alleged that the grade to which Rainier boulevard was cut was unreasonable and unnecessary; that the work was done in a careless manner and under defective plans; that the city knew at the time of the grading that the result would be injurious to plaintiffs' property, and that no provision was made for taking care of the exposed clay bank, or to protect it from the natural effect of the surface water, or in providing necessary drainage for such water, or for furnishing lateral support to the property lying to the west of the boulevard. As before stated, there is no question of the sufficiency of the evidence as to the character or extent of the injury suffered by appellants; the only question here involved being whether or not the case falls within what is known as the original-grade doctrine. In support of the allegation of negligence appellants' testimony was to the effect that the stability of a clay bank such as was left exposed in the cut depends upon the amount of the water to which the bank is exposed; that the nature of the clay soil in that region is such that it absorbs water very readily, and that the effect of such absorption or of permitting surface water to come in contact with the clay bank is to immediately start disintegration, causing a sliding of the exposed bank; that in turn the new bank becomes saturated and a like effect occurs until, as the engineer testifying for appellants puts it, "you reach another line or suitable equilibrium." As further explanatory of the situation we quote from the testimony of the engineer: "When that cut was made in the clay, the bank of clay was exposed and that immediately started the traveling action, because the clay on the surface that was exposed, when the sun hit it, cracked, just as you have seen cracks in clay in many places. The next rainy season came along and these cracks filled with water, and those little masses of clay sprawled off until they fell at the foot of the slope, and as the next layer would break, it would go through the same process, until it has worked back up to and beyond Lochore's property at the present time. . . . If you can conceive of a tier of blocks standing one after the other, each one supported by the block below, if you take out the block below, that would permit the next one to fall, and when that fell, it would permit the next and so on until you reached the top of the slope; . . . as the support from the clay is undermined and allowed to flow out, that brings down the next mass above it on the uphill side."

The lower court, in making the ruling complained of, was of the opinion that when it appeared that this was an original grade the case was controlled by Schuss v. Chehalis, 82 Wash. 595, 144 Pac. 916, and Best v. Chehalis, 82 Wash. 601, 144 Pac. 918, and other like cases therein cited in which we have held that a city is not liable to abutting property owners for the removal of lateral support in making an original grade of a dedicated street where the grading is done wholly within the limits of the street. This rule has become the settled law of this state. Without referring to the cases it may be said the reason for the rule is found in variant expressions of the controlling principle that the right to make an original grade is implied in the grant of dedication, and that the abutting property owner holds subject to this right whenever the city may see fit to exercise it. In so far as our cases hold to this rule it will be noted that in each case damages were sought because of the removal of lateral support or the doing of some other act wholly within the limits of the street without evidence of negligence in the prosecution of the work. This appears in all the cases from the first announcement of the rule in Fletcher v. Seattle, 43 Wash. 627, 86 Pac. 1046, 88 Pac. 843, down to the Schuss and Best Cases. In the last two cases, notwithstanding allegations in the complaint to the contrary, it was expressly found that there was no evidence of any negligent act on the part of the city. Stated otherwise, we have held that in such cases the city was performing a legal act in a proper manner, and that damages flowing from such act would fall within the rule of damnum absque injuria. This case presents a different phase. The complaint alleged, and we have quoted sufficient of the testimony to indicate that there was proof from which the jury might find, that the city was negligent in leaving this clay bank exposed and unprotected, knowing or being charged with knowledge of the natural result of the disintegration of the bank and the consequent sliding of the soil behind it and to which it acted as a support. Save for the original-grade feature this case is analogous to Johanson v. Seattle, 80 Wash. 527, 141 Pac. 1032, where like injury occurred from like cause save that in the Johanson Case, following Farnandis v. Great Northern R. Co.

41 Wash. 486, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1086, 111 Am. St. Rep. 1027, 84 Pac. 18, we held that if the damage was the proximate result of the regrade it was immaterial whether or not it was the result of negligence in the doing of the work, but that the liability was founded upon the constitutional inhibition against damaging private property for public use without just compensation. The lateral support rule announced in these two cases as not dependent upon negligence, but as founded upon the constitutional provision requiring compensation for private property damaged by public use, was first announced in Parke v. Seattle, 5 Wash. 1, 20 L.R.A. 68, 34 Am. St. Rep. 839, 31 Pac. 310, 32 Pac. 82, where, prior to the adoption of the Constitution, it was held that a municipality was liable for negligence in depriving an abutting owner of his lateral support in regrading its streets. This case was followed by Brown v. Seattle, 5 Wash. 35, 18 L.R.A. 161, 31 Pac. 313, 32 Pac. 214, where it was held that the dedication of a street to public use does not authorize a municipality to raise or lower the surface of a street to any extent it may deem proper without, under the constitutional provision, subjecting itself to damages for injury to an abutting owner. Next came Smith v. Seattle, 18 Wash. 484, 63 Am. St. Rep. 910, 51 Pac. 1057, where a right of action was recognized in a property owner whose lot was from 130 to 175 feet distant from the street to recover damages for the negligent removal of his lateral support in regrading a street. Another late case is Jorguson v. Seattle, 80 Wash. 126, 141 Pac. 334, where it was sought to recover damages caused by the sliding of the soil of the lots upon one street, growing out of the regrading of another. The action was defeated because of the failure of the property owner to show any damages sustained within thirty days prior to the filing of his claim and up to the date of trial. In speaking of the constitutional inhibition against the taking of private property for public use without just compensation, it was said: "The above-mentioned provision of the Constitution was never intended to apply to consequential or resultant damages not anticipated in, nor a part of, the plan of a public work. It was never intended to apply to damages resulting to private property from the negligent or wrongful use of public property. As to such damages, tortious in their very inception, the injured person is remitted to his remedy on the case, as in other cases of tortious taking or injury. For example: Suppose, in the prosecution of an improvement, the city unnecessarily and negligently temporarily obstructs the ingress, or egress, or the access of light and air to private property neither taken nor in any manner required in the prosecution of the work. It is obvious that this would be an invasion of a property right, but not a taking or damaging within the meaning of the constitutional limitation upon the power of eminent domain. It would be a tort, pure and simple, for which an action for damages would lie independently of the constitutional limitation. Again, suppose the city, in improving a street or a city park, set off a blast which cast stones upon private property, littering the lawn or injuring the buildings. This would be also a simple tort, and nothing else, for which an action would lie and be protected by the due process clause of the Constitution, even were § 16 of article 1 eliminated from that instrument. Of course, in the broad sense, the Constitution, by the due process clause, protects every property right from tortious invasion, but that clause must not be confounded with the clause above mentioned, which is intended only as a limitation upon the otherwise unlimited sovereign power of eminent domain, not as extending an additional guaranty as against negligence or tortious wrongs or ordinary breaches of contract by municipal corporations."

It may be said that much of the above is dicta. It is quoted, however, as illustrative of the doctrine that a city is liable for its negligence or tort in prosecuting public work, and that it cannot protect itself from negligence by a plea that the damages were caused in the exercise of its sovereign capacity. In Wood v. Tacoma, 66 Wash. 266, 119 Pac. 859, one of the cases holding to the rule of nonliability in original grades, there was a charge of negligence in the collection of surface water upon the abutting lots. This claim is disposed of by holding that the city is not liable in damages for injuries to private property by the collection of surface water, as it is an injury resulting from the proper exercise of a legal power. In considering this question of negligence, however, it was said: "There remains to be considered the question of negligence. It must be conceded that a municipal corporation, like an individual, is liable for injuries resulting from the negligent exercise of legitimate powers."

The opinion then proceeds to state that there was no evidence that the city in that case did not furnish adequate drainage for the district, or evidence tending to show there was any improper or negligent construction. The case of Hinckley v. Seattle, 74 Wash. 101, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 727, 132 Pac. 855, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 580, presents somewhat apposite principles as to the determinative rule, though the case differs from the Johanson Case and the case at bar in that an injury was caused to a property owner a block down the hillside by the sliding of the earth upon his lot, due to the sinking of the street above pushing the lot abutting upon the street down upon his property. In the Jorguson, Johanson, and Hinckley Cases the damages grew out of the regrading of the streets, but in none of those cases is it held that this fact in any wise determines or controls the right of action. In the Schuss Case, the Jorguson and Johanson Cases are referred to as regrade cases, but it was not intended, we take it, by this observation to mean that no element of damages recoverable in a regrade case would be recoverable in an original-grade case. The intent of such observation is made clear in the succeeding sentence, where it was said: "There being no evidence of an encroachment upon the respondent's property or of negligence in the prosecution of the work, the city is immune from liability,"—thus leaving undetermined whether or not a city would be exempt from liability in an original-grade case where there was evidence of an encroachment or of negligence in the doing of the work. Summing up these and various other cases from our own state it is apparent that this court has sought to distinguish between cases where the invasion of a property right was a taking or damaging within the meaning of the constitutional limitation upon the power of eminent domain, irrespective of negligence, and cases of injury to private property in the wrongful use or negligent improvement of public property. In the one case the remedy arises out of the constitutional limitation; in the other it exists irrespective of that limitation. Dillon in his Municipal Corporations, vol. 2, § 987, in his opening statement of the rule of nonliability for consequential damages when a municipality, in grading its streets, is acting within its powers and jurisdiction, confines the rule to cases where there has been "no want of reasonable care or want of reasonable skill in the exercise of the power." Cooley, J., in Pontiac v. Carter, 32 Mich. 164, in holding that a city was not liable to abutting property owners for damages in grading streets, irrespective of whether damages are consequential to an original or regrade, concludes his opinion by asserting that while the city is exempt from all damages resulting from the doing in a proper manner of that which it has a right to do, it is not exempt from damages caused by negligence or trespass. In the note to Hickman v. Kansas City, 23 L.R.A. 658, the annotator, in citing the rule that damages arising from the first grade or improvement of city streets are not recoverable by abutting owners, says such rule only applies in the absence of negligence, citing, among other cases which sustain the exception, Wallace v. Muscatine, 4 G. Greene, 373, 61 Am. Dec. 131; Gardner v. Scranton, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 574; Broadwell v. Kansas, 75 Mo. 213, 42 Am. Rep. 406; Ellis v. Iowa City, 29 Iowa, 229. See also Stein v. La Fayette, 6 Ind. App. 414, 33 N. E. 912; Kemp v. Des Moines, 125 Iowa, 640, 101 N. W. 474; Damkoehler v. Milwaukee, 124 Wis. 144, 101 N. W. 706, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 745.

Our conclusion is that a city is liable in the original construction and grading of its streets where there is sufficient proof that injury is suffered from any negligent act of the city in the performance of the work.

Chadwick, J., concurring:

I concur in the result, but I believe the cases discussed by the court have no application to the facts of this case as revealed by the testimony. With the exception of the Hinckley Case, 74 Wash. 101, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 727, 132 Pac. 855, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 580, they are cases where damages had resulted to abutting lots. The appellants in this case do not come within the law defining the rights of an abutting owner, nor is the city privileged to claim the benefit of establishing an original grade. The rights and liabilities of appellants as "abutting owners" and of the city were all absorbed in the grading and improvement of Arrowsmith avenue, the street abutting their property.

The damages in this case are recoverable under the general rules of law just as appellants would have been entitled to recover if the city had operated a quarry 300 feet away and had negligently blasted débris upon their property. The grading which ultimately resulted in damage to appellants' property was done on a street 300 feet away. By gradual waste and recession, or "traveling" as suggested by one witness, the slide finally invaded and undermined appellants' lots. The testimony shows that the character of the property was such that the city knew, or ought to have known, that its plan was defective in that it did not provide any method or means of counteracting the natural gravitation of the peculiar clay strata through which the cut was made. It is for this reason, and not because appellants are to be treated as abutting owners who have suffered from the negligent construction of the street, that I concur in the judgment of the court.

Main, J., dissenting:

I am unable to distinguish this case from the case of Schuss v. Chelalis, 82 Wash. 595, 144 Pac. 916, and the earlier holdings of this court there cited and reviewed. In the Schuss Case damages were sought against the city for the original grade of a street by which the lateral support from the plaintiffs' lots was removed. As the opinion states: "The formation of the lots is soapstone or shale rock, overlaid with gumbo and black soil."

In grading the street, the city made a vertical cut of about 6½ feet at or near the line of the plaintiffs' lots, but wholly within the limits of the street. There was no evidence that the city encroached upon plaintiffs' property or that it was negligent in carrying on the work, "other than the admitted fact that it removed the lateral support in the manner stated." It was there held that, "there being no evidence of an encroachment upon the respondents' [plaintiffs'] property or of negligence in the prosecution of the work, the city is immune from liability."

In the present case, "the soil stratification along Rainier boulevard at the point of the cut is blue clay overlaid by a foot or two of vegetable mold."

The cut there referred to was made wholly within the limits of the street, as in the Schuss Case, and there is no evidence of negligence in the prosecution of the work by the city. The majority opinion, if I understand it correctly, attempts to make negligence of the prosecution of the work on the original grade of a street and the removal of lateral support dependent upon the character of the soil of the adjacent property. In other words, if the soil is of such character that, when the cut is exposed to the elements, it is reasonably probable that a slide will occur, then the city is negligent in the prosecution of the work. On the other hand, if the soil of the adjacent property is not such that there is a reasonable probability that it will slide when the cut is exposed to the elements, then there is not negligence in the prosecution of the work. This distinction is not recognized in the Schuss Case, which, it seems to me, is parallel upon the facts, nor in any of the earlier holdings. If the Schuss Case and the cases upon which it is based do not correctly state the law, they should be modified or overruled. To make a distinction where no substantial distinction exists tends to make the law confusing and uncertain.

For the reasons stated, I dissent.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of municipality for injury to lateral support in grading street.

- I. Introductory, 806.
- II. Rule that municipality is liable, 806.
- III. Rule that municipality is not liable, 807.
- IV. Effect of negligence, 809.

I. Introductory.

The liability of a municipality for injury to lateral support in grading a street has been variously treated by the courts. By some, injury to lateral support is regarded merely as an element of damages, such as interference with access by changing grade. In this view the liability is dependent upon the view adopted upon the general question of liability of a municipality for changing the grade of a street. By other courts injury to lateral support by changing the grade of a street is not regarded as a mere element of damages, but is, as in the case of adjoining private owners, treated as a substantive cause of action. In the latter view, the liability extends only to the land in its natural condition, and not as burdened with buildings. This rule, which applies as between individuals as to the right to lateral support, has been stated to be applicable to cases in which a municipality is a party. Talcott Bros. v. Des Moines (1906) 134 Iowa, 113, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 696, 120 Am. St. Rep. 419, 109 N. W. 311. But see holding in this case infra. And see cases cited in subd. II.

It seems clear that if the municipality is negligent in removing lateral support it is liable therefor, and this is the theory of the cases that have passed on this question, as appears from subd. IV. infra.

II. Rule that municipality is liable.

It is the view of a number of cases that a municipality which has interfered with the lateral support of an abutting owner in grading a street is liable therefor. Hartshorn v. Worcester County (1873) 113 Mass. 111; Dyer v. St. Paul (1881) 27 Minn. 457, 8 N. W. 272; Nichols v. Duluth (1889)

40 Minn. 389, 12 Am. St. Rep. 743, 32 N. W. 84; Stearns v. Richmond (1892) 88 Va. 992, 29 Am. St. Rep. 758, 14 S. E. 847; Parke v. Seattle (1892) 5 Wash. 1, 20 L.R.A. 68, 34 Am. St. Rep. 839, 31 Pac. 310, 32 Pac. 82, approved in Brown v. Seattle (1892) 5 Wash. 35, 18 L.R.A. 161, 31 Pac. 313, 32 Pac. 214, and Smith v. Seattle (1898) 18 Wash. 484, 63 Am. St. Rep. 910, 51 Pac. 1057. But see subsequent Washington cases which limit the liability to change from established grade to another. Damkoehler v. Milwaukee (1905) 124 Wis. 144, 101 N. W. 706, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 745.

It was not denied in Schroeder v. Joliet (1901) 189 Ill. 48, 52 L.R.A. 634, 59 N. E. 550, that a municipality which cut down a street and removed the lateral support from abutting property was liable therefor. The only question raised in that case was as to the measure of damages.

See Henderson v. McClain (1897) 102 Ky. 402, 39 L.R.A. 349, 43 S. W. 700, infra, III.

Liability has been limited in some cases to injury to lateral support in making a change of grade as distinguished from an original grade. Cassassa v. Seattle (1911) 66 Wash. 146, 119 Pac. 13, same case on second appeal in (1913) 75 Wash. 367, 134 Pac. 1080. The municipality, intending to cut down the grade of the street, condemned land on either side of the street for the purpose of making a slope which was thought sufficient to prevent sliding. The slope was insufficient, and the municipality was held liable for the removal of lateral support to the remaining parts of the lots.

That there is a liability for the removal of lateral support in changing grades is the theory upon which Farnandis v. Seattle (1917) 95 Wash. 587, 164 Pac. 225, proceeds.

The removal of lateral support of the soil of premises bordering on the limits of a highway in making highway improvements, to the extent of causing a part of the land to subside and fall, so as to injure the premises so affected, has been held an actual appropriation of the soil to the extent of such injury, and amounts to a taking of it for public purposes. Damkoehler v. Milwaukee (1905) (Wis.) supra.

The cost of a retaining wall, made necessary upon the lowering of the grade of a street, was held to be a proper element of damages in Hill v. Oakmont (1911) 47 Pa. Super. Ct. 261.

The fact that a retaining wall was necessary to protect property abutting upon a street which had been cut down by the municipality was one of the elements of damages considered in Richardson v. Webster City (1900) 111 Iowa, 427, 82 N. W. 920, but nothing is said upon the question of lateral support. It seems to have been conceded that the city acted without any ordinance authorizing it. See Talcott Bros. v. Des Moines (1906) 134 Iowa, 113, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 696, 120 Am. St. Rep. 419, 109 N. W. 311, infra, III.

The cost of erecting a retaining wall along the front of property to supply lateral support thereto which was removed in grading a street cannot be assessed upon the property, since the municipality may not divest the landowner of what he is entitled to enjoy as a natural right, and then tax upon him the cost of replacing what has thus been taken away. Armstrong v. St. Paul (1883) 30 Minn. 299, 15 N. W. 174.

In some cases in which the city is stated to be negligent, the only negligence consisted in doing the work under conditions which made it apparent that a slide would result. In Parke v. Seattle (1882) 5 Wash. 1, 20 L.R.A. 68, 34 Am. St. Rep. 839, 31 Pac. 310, 32 Pac. 82, it is held that knowledge by the city of the character of soil and of its certainty to cave so as to materially injure the beneficial use of abutting land makes it negligence for the city to go on with the work without providing means to resist the threatened calamity. See the reported case (LOCHORE v. SEATTLE, ante, 800).

An action by an abutting landowner against the city for removal of lateral support is not necessarily based upon negligence. Johanson v. Seattle (1914) 80 Wash. 527, 141 Pac. 1032.

Some cases, in applying the rule as to liability for removal of lateral support as it exists between individuals, hold that there is no liability for damages to buildings on abutting property from the removal of lateral support, where the work is done with due care. Quincy v. Jones (1875) 76 Ill. 231, 20 Am. Rep. 243. That the right to lateral support does not extend to cases in which there are buildings increasing the downward and lateral pressure is recognized in Stearns v. Richmond (1892) 88 Va. 992, 29 Am. St. Rep. 758, 14 S. E. 847, but it is there held that when "land upon which there are buildings slides or subsides by reason of such digging, and the buildings are in consequence damaged also, and their weight in no way contributed to the result, then the damage done to the buildings may be taken into consideration in estimating the damages."

Abutting landowners cannot, by the erection of buildings, acquire a prescriptive right to lateral support as against a municipality. Mitchell v. Rome (1873) 49 Ga. 19, 15 Am. Rep. 669; Quincy v. Jones (1875) 76 Ill. 231, 20 Am. Rep. 243.

III. Rule that municipality is not liable.

According to other cases there is no liability for removal of lateral support in grading a street. These decisions are based upon different theories.

The view is taken in some cases that where the legislature has granted authority to municipalities to grade streets without providing for the payment of consequential damages, a municipality which is acting regularly in grading a street is not liable for the damages to an abutting owner which result from digging away a bank in the side of the street which is a natural support of the abutting owner's land, a portion of which, as a result thereof, falls into the street. Radcliff v. Brooklyn (1850) 4 N. Y. 195, 53 Am. Dec. 357; Cheever v. Shedd (1876) 13 Blatchf. 253, Fed. Cas. No. 2,634.

In New York, an abutting owner is entitled to lateral support, or compensation for its destruction, as against a municipality which is constructing a subway. Re Rapid Transit R. Comrs. (1909) 197 N. Y. 81, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 647, 90 N. E. 456, 18 Ann. Cas. 366. Citing this case as authority, the court in the subsequent case of Lincoln Safe Deposit Co. v. New York (1913) 210 N. Y. 34, L.R.A.1915F, 1009, 103 N. E. 768, states that an abutting owner has the right to lateral support "except as to excavations made for street purposes." This rule was applied in Susswein v. Bradley Contracting Co. (1918) 184 App. Div. 852, 172 N. Y. Supp. 652, where the lateral support of an abutting owner was injured in the construction of a subway. The court in the Susswein Case states the rule very broadly, saying that "it is now . . . the established law of this state that, regardless of who owns the fee of a public street, an abutting owner thereon has an easement for lateral support of which he cannot be deprived without just compensation, and that when the fee is acquired for public street purposes it is held by the municipality not in absolute ownership, but in trust for the use of the people of the state, and subject to such easements for lateral support as well as to easements of light, air, and access, and that such damages cannot be considered and an award made therefor in the ordinary proceeding for acquiring the land for public street purposes."

In New York Steam Co. v. Foundation Co. (1909) 195 N. Y. 43, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 470, 87 N. E. 765, an action by a steam heating company for injuries to one of its steam pipe lines by a contractor in constructing a vault in the street in which the pipe line was located, it is stated that the rights of the parties are not controlled by the common-law doctrine of lateral support; that that doctrine is limited to adjacent lands under private ownership, except that while it requires the adjacent landowner to preserve the lateral support to a public highway, it does not require the municipality owning the highway to preserve the lateral support to the adjacent land.

In Iowa, a municipality takes title in fee to the streets by authority of statute, and it is held that title thus secured by a municipal corporation to a strip of land for street purposes includes the right to bring it to grade, and therefore, injury done to abutting property by so doing in removing the lateral support is not a taking entitling the owner to further compensation, even though it results in the slipping of the abutting property into the street. Talcott Bros. v. Des Moines (1906) 134 Iowa, 113, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 696, 120 Am. St. Rep. 419, 109 N. W. 311. On this theory, in Austin v. Detroit, Y. & A. A. R. Co. (1903) 134 Mich. 149, 96 N. W. 35, 2 Ann. Cas. 530, an abutting landowner was held not entitled to recover for the lowering of the grade of the highway by a railroad company so as to subject his fence and land to the danger of sliding into the highway.

In Taylor v. St. Louis (1851) 14 Mo. 20, 55 Am. Dec. 89, where the court refused to allow damages to an abutting owner for removal of lateral support in grading an alley, the court, after stating that the alley was laid out by the plaintiffs themselves, continues that the probability "of its being graded when the public interest required it must have been calculated on when the buildings were erected. To grade a street or alley already dedicated to public use is not an exercise of the eminent domain so as to require compensation. It is not appropriating private property to public use, but simply an exercise of power over what is already public property. The damage resulting by causing the plaintiffs to rebuild or prop up their falling walls is consequential, and as it is a consequence of the exercise of a power granted by the state to municipal corporations for public purposes, and the power has not been abused, but skilfully and discreetly exercised, the city authorities are not responsible."

In Buskirk v. Strickland (1882) 47 Mich. 389, 11 N. W. 210, street commissioners of a municipality who entered upon a street which had been dedicated as a public street, but which, so far as appears, had not been accepted by the municipality, not for the purpose of opening the land as a street, but for the purpose of procuring gravel for use in other parts of the village, were held liable for injury to lateral support of adjoining property.

Some cases, in denying liability for removal of lateral support in grading a street, confine the rule to an original grade. Schuss v. Chehalis (1914) 82 Wash. 595, 144 Pac. 916; Best v. Chehalis (1914) 82 Wash. 601, 144 Pac. 918; Hollenbeck v. Seattle (1915) 88 Wash. 322, 153 Pac. 418. In Schuss v. Chehalis (Wash.) supra, it is stated to have "become the settled law in this state that there can be no recovery for the removal of lateral support by a city in making an original grade, where the grading is done wholly within the limits of the street, in the absence of evidence tending to show that the city was negligent in the prosecution of the work. This rule is grounded upon the principle that, in dedicating a street, the dedicator impliedly grants the right to grade it so as to make it usable and so as to make the surrounding property accessible." It was alleged in this case that the municipality was negligent, but there was no evidence that it was negligent in carrying on the work, other than the admitted fact that it removed the lateral support from the premises in question. The decision in Marks v. Seattle (1915) 88 Wash. 61, 152 Pac. 706, proceeds upon the theory that there is a liability for removal of lateral support in changing the grade of a street, but that decision is taken up largely with other questions. Compare with the reported case (LOCHORE v. SEATTLE, ante, 800). The LOCHORE CASE was followed in Allbin v. Seattle (1917) 98 Wash. 275, 167 Pac. 922, where the lot for the injury to which damages were sought to be recovered abutted upon the street that was being graded, and was not separated by intervening land, as was the fact in the reported case.

As stated by Main, J., dissenting, it is difficult to distinguish LOCHORE v. SEATTLE, ante, 800, from the case of Schuss v. Chehalis (1914) 82 Wash. 595, 144 Pac. 916. It is clear that the majority opinion in the reported case (LOCHORE v. SEATTLE) is based upon negligence of the municipality in doing the work; but as to what that negligence consisted of is not clear beyond the fact that the bank was left exposed and unprotected.

So far as removal of lateral support is regarded merely as an element of damages, from a change of street grade, it is apparent that cases which pass upon the general question of liability for a change of grade have a direct bearing upon the question herein annotated. The present note, however, has been confined to cases dealing expressly with the removal of lateral support. Of interest in this connection is the case of Henderson v. McClain (1897) 102 Ky. 402, 39 L.R.A. 349, 43 S. W. 700, where a municipality which, in grading a street, excavated in front of and adjoining a lot to such an extent as to ruin the fence and inclosure, wholly destroying the access to and use of the street, and leaving the surface of the lot from 8 to 10 feet above the street and sidewalk, so that to protect the lot from constant caving which would finally destroy a house situated thereon a wall was necessary along the whole front, was held liable in damages under a Constitution requiring compensation for property taken, injured, or destroyed. There is no discussion, however, of the interference with the lateral support.

IV. Effect of negligence.

If the city has been negligent in grading the street, it is liable for injury to lateral support. In Keating v. Cincinnati (1882) 38 Ohio St. 141, 43 Am. Rep. 421, a municipality which cut down the grade of a street so that the plaintiff's lot, which was separated from the street by an intervening lot, was injured by the slipping of the earth, caused by the removal of the lateral support, was held liable. It was claimed on behalf of the municipality that, as the plaintiff's lot did not abut on the street improved, and as the damages resulted from the removal of the lateral support to the abutting property, the city was not liable. In answer to this contention the court states that "the fact that the property of others intervened between the lot of the plaintiff and the avenue can make no difference. The liability would be the same whether the several parcels were owned by one or by different owners. The liability of the city did not depend upon the character of the ownership of the damaged property, but upon the extent to which its wrongful act was the cause of the damages. In regard to the buildings and improvements, it may be said that there is nothing in their character or in the circumstances to indicate that the slide in the lands would not have occurred as it did if they had not been there. The additional weight which they imposed cannot reasonably be supposed to have contributed materially to the giving away of the soil." The petition in this case charged that the municipality illegally and wrongfully caused the grade to be cut down, and the court states that the evidence in the case would have warranted the jury in finding that the city failed to exercise care and skill in making the grade in question. This case was followed in Columbus v. Jaeger (1896) 55 Ohio St. 644, 48 N. E. 1011.

See the reported case (LOCHORE v. SEATTLE, ante, 800). As stated above, it is not clear what the negligence of the municipality consisted of in the reported case. If there is no liability for removal of lateral support in grading a street, it is difficult to see how the mere removal of such support can constitute negligence which does render the municipality liable.

In Meares v. Wilmington (1848) 31 N. C. (9 Ired. L.) 73, 49 Am. Dec. 412, where the municipality did not use ordinary skill and caution in doing the work, it was held liable for cutting down the grade of a street to the depth of 4 or 5 feet, by which the earth of an abutting lot was caused to fall, bearing with it certain walls, and rendering it necessary to the owner to be at expense in reconstructing the wall, and either to grade down the lot to the level of the street, or construct additional walls and steps, to render it as valuable as before the digging.

A municipality which "maliciously and without cause, etc., dug up and destroyed . . . street, pavements, ways, etc., to the depth of 5 feet, took and removed the stone, earth, and gravel, etc., by reason of which the walls of his [plaintiff's] house were injured, his cellar destroyed, and himself and family deprived of the use of his house," was held liable to the plaintiff in Goodloe v. Cincinnati (1831) 4 Ohio, 500, 22 Am. Dec. 764. The doctrine of lateral support is not referred to, however. A municipality was held liable under similar conditions in Smith v. Cincinnati (1831) 4 Ohio, 514, where the declaration did not charge the municipality with having acted maliciously. W. A. E.

v.

TACOMA RAILWAY & POWER COMPANY, Respt.

(— Wash. —, 184 Pac. 344.)

Covenant — maintenance of railroad — term.

1. A covenant to build and maintain a railroad in consideration of a grant of a right of way and other property does not require operation in perpetuity, but is satisfied by operation for twenty-five years.

[See note on this question beginning on page 817.]

(— Wash. —, 184 Pac. 344.)

— to maintain railroad — running with land.

2. An agreement by a railroad company, in consideration of a grant of a right of way and other property connected therewith, to build and operate a railroad from the property to a city, is a covenant running with the remaining land of the grantor.

Action — for breach of covenant — successors of covenantee.

3. Persons acquiring through foreclosure sale the remaining land of one who has granted a right of way to a railroad company, upon conditions running with the land that a railroad shall be maintained and operated thereon, are the proper parties to maintain an action for damages for breach of the covenant.

(Holcomb, Ch. J., dissents.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County (Card, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for breach of a covenant to maintain a railroad. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Guy E. Kelly and Thomas MacMahon, for appellants:

This covenant to maintain the railroad complies with all the requirements of a covenant running with the land.

Withers v. Wabash R. Co. 122 Mo. App. 282, 99 S. W. 34; Whalen v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 108 Md. 11, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 130, 129 Am. St. Rep. 423, 69 Atl. 390.

Even if the covenant technically did not run with the land, it would be enforceable against the defendant, since the defendant had notice of it.

Maurer v. Friedman, 125 App. Div. 754, 110 N. Y. Supp. 320.

Mr. F. D. Oakley, for respondent:

The conditions in the contract must be construed as a condition subsequent, and not as a covenant running with the land.

Mills v. Seattle & M. R. Co. 10 Wash. 520, 39 Pac. 246; Mouat v. Seattle, L. S. & E. R. Co. 16 Wash. 84, 47 Pac. 233; Mead v. Ballard, 7 Wall. 290, 19 L. ed. 190; School Dist. v. Wallowa County, 71 Or. 337, 142 Pac. 320; Sherman v. Jefferson, 274 Ill. 294, 113 N. E. 624; Fowler v. Coates, 201 N. Y. 257, 94 N. E. 997.

A breach of a condition subsequent can be taken advantage of only by the grantor, his heirs, or devisees; his grantees, whether before or after the breach, acquire no right to enforce a forfeiture, or to recover damages therefor.

Ruch v. Rock Island, 97 U. S. 693, 24 L. ed. 1101; School Dist. v. Wallowa County, 71 Or. 337, 142 Pac. 320; Fowler v. Coates, 201 N. Y. 257, 94 N. E. 997; Golconda Northern R. Co. v. Gulf

Lines Connecting R. Co. 265 Ill. 194, 106 N. E. 818, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 833; Kakeldy v. Columbia & P. S. R. Co. 37 Wash. 675, 80 Pac. 205; 13 Cyc. 692; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 6th ed. §§ 954-957.

The contract does not impose the duty to operate the railway in perpetuity, or during any specified period, and all the terms thereof were substantially complied with by the operation of the railroad for a period of twenty-five years.

Mead v. Ballard, 7 Wall. 290, 19 L. ed. 190; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Marshall, 136 U. S. 393, 34 L. ed. 385, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 846; Fowler v. Coates, 201 N. Y. 257, 94 N. E. 997; Whalen v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 112 Md. 187, 76 Atl. 166; Newton v. Mahoning County, 100 U. S. 562, 25 L. ed. 712; Union Stockyards Co. v. Nashville Packing Co. 72 C. C. A. 195, 140 Fed. 706; Lucas v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 64 C. C. A. 638, 130 Fed. 438.

If the contract should be construed as imposing an obligation upon the respondent to operate the road in perpetuity as originally located, it is void as against public policy.

Mackintosh, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Respondent's predecessor was incorporated for the purpose of building and operating an electric railroad line between Tacoma and Steilacoom. One Whyte at the time was owner of section 22, which was situated near the line of the proposed railroad. Whyte platted a portion of the southwest quarter of that section, and, by written agreement with the railroad company, agreed to convey to it the E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$ , E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$ , blocks 7, 8, 15, 16, together with a strip of land 30 feet wide through the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the section upon which the railroad had been located. The agreement between Whyte and the railroad company provided that Whyte should give a warranty deed to it and its assigns, which deed was to be deposited in escrow "to be delivered to the said party of the second part upon the performance by the said party of the second part of the following covenants and conditions, that is to say:

"The said party of the second part is to pay to the said parties of the first part the sum of $1, amount expressed in said deed as the consideration thereof, and shall on or before the 30th day of January, 1891, build, equip, and operate a narrow-gauge railroad between its point of beginning at, in, or near the city limits of the city of Tacoma, Pierce county, state of Washington, along, through, over, and by that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land belonging to the said party of the first part, particularly described as follows:

"A strip of land thirty (30) feet in width through the southeast one quarter of section No. twenty-two (22) in township No. twenty (20) north of range two (2) east of Willamette M., said strip being fifteen (15) feet on either side of the center line of the railroad track of the said party of the second part as the same is now located, and shall be hereafter constructed through said tract, which said last described tract of land the said parties of the first part for the consideration of $1, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do hereby grant and convey unto the said party of the second part, its successors and assigns forever, in fee simple for the use and purpose of a right of way for said railroad, forever, disclaiming any and all interest in and to said tract, provided, however, that said party of the second part shall use said described tract for the purpose of said right of way and other railroad purposes, and from thence to such a point at or near section 29 in township 20, north of range 2, E. W. M. (or further, if considered practicable or desirable), as the said party of the second part may determine, and shall at all times maintain and operate said narrow-gauge railroad, either by itself or assigns, between its terminal points, and shall establish and maintain a station at such point upon or near the land last hereinabove described as shall be determined on, on the line of said railroad, and as shall be most advantageous to the parties hereto, and shall stop the trains of said railroad at such stations on all trips either coming or going between said terminal points, for the accommodation of the parties of the first part herein and any and all passengers who may desire or seek transportation from said station by said route or line of railroad.

"And it is stipulated, understood, and agreed by and between the parties to this contract that as soon as said line of railroad is established, completed, and equipped along and upon said last described lands, said Pacific National Bank, who holds said deed in escrow, shall and may then deliver as the act and deed of the parties of the first part the said deed to the party of the second part herein for its own use and benefit, and for the benefit of its assigns.

"And it is understood and agreed between the parties hereto that the party of the second part is to have the immediate possession and control of said premises from and after the execution of said contract, and should said party of the second part fail to build and equip said railroad and to build and maintain such station as herein provided, then the said Pacific National Bank, who holds said deed in escrow, shall deliver said deed back to said parties of the first part, their heirs or assigns, and this agreement shall thereupon be void and of no effect."

The railroad company constructed the road, obtained the deed, and took possession of the property, selling and disposing of that portion thereof not used by it for its right of way. At the time of platting, Whyte mortgaged all of the S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the section except the E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  and E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$ , to the Mason Mortgage Company, which sold the mortgage to the ancestor of the plaintiffs, who purchased the mortgage, relying upon the value of the property as the same was enhanced by the railroad and transportation facilities; the property not then or now being worth the purchase price, except as the same should be connected with Tacoma by adequate transportation facilities. Thereafter the respondent in this action purchased all the property and franchises of the Tacoma & Steilacoom Railway Company, and operated the road for twenty-five years or more. The appellants' ancestor was compelled to and did foreclose the mortgage and bought in the property at the mortgage sale, and died, devising the property to the appellants. Thereafter the respondent discontinued the operation of the railroad at this point, and tore up and abandoned the same, and the appellants brought this action at law, seeking to recover damages from the respondent for its failure to comply with the agreements in its contract, upon the theory that these agreements constituted covenants running with the land, and that the abandonment of the railroad constituted a breach of such covenants which entitled the appellants to maintain an action for damages. A demurrer was sustained to the complaint, and the action was dismissed, upon which this appeal was taken.

It is to be borne in mind that this is not an action seeking to enjoin the railroad company from abandoning the line, such as was the case of Day v. Tacoma R. & Power Co. 80 Wash. 161, L.R.A.1915B, 547, 141 Pac. 347, which relates to the same situation, and to which case reference is made for the facts relative to the abandonment; that being an action where the property owners were attempting to obtain equitable relief by way of injunction. Nor is this an action in equity seeking to recover the property granted to the railroad company upon a breach of the conditions accompanying the grant. The appellants argue that the agreement between Whyte and the railroad company created covenants running with the land, and that therefore they, being now the owners of the land, can recover for the breach of such covenants. The respondent argues that the agreement merely created conditions subsequent, for a breach of which the proper parties in interest would be confined to a forfeiture of the property granted, and that the appellants, not being the grantor nor his heirs, are strangers to and have no right under the contract to enforce such forfeiture or recover damages. This phase of the case involves one of the most complicated questions in the law. From the time of Spencer's Case, reported in 5 Coke, 16, 77 Eng. Reprint 72, till the present day, the courts have been engaged in painstaking and irreconcilable expositions of the subject, until, as was said by this court in Pioneer Sand & Gravel Co. v. Seattle Constr. & Dry Dock Co. 102 Wash. 608, 173 Pac. 508: "Many of the old doctrines have since been expressly overruled; others seem to be ignored; and more and more equity has come to enforce covenants which technically do not run with the land. . . . At any rate, the contract appears to be such a covenant regulating or restricting the use of the land as will be enforced in equity, when the party acquiring title took with notice, whether it is technically a covenant running with the land or not."

The law not looking with favor upon forfeitures, the courts have been inclined, in cases difficult of solution, to resolve the doubt in a disputed agreement as creating a covenant running with the land rather than as a condition subsequent. Union Stockyards Co. v. Nashville Packing Co. 72 C. C. A. 195, 140 Fed. 701. The following cases, including the Pioneer Sand & Gravel Co. v. Seattle Constr. & Dry Dock Co., just cited, would incline us to the view that the agreement between Whyte and the railroad company gave rise to covenants running with the land: Withers v. Wabash R. Co. 122 Mo. App. 282, 99 S. W. 34; Dorsey v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. 58 Ill. 65; Georgia Southern R. Co. v. Reeves, 64 Ga. 492; Gilmer v. Mobile & M. R. Co. 79 Ala. 569, 58 Am. Rep. 623; Whalen v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 108 Md. 11, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 180, 129 Am. St. Rep. 423, 69 Atl. 390; Blanchard v. Detroit, L. & L. M. R. Co. 31 Mich. 43, 18 Am. Rep. 142; Ford v. Oregon Electric R. Co. 60 Or. 278, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 358, 117 Pac. 809, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 280.

The case of Mills v. Seattle & M. R. Co. 10 Wash. 520, 39 Pac. 246, holding that the agreement there under consideration was a condition subsequent, is based upon the fact that the grantee was in that case insisting upon such a construction; the court saying.

"It is a proposition too well understood to require argument or citation, that courts do not favor forfeitures, and that for that reason they go very far in construing the provisions of a deed poll against the grantor, to the end that the estate granted may not be defeated, since the almost universal effect of sustaining a stipulation in such an instrument as a condition subsequent is to work great hardship upon the grantee. But whenever the terms of the instrument are plain and unambiguous, there is no hesitation in enforcing the actual contract made by the parties.

"Where, however, the rare instance occurs, as it does here, that the grantee is found insisting upon the construction of a condition subsequent, and that forfeiture shall take place, all consideration for him and all idea of hardship to him is eliminated, and the court is free to act without such consideration. The appellant here has all along been urging the theory of a condition subsequent, and has by its answer offered to pay the just value of the land taken by it, and damages to land of the respondent not taken."

Mouat v. Seattle, L. S. & E. R. Co. 16 Wash. 84, 47 Pac. 233, was dealing with a stipulation in a deed which, on its face, was apparently intended as a condition subsequent. The same is true of the case of Sherman v. Jefferson, 274 Ill. 294, 118 N. E. 624; and Fowler v. Coates, 201 N. Y. 257, 94 N. E. 997.

On the assumption, then, that Whyte's contract with the railroad company created a covenant running with the land, it would follow that the plaintiffs in this action were the proper parties, and that an action for damages for breach of those covenants would be maintainable by them, if not defeated by other principles of law; which brings us to the consideration of the next point presented by the respondent, viz.: That the contract did not impose upon the railroad company the duty of operating the railroad in perpetuity or during any specified period; that the terms of the contract were substantially complied with by the railroad having been operated for a period of twenty-five years. With this statement the law seems to agree with practical unanimity. Mead v.

Ballard, 7 Wall. 290, 19 L. ed. 190, was an action brought in ejectment to recover land conveyed upon the understanding that an institution of learning "shall be permanently located upon said lands," which institution was located with the intention that there should be its permanent situation. The buildings were thereafter destroyed by fire, and the institution subsequently erected upon another piece of land. The Supreme Court of the United States in that case said:

"The thing to be done was the location of the institute. Did this mean that all the buildings which the institution might ever need were to be built within that time, or did it mean that the officers of the institution were to determine, in good faith, the place where the buildings for its use should be erected? It is clear to us that the latter was the real meaning of the parties, and that when the trustees passed their resolution locating the building on the land, with the intention that it should be the permanent place of conducting the business of the corporation, they had permanently located the institute within the true construction of the contract.

"Counsel for the plaintiff attach to the word 'permanent,' in this connection, a meaning inconsistent with the obvious intent of the parties, that the condition was one which might be fully performed within a year. Such a construction is something more than a condition to locate. It is a covenant to build and rebuild; a covenant against removal at any time; a covenant to keep up an institution of learning on that land forever, or for a very indefinite time. This could not have been the intention of the parties.

"We are of opinion that the testimony shows, in any view that can be taken of it, that the condition was fully complied with and performed, and with it passed all right of reversion to the grantor or his heirs."

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Newton v. Mahoning County, 100 U. S. 548, 25 L. ed. 710, was considering a case where the county seat of one of the counties of Ohio "was permanently established in the town of Canfield," the citizens of that town having furnished the land for the purpose of having the county buildings erected thereon. The court held, although the contract provided for a permanent establishment (it will be noticed that the contract before us merely provided for construction and maintenance, and nowhere is the word "permanent" or its equivalent used), that the contract should not be construed so as to compel the county seat to remain forever upon the land granted, and that the grantor must be presumed to have known that the legislature had power to remove the county seat at pleasure and that he must be held to have had in view the possibility of such change when he made his grant. So here, when Whyte made his grant he realized that he was dealing with a public service corporation, and its duties to and control by the public were matters which must be held to have entered into his contract.

The leading case on this subject is Texas & P. R. Co. v. Marshall, 136 U. S. 393, 34 L. ed. 385, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 846, being a case where the city of Marshall, Texas, gave to the railroad company $300,000 in bonds and 66 acres of land for shops and depot; the company in consideration of this action agreeing to "permanently establish its eastern terminus and Texas offices at the city of Marshall," and "to establish and construct at said city the main machine shops and car works of said railway company." The city performed its agreements, and the company, on its part, made Marshall its eastern terminus, and built depots and shops, and established its principal offices there. After the expiration of a few years, Marshall ceased to be the eastern terminus of the road, and some of the shops were removed. The Supreme Court held that the contract on the part of the railway was satisfied and performed when the city had been made the terminus, stores and shops set up, and kept going eight years, until the interests of the public and of the railroad demanded the removal of some or all of those subjects of the contract to another place; that the contract, under the circumstances, had been complied with; and that the public interest was served by abandoning and removing the property.

Whalen v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 112 Md. 187, 76 Atl. 166, had been once before the court as an action in equity to compel the railroad company to specifically perform its agreement which it had made with the plaintiff's predecessors, to construct and operate and maintain a sidetrack. Whalen v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 108 Md. 11, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 180, 69 Atl. 390, 129 Am. St. Rep. 423. The sidetrack was maintained for a period of fifty-nine years, and then abandoned. The supreme court of Maryland having dismissed the equity action, the plaintiffs began an action in law for damages for breach of contract. The court held that the word "maintained," as used in such agreement, did not require the railroad company to continue the sidetrack permanently; that the length of time during which the covenant had been complied with constituted a substantial performance thereof, so that the railroad was not liable in damages for its breach: "Considering the language used in the covenant before us, it is to be observed that, while it distinctly provides for the construction and maintenance of the turnout and siding, . . . it is entirely silent as to the duration of the maintenance of those structures or that service. We cannot yield our assent to the contention of the appellant that the word 'maintain' ordinarily means to maintain indefinitely or forever. Its meaning in that respect depends upon the context in which it appears and the subject-matter to which it relates.

There is plainly no specific or positive provision in the covenant touching the duration of the time during which the covenanted acts are to be done or privileges furnished." [112 Md. 197.]

Judge Taft, in Jones v. Newport News & M. Valley Co. 13 C. C. A. 95, 31 U. S. App. 92, 65 Fed. 736, held that an agreement by a railroad company and one owning land adjacent to its track to establish and maintain switch connections could not be the basis of a recovery of damages upon the railroad's discontinuing the service, the court saying that to hold otherwise would "forever limit the discretion of the directors to deal with a subject which may seriously affect the convenience or safety of the public in its use of the road."

Texas & P. R. Co. v. Scott, 37 L.R.A. 94, 23 C. C. A. 424, 41 U. S. App. 624, 77 Fed. 726, dealt with a contract between Scott and the railroad company, whereby Scott contracted to give a right of way over his land if the company would establish a depot thereon. The railroad was built, and the depot established and maintained for thirty-six years, when it was abandoned for reasons connected with the best interests of the public and the company. The court held that the contract did not bind the railroad company to keep up a depot forever, but that its maintenance until such time as the best interests of the public and the corporation required abandonment was a substantial compliance with the contract.

In Lucas v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 64 C. C. A. 638, 130 Fed. 438, the defendant had contracted with the plaintiff, in consideration of his dedicating a strip of land for the purpose of constructing a roadway, that it would make, when it changed its passenger station, a suitable entrance way into its station grounds and continue the roadway eastward. This the railroad did, but very shortly thereafter the roadway and entrance were discontinued. It was held that defendant did not bind itself to maintain a permanent entrance and road, and, having maintained the same until the city had changed the grade, it was not liable for breach of its covenant.

In Union Stockyards Co. v. Nashville Packing Co. 72 C. C. A. 195, 140 Fed. 701, the plaintiff conveyed land to the defendant upon a contract by which the defendant agreed to build and maintain a packing house of specified capacity, the contract providing no time during which the agreement should endure, the deed reciting that it was made "upon condition of the due performance of the contract by the grantee." The packing house was built, but its operation subsequently abandoned.

"Another feature of the transaction which seems to us of much significance is that no time was fixed during which the obligation to maintain and operate the packing house should endure. It seems to be hardly reasonable to suppose that the parties could have understood that this covenant should continue to operate perpetually. Indeed, one can hardly withstand the conviction that the covenant was expected by the parties to have some limitation in respect of time, and, if so, it might be a question whether any other limitation is more natural or probable than that it should abide such contingencies of the business as could not, in the natural course of things, be avoided, as, for instance, could not, with prudent management, be carried on without loss. Of course, we are not now undertaking to lay down a particular definition of the contingencies which might terminate the obligation."

These cases would seem to be squarely in point on the question before us, and to determine it in respondent's favor. This being true, the demurrer was properly sustained.

ANNOTATION.

Period covered by covenant or condition subsequent for maintenance of railroad.

I. Introductory, 817.

II. Period construed as terminable by railroad company:

- b. Application of rule:
  1. Location and maintenance of depot, 818.
  2. Location and maintenance of shop or office, 820.

1. Introductory.

No attempt has been made to include within the scope of this note a discussion of the distinction between "covenant" and "condition subsequent," or the determination of the question as to when a covenant for the maintenance of a railroad runs with the land. The note is limited to the cases wherein the courts have construed the period of performance of a covenant or condition subsequent for the maintenance of a railroad or its appurtenances.

II. Period construed as terminable by railroad company.

a. Rule stated.

The majority of jurisdictions seem to hold that, in the absence of a specified term of years or of express and suitable words showing an intention that performance shall be perpetual, a covenant or condition subsequent for the maintenance of a railroad or its appurtenances is sufficiently complied with by a performance covering a term of years, varying in the cases which have so held from five to sixty years.

b. Application of rule.

1. Location and maintenance of depot.

In Lucas v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1904) 64 C. C. A. 638, 130 Fed. 438, an action to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract, it appeared that the plaintiff, being the owner of a strip of land adjacent to the land of the defendant, entered into a contract with the latter, dedicating the land for the purposes of a railroad depot, in consideration that the railroad company would "maintain suitable entrance way to its station grounds." The defendant, in accordance with this condition, maintained the required entrance way for a period of seven years, when, on the changing of the grade of a village street from which the driveway entered, the company abandoned the entrance and opened a new one. The court held that the condition in the contract could not be construed to require a performance forever, but that a compliance with its terms for a period of seven years was a sufficient performance within the intent of the agreement.

In Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Birnie (1894) 59 Ark. 66, 26 S. W. 528, the court held that it was a question for the jury whether the maintenance by the defendant railway company of a depot for a period of eleven years was a sufficient compliance with an agreement contained in a grant of certain lots, whereby, in consideration of the deeding to it of land, the railroad company covenanted to erect and maintain thereon a depot. The court said: "Eleven years, falling within this era of the city's growth, would seem to be a sufficient period in which to obtain all the benefits constituting the inducement to the plaintiffs' donation. It was a period during which the business of the city moved away from the vicinity of lots 1 and 2, and if there was anything peculiar in the situation of that property, making a longer time necessary to the enjoyment of all the advantages or benefits contemplated by the condition of the grant, as construed by the court, it was incumbent upon the plaintiffs to show it."

Where it appeared that a railroad company, in accordance with a contract with an owner of land, maintained a depot for a period of thirty-six years, in consideration of a right of way granted to it, the court held, conceding that the contract was valid, that the plaintiff could not recover for a subsequent removal of the depot, saying: "It cannot be true that an agreement on the part of a railway company to establish a station at a particular point is an agreement to keep it there forever. It must be that such an agreement is made subject to the general exigencies of business, the public interests, and to the change, modification, and growth of transportation routes, as these may affect the requirements of the railway company's business. The contract having this limitation, we think that the establishment of a railway station, and its maintenance to the full extent expected or claimed for thirty-six years, is, under all the circumstances, a substantial and sufficient compliance with the terms of the contract relied on here." Texas & P. R. Co. v. Scott (1896) 37 L.R.A. 94, 23 C. C. A. 424, 41 U. S. App. 624, 77 Fed. 726, s. c. on subsequent appeal (1899) 36 C. C. A. 282, 94 Fed. 840.

In Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Barbour (1883) 89 Ind. 375, wherein it appeared that a deed conveying land for railroad purposes contained a condition subsequent to the effect that the land was to be used for depot purposes, and in case of a failure so to use it the ground would revert to the grantors, the court held that the erection and maintenance of a depot on the land for a period of thirty years was a substantial compliance with the terms of the deed, in the absence of words suitable to express an intention that the lot should be occupied by the railroad for all time.

But in Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Hood (1879) 66 Ind. 580, where it appeared that, by the express terms of a deed conveying land to a railroad company, the latter took the lands conveyed subject to a condition subsequent that it would "permanently" locate thereon a depot, the court held that the removal of the depot, after it had been maintained on the land for a period of eighteen years, was a breach of the condition. That case was distinguished by the court in Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Barbour (Ind.) supra.

In Maryland & P. R. Co. v. Silver (1909) 110 Md. 510, 73 Atl. 297, it appeared that a deed of land conveyed to a railroad company contained the following conditions: "The said railroad company shall at once make and maintain on said land herein conveyed a passenger and freight station, where all local trains shall stop when flagged by those properly in charge thereof, the passenger trains to receive and deliver passengers and the freight trains to receive and deliver freight." The court held that the covenant was fairly complied with by the erection and maintenance of the station for a period of years, and until the exigencies of the business, the convenience of the public, and the welfare of the railroad demanded its removal, saying: "The reason for the rule being that, as the number and location of a railroad's depots and public stations must depend upon the conditions of population and amount of business at the different places along its line, and as changes take place in these conditions from time to time, the determination of such questions is appropriately committed to the directors or managers of the railroad company."

In Oldham v. Southern R. Co. (1912) 2 Tenn. C. C. A. 644, wherein it appeared that a condition in a deed conveying lands to a railroad company provided for the maintenance thereon of a depot, the court held that the terms of the condition could not be so construed as to require a perpetual maintenance of the station, but where it appeared that the depot was maintained as required for a period of years, and then removed to a near-by location, it was held to be a substantial performance of the agreement.

In Jessup v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (1882) 7 Ont. App. Rep. 128, reversing 28 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 583, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff agreed to convey certain lands in consideration of the maintenance thereon of a railroad station, and pursuant to this agreement the defendant erected and maintained a depot on the land for a period of ten years, the court held that the performance for ten years, in the absence of express words in the covenant requiring perpetual maintenance of the station, was a sufficient compliance with the terms of the agreement.

And in Nottawasga Twp. v. Hamilton & N. W. R. Co. (1888) 16 Ont. App. Rep. 52, wherein it appeared that in consideration of a money bonus the defendant railroad company agreed to establish and maintain certain depots at particular locations in the plaintiff township, and pursuant to this agreement the depots were erected and maintained for a period of seven years, at the end of which time, the company changed its mode of maintaining the stations, shortening the hours for the transaction of business therein, the court held, in an action to compel specific performance, that the company, by a performance for a period of seven years, had substantially complied with the terms of the condition, and that the word "establish" therein could not be construed to mean the continuance of the stations forever.

Compare Clouse v. Canada Southern R. Co. (1883) 4 Ont. Rep. 28, wherein the court held that, while a performance for a term of years is a sufficient compliance with a condition in a grant of lands to a railroad to maintain a depot thereon, the rule was otherwise where the condition in a grant of lands to a railroad required the erection and maintenance of farm crossings, for, under the statute (Can. Consol. Stat. chap. 66, § 13), farm crossings when once made must be maintained by the railroad company, independently of the contract; distinguishing Jessup v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (Ont.) supra.

2. Location and maintenance of shop or office.

In the leading case of Texas & P. R. Co. v. Marshall (1889) 136 U. S. 393, 34 L. ed. 385, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 846, it appeared that the plaintiff city entered into a contract with the defendant railroad corporation, whereby, in consideration of a donation, the latter agreed to "permanently" locate and construct at said city its main machine shops and car works. In accordance with this agreement, the railroad company did erect and maintain its shops and offices in the city for a period of eight years, when it removed various parts of its shops and offices to another place. The court held that the defendant had substantially complied with the terms of the contract by maintaining the required shops in the city for a period of eight years, and until the interests of the railroad company and the public demanded their removal to another place; that the word permanent, as used, did not mean forever, or lasting forever.

In the reported case (SCHELLER v. TACOMA R. & POWER Co. ante, 810), the court holds that the operation of a railroad covering a period of twenty-five years, in accordance with a condition imposed in a deed granting a right of way, was a sufficient and substantial compliance with the terms of the condition, as the agreement did not impose on the railroad company the duty of maintaining its railroad forever, or for a specified number of years.

In Bryan v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1917) 157 C. C. A. 98, 244 Fed. 650, writ of error dismissed in (1918) 246 U. S. 651, 62 L. ed. 921, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, wherein it appeared that in consideration of the purchase by the plaintiff of land, and the development thereof as a fruit orchard, the defendant railroad company covenanted and agreed to maintain and operate its line of railroad through the land, the court held that the maintenance of the railroad line as agreed for a period of forty years was a sufficient and substantial compliance with the terms of the covenant, and the same could not be construed to embrace a period requiring the maintenance of the road forever.

4. Location and maintenance of spur or siding.

In Whalen v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1910) 112 Md. 187, 76 Atl. 166, it appeared that the defendant railroad company covenanted to construct and maintain a "turnout and siding" at the plaintiff's location and in pursuance of this agreement the siding and turnout were maintained for a period of sixty years, whereupon, because of the exigencies of its business, the company discontinued the use of the siding. The court held that as the covenant was silent as to the duration of the maintenance of the structures, it could not be held that the word "maintain" meant to maintain forever, and the performance for sixty years was a substantial and satisfactory compliance with the terms of the contract, saying: "In our opinion such a covenant as that, when it contains no stipulation for maintaining the structures or stopping the trains, either in perpetuity or during a specified period, should, in view of the well-known scope and purpose of a public service corporation like a railway company, be presumed to have been made subject to the exigencies of the company's further development and needs. . . . When, in a case like the present one, after the company has maintained the structures and stopping place agreed on for more than fifty-nine years, it becomes necessary or desirable for the promotion of better public service to so alter the location of its roadbed as to no longer pass the place mentioned in the covenant, and the change is made in good faith, we think the previous maintenance of the structures and stopping place should be regarded as a substantial performance of the covenant, and be held sufficient to discharge the company from further liability thereunder."

And in Jones v. Newport News & M. Valley Co. (1895) 13 C. C. A. 95, 31 U. S. App. 92, 65 Fed. 736, wherein it appeared that the defendant railroad company agreed to maintain a spur line to the plaintiff's coal tippie, the latter to build the tippie and a trestle thereto, the plaintiff contended, in an action to recover for the abandonment of the switch, that, nothing having been said as to the time during which it was to be maintained, the implication was that it was to be maintained forever. The court held that it could not imply, in a contract for a private switch connection, a term that it should be perpetual, quoting and following the opinion of the court in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Marshall (1890) 136 U. S. 393, 34 L. ed. 385, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 846, supra.

III. Period construed as not terminable by railroad company.

a. Generally.

In a few jurisdictions the courts hold that, in the absence of a specified term of years, a covenant or condition subsequent for the maintenance of a railroad imports a continuous and perpetual period of performance, limited, at the most, by the demands of the public welfare, or the exigencies of the administration of the railroad. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Camp (1907) 130 Ga. 1, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 594, 124 Am. St. Rep. 151, 60 S. E. 177, 14 Ann. Cas. 439; Harper v. Virginian R. Co. (1915) 76 W. Va. 788, 86 S. E. 919, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 1081; Stevens v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 169 S. W. 644, reversed in (1919) — Tex. —, 212 S. W. 639; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Ennis (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 201 S. W. 256. See also Tyler v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. (1905) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 87 S. W. 238.

Thus, in Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Ennis (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 201 S. W. 256, an action by a city to restrain the removal therefrom by the defendant of its offices, shops, and roundhouse, it appeared that, in consideration of certain grants of land and money bonuses, the defendant covenanted with the city that its shops and offices would be maintained therein. This agreement was observed for a period of twenty years, when the defendant threatened to remove its offices, shops, and roundhouse. The court held that the covenant, although not stating specifically that the buildings should be maintained forever, imported a continued contract, and, having been observed for over twenty years, the defendant could not now terminate it without some legal excuse, as, for example, that the defendant could not perform the duties owing to the public consistently with the proper discharge of the agreement.

In Stevens v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 169 S. W. 644, reversed in (1919) — Tex. —, 212 S. W. 639, wherein it appeared that lands were conveyed subject to the condition that a railroad depot would be maintained thereon, and it appeared further that the defendant company had erected and maintained a depot, pursuant to the agreement, for a period of about thirty years, and had then removed the depot from the

Nitz, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, for the consideration of certain premiums to be regularly paid, issued a policy of insurance by which it agreed to pay to one Frank Pickens the face value of the policy in case he was living at the end of twenty years from the date of issue, or to pay to his beneficiary, Susie Pickens, his wife, an equal sum in case of his death before the expiration of said twenty years. The premiums were regularly paid until the time of Pickens's death. Some years after the issuance of the policy the insured was murdered by his wife, the beneficiary therein. She was convicted of the crime and sentenced to the penitentiary for life. Shortly after the commission of the murder she assigned all of her right under the policy to D. B. Daugherty and H. W. Shields. Pickens left no children surviving him, and owed no debts at the time of his death. The defendant company declined to pay the policy, either to the beneficiary, or to her assignees, or to the administrator of the estate of Pickens, and this suit was brought by the administrator to recover thereon. The court of common pleas rendered a judgment in favor of the defendant, and upon a writ of error to that judgment the circuit court of Cabell county reversed the same and rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the policy, to review which this writ of error is prosecuted.

That Susie Pickens, the beneficiary, has no right to recover upon this policy of insurance, can scarcely be doubted. The liability of the company became fixed by the death of the insured, and this was brought about by the felonious act of the beneficiary. It would be monstrous for the courts to lend their aid to anyone for the purpose of enriching himself by the commission of murder, and to entertain suit on behalf of the beneficiary to recover upon this policy of insurance would be doing that very thing. It is against the policy of our law to reward one for the commission of crime, and whenever the effect of the enforcement of a right which one would otherwise have would be to give him an advantage by reason of his felonious act, the courts will decline to entertain it. This is well established by the authorities. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 29 L. ed. 997, 6 Sup.

Ct. Rep. 877; Cooley, Briefs on Ins. 3158; 14 R. C. L. p. 1228, title Insurance, § 409, and authorities there cited. Nor can the assignees of the beneficiary stand on any higher ground than the beneficiary herself. <sup>—right of murderer's assignee.</sup>

At the time she made the assignment to them she had nothing to transfer. She had voluntarily placed herself in a status which disqualified her to be beneficiary under the policy. Consequently, the assignment to Daugherty and Shields was ineffectual to transfer any interest in the fund.

This denial of the right of the beneficiary or her assignees to recover under such circumstances is not, however, based upon lack of liability of the insurer to pay. The policy of insurance is not avoided for such cause by its express terms, and there is no reason why such an exception should be read into it when the interest of other parties is affected. This doctrine of public policy will not be carried by the <sup>—recovery by personal representative.</sup> courts any further than is necessary to prevent resort to them for the purpose of effecting a fraudulent purpose. It is not for the purpose of relieving the insurance company from liability, and if there is any person without fault who has a right to the benefit of the policy the same will be enforced. In other words, there is no condition in the policy avoiding it in case of the murder of the insured, and the liability of the company is just the same where death is the result of murder as where it is produced by any other cause. The only difference is that in case the murderer is the beneficiary named in the policy he is denied recovery, not because the company is not liable, but because he has placed himself in such a position that he cannot invoke the aid of the courts. But does the fact that the beneficiary named in the policy cannot recover discharge the company from liability in all cases? It is very generally held that, where the specific beneficiary named in a policy of life insurance dies, the policy of insurance nevertheless remains in force, and recovery may be had thereon by the personal representatives of the insured upon his death for the benefit of his estate. What is the effect when the beneficiary, by some act of his, puts himself in a position where he cannot invoke the aid of the courts to enforce his claim? He forfeits his right to claim the money to which he would otherwise be entitled. The rule of public policy, as before stated, will not be extended further than is necessary to prevent a felon from reaping benefit from his crime, and it may be said that when by this rule the murderer, who is the beneficiary, is deprived of his right to recover, the doctrine is extended as far as is warranted. This would leave in the hands of the insurer a fund or estate created by the insured. The insurance company is not entitled to it, and the party that the insured desired to have it cannot take it. He forfeited his right to it. What, then, is the result? Naturally, it becomes the property of the estate of the insured, very much in the same way as an estate which is left by will to a particular devisee or legatee passes by Laws of Descents and Distributions upon the failure of such legatee, and it has been held that, where a legatee in a will murders the testator, the legacy provided for him in the will will pass to the heirs of the testator under the Statutes of Descents and Distributions. Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N. Y. 506, 5 L.R.A. 340, 12 Am. St. Rep. 819, 22 N. E. 188. And it is likewise very uniformly held, and it occurs to us upon sound reason, that, where the beneficiary in a policy of life insurance is denied the right of recovery upon grounds of public policy, a trust results in favor of the estate of the insured, and ordinarily the personal representative of the insured can maintain a suit to recover the fund for the benefit of that estate. Schmidt v. Northern Life Asso. 112 Iowa, 41, 51 L.R.A. 141, 84 Am. St. Rep. 323, 83 N. W. 800; Cleaver v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. [1892] 1 Q. B. 147, 66 L. T. N. S. 220, 40 Week. Rep. 230, 56 J. P. 180, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 128; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Davis, 96 Va. 737, 44 L.R.A. 305, 32 S. E. 475; Supreme Lodge, K. L. H. v. Menkhausen, 209 Ill. 277, 65 L.R.A. 508, 101 Am. St. Rep. 239, 70 N. Weightman*, L.R.A.1917B, 1210, — Okla. —, 160 Pac. 629.

In this case, however, the defendant insists that the personal representative should not be allowed to recover, for the reason that such recovery would be for the benefit of the murderess. The insured had no children, and his widow, under the Law of Descents and Distributions, is the sole distributee of his personal estate. The fact that the courts will not, on grounds of public policy, permit her to bring suit to recover this fund, does not bar her from taking the estate of her deceased husband. Under our law there is no longer corruption of blood or forfeiture of estates upon conviction of crime, and there is no exception in our Statutes of Descents and Distributions precluding one from inheriting in a case like this. The laws governing the devolution of property are an expression of the public policy of the state, contained in its Constitution and legislative acts, and the courts are not justified in attaching to these acts exceptions or limitations which have not been placed thereon by the lawmaking bodies. It therefore follows that if the personal representative of the insured in this case is permitted to recover this fund, the beneficiary will accomplish by indirection that which she could not do directly. That the property of one who has been murdered will devolve upon the murderer, where such is the course of distribution provided by law, seems to be well settled in most of the American states. McAlister v. Fair, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 726, and note (72 Kan. 533, 115 Am. St. Rep. 233, 84 Pac. 112, 7 Ann. Cas. 973); Shellenberger v. Ransom, 25 L.R.A. 564, and note (41 Neb. 631, 59 N. W. 935); Kuhn v. Kuhn, 125 Iowa, 449, 101 N. W. 151, 2 Ann. Cas. 657; Carpenter's Appeal, 170 Pa. 203, 29 L.R.A. 145, 50 Am. St. Rep. 765, 32 Atl. 637; Owens v. Owens, 100 N. C. 240, 6 S. E. 794; Ellerson v. Westcott, 148 N. Y. 149, 42 N. E. 540; Deem v. Millikin, 6 Ohio C. C. 357, 3 Ohio C. D. 491, affirmed on appeal in 53 Ohio St. 668, 44 N. E. 1134.

Will the courts, then, allow themselves to be used for the purpose of bringing into existence an estate which will, by operation of law, devolve on one who, because of his conduct, is not entitled to it? The administrator has no interest in the subject-matter. It is agreed here that the insured left no debts, and it follows that every dollar of the fund recovered by the administrator in his representative capacity must go to the murderess. The suit is simply in his name for the benefit of the one who feloniously caused the insured's death. The case of McDonald v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 178 Iowa, 863, 160 N. W. 289, is very much like this case in its facts. In that case the administrator of the insured brought the suit to recover on the policy of insurance. It appeared that the sole distributees of the insured's estate were her father and mother, and that they had assisted in a criminal operation which produced her death. The court held that the administrator, if such facts were shown, would not be entitled to recover, for it would be for the benefit of those who are, by the public policy of the law, denied such right. The theory relied upon to defeat recovery is substantially the same as that asserted in the cases of

Dickinson v. Stuart Colliery Co. 71 W. Va. 325, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 335, 76 S. E. 654, and Swope v. Keystone Coal & Coke Co. 78 W. Va. 517, L.R.A.1917A, 1128, 89 S. E. 284. In these cases the basis of recovery was the wrongful employment of plaintiffs' decedents, they being of an age which made their employment in mines a violation of the law. The liability of the defendant was sustained by the court in each case, but recovery was denied to the administrator, not because the defendant was not liable, but for the sole reason that the father, who in each case would have been sole distributee of any recovery, procured the employment of the minor. His act in securing his minor child to be employed in violation of law created a situation which rendered necessary the denial of a recovery, because the party who would receive it had forfeited his right thereto. There was no fault on the part of the one killed, and recovery would have been allowed, but for the fact that the person who would take the fund as sole distributee had united with the defendant in the commission of the wrongful act, and the court denied him the right to take advantage of his own wrong.

The principle invoked here is the same as the principle involved there. In some of the cases we have above cited, permitting a recovery by the administrator of the insured where the beneficiary had caused the death, it was suggested that part of the fund might go to the beneficiary under the Law of Descents and Distributions, but that was held not to defeat recovery. That may be true where only part of the fund goes to the guilty party. It may be that the courts would not allow the innocent to be deprived of the property to which they are entitled, for the sole reason that to enforce their rights would also confer a benefit upon a guilty party. However, that question does not arise here, and we express no opinion thereon. We are of opinion, however, that where the guilty party would take the whole of the recovery in case one is allowed, the policy of our law as effectually denies recovery as it would were the suit brought in the name of the guilty party himself.

It follows from what we have said that the judgment of the Circuit Court will be reversed, and the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Right of executor or administrator of insured's estate to recover proceeds of policy where the beneficiary's criminal act caused, or contributed to, insured's death.

I. General rule.

Subject to the limitations stated in the following subdivisions, it is generally held in cases involving both ordinary policies and benefit certificates, that, although the beneficiary's right to recover under the insurance contract is forfeited by reason of the felonious killing of the insured by the beneficiary, the insurer is not thereby relieved of liability, but is liable to pay the proceeds of the contract to the insured's estate.

Canada.—Standard Life Assur. Co. v. Trudeau (1900) Rap. Jud. Quebec 9 B. R. 499.

In Supreme Lodge, K. L. H. v. Menkhausen (Ill.) supra, an action by the children of insured as his heirs, it was held that public policy did not forbid a recovery against a benefit association by the heirs of the insured, who was murdered by her husband, the beneficiary. The court said: "The beneficiary named in a benefit certificate, who feloniously takes the life of the insured, cannot recover from the fraternal beneficiary society, and it is now urged that public policy also requires us to hold that in such a case there can be no recovery by any person whomsoever against such a society, and that under such circumstances not only is the certificate void, but the obligation of the society to pay to anyone whomsoever is canceled and rendered absolutely inoperative. The cases relied upon by appellant are of two classes: First, where the insured was murdered by the beneficiary, and suit was brought by the criminal, or someone claiming through him; and, second, where the insured was executed in pursuance of the sentence of a court of competent jurisdiction, for a crime committed by him or her. Neither class of cases is in point here. The only reason in favor of appellant's contention that seems to us of weight is found in the fact that the beneficiary might be incited to commit murder by the fact that, if unable to collect the benefit himself, it would be payable to some other person or persons in whose welfare he was interested. Human experience teaches that those willing to commit murder and assume the risk of punishment for the benefit of others are so few in number that consideration thereof becomes well-nigh inconsequential. But even were it otherwise, if the rule suggested by appellant were established, it is perceived that the society would then profit by the murder, and incentive be created for the destruction of the life of the insured that the interest of the insurer might be advanced. The contract between the society and the insured contained no provision absolving the society from liability in the event that she was murdered by the beneficiary, and public policy does not require us to read such a condition into the agreement. If it did, it would also require us to hold that the beneficiary could not recover on the policy if the insured was murdered by another, acting independently of and against the desire of the beneficiary, because it is within the realm of possibility that such other, without the connivance or knowledge of the beneficiary, might commit the crime solely for the purpose of enriching the latter. If societies of the character of appellant desire to be protected from such contingency, that object must be accomplished by a condition to that effect written into their contracts, failing which the law will not absolve them from liability. Cleaver v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. (Eng.) and Schmidt v. Northern Life Assn. (Iowa) supra. In the absence of a contract to that effect, public policy will not permit the society to appropriate unto itself the fund which it has agreed to pay, merely because the life of the insured has been unlawfully taken."

It was argued in the Menkhausen Case (Ill.) supra, that the certificate was payable to the husband alone as beneficiary, and that no recovery could be had thereon except by him, or those claiming through him, and that, as he could not recover on the certificate, no one could. The court, however, refused to sustain this view and, as above stated, held that the insurer was not relieved from liability, but was liable to the insured's heirs.

And in Sharpless v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. (1916) 135 Minn. 35, L.R.A.1917B, 670, 159 N. W. 1086, an action by the brother and only heir of the insured, except the latter's wife, the beneficiary, it was held, that although by murdering the insured the beneficiary under a benefit certificate had forfeited the right to the proceeds of the contract, this did not relieve the insurer from liability to others; that the plaintiff, who would have taken on the death of the beneficiary, was entitled to recover the benefit.

And in Schmidt v. Northern Life Assn. (1900) 112 Iowa, 41, 51 L.R.A. 141, 84 Am. St. Rep. 323, 83 N. W. 800, an action by administrator of insured, it was held that liability on a benefit certificate was not defeated because the beneficiary's (wife's) rights were forfeited, she having feloniously caused the death of the insured; but that the certificate might be enforced by the latter's administrator for the benefit of his estate, on the ground of a resulting trust in favor of the estate, by the forfeiture of the rights of the beneficiaries named.

And in Cleaver v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. [1892] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 147, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 128, 66 L. T. N. S. 220, 40 Week. Rep. 230, 56 J. P. 180, it was held that the executors of an insured, holding a policy payable to his wife, might maintain an action on the policy notwithstanding the fact that he was murdered by the wife, the view being taken that under the circumstances the insurance money formed a part of the general estate of the insured, and that, as between his legal representatives and the insured, no question of public policy arose to afford a defense.

In Anderson v. Life Ins. Co. (1910) 152 N. C. 1, 67 S. E. 53, the personal representative of the insured was held entitled, as against the personal representative of the beneficiary, to the proceeds of a policy taken out by the insured, who was murdered by the beneficiary, who then committed suicide. The court said: "The authorities are also to the effect that, in cases like the present, where the contract is made between the insured and the company for another's benefit, that is, a valid contract of that character, a felony of the kind indicated on the part of the beneficiary will not relieve the company of all liability on the policy, but recovery can be had usually by the representative of the insured, and for the benefit of the latter's estate. Vance, Ins. 392, 393; Cooley, Briefs on Ins. 3153; Schmidt v. Northern Life Assn. (Iowa) supra; Supreme Lodge, K. L. H. v. Menckhausen (1904) 209 Ill. 277, 65 L.R.A. 508, 101 Am. St. Rep. 239, 70 N. E. 567; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Davis (1899) 96 Va. 737, 44 L.R.A. 305, 32 S. E. 475; Shea v. Massachusetts Ben. Assn. (1894) 160 Mass. 289, 39 Am. St. Rep. 475, 35 N. E. 855; Tyler v. Odd Fellows' Mut. Relief Assn. (1887) 145 Mass. 184, 13 N. E. 360; Cleaver v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. (Eng.) supra. This latter ruling would very likely not obtain in an ordinary life policy, where a valid contract of insurance had been made and purported to be between the company and the beneficiary, and such beneficiary was, and continued to be throughout, the owner of the policy and of all interest in it. Such a position, however, is not presented here in any aspect of it, as the company recognizes its liability on the policy, and the question is on the right to the fund as between the representative of the insured and of the beneficiary. On that question, and under the authorities cited, there is no error in the ruling of the court below, awarding the fund to the representative of the insured, and the judgment to that effect is affirmed."

And in Welch v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1919) 178 N. Y. Supp. 748, where a policy was taken by the insured, payable to a named beneficiary if he survived the insured, "otherwise to the estate of the insured," it was held that the policy did not become forfeited by reason of the murder of the insured by the beneficiary, but that it should be paid to the insured's legal representative.

And in Standard Life Assur. Co. v. Trudeau (1900) Rap. Jud. Quebec 9 B. R. 499, the evidence was held to show that the policies sued on were entered into between the insurer and the insured, and not between the company and the insured's wife, the beneficiary, and it was held that the insurer was not relieved from liability by reason of the murder of the insured by his wife, but that the company was liable to the insured's heirs.

In Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Weightman (1916) — Okla. —, L.R.A. 1917B, 1210, 160 Pac. 629, the court denied that a husband and wife owned a policy upon their lives, which provided for the payment of a sum to the survivor, as joint tenants, and held that there was a separate policy on the life of each for the separate benefit of each, and where the wife murdered the husband it was held that as the contract named no alternative payee, in the absence of a statute providing an alternative beneficiary, a resulting trust arose in favor of the husband's estate, and that his personal representative was entitled to the fund.

In New York L. Ins. Co. v. Davis (1899) 96 Va. 737, 44 L.R.A. 305, 32 S. E. 475, the murder of one holding a policy payable to his estate, by an assignee of the policy, whose claim was valid only for a reimbursement of premiums paid, was held to forfeit only the assignee's part of the insurance, and the insured's estate was held entitled to recover the residue.

II. Rule where beneficiary is sole heir.

It will be observed that in the reported case (JOHNSTON v. METROPOLITAN L. INS. Co. ante, 823) the general rule is recognized that permits a recovery by the insured's executor or administrator, where the guilty party would not be entitled to the benefit, but that it is held that the policy of the law forbids a recovery where the guilty party would take the whole property.

178 Iowa, 863, 160 N. W. 289, an action on a policy by the administrator of the insured, who died from a criminal operation, holding that no recovery could be had where it appeared that the insured's parents, who had aided in procuring the operation, were her sole heirs.

In Murchison v. Murchison (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 203 S. W. 423, affirming a judgment sustaining a demurrer to an action by the father, brothers, and sisters of the insured, against the beneficiary and the insurer, to recover a judgment on a policy of accident insurance, it was conceded by both parties that the insurer's liability would not be canceled because of the fact that the beneficiary obviously killed the insured; and it was held that the proceeds of the policy were in the nature of personal property, and that, the beneficiary having deprived herself of the right to take as beneficiary, and the insured having died intestate, the policy became payable to the insured's estate, and that the wife did not forfeit her rights under the Statute of Distribution, even though she did feloniously take her husband's life for the purpose of collecting the insurance money.

III. By-laws or policy provisions covering contingency.

The determination of the question under consideration in some cases is governed by provisions of the by-laws, or policies.

In Grand Circle, W. W. v. Rausch (1913) 24 Colo. App. 304, 134 Pac. 141, it was held that a by-law of a beneficial association, providing that if the insured should be murdered by the beneficiary the benefit should revert to the society, was valid, and that a recovery by the insured's heirs was precluded where she had been murdered by her husband, the beneficiary.

In Geer v. Supreme Tribe, B. H. (1917) 195 Mo. App. 336, 190 S. W. 72, one by-law of a benefit association provided that if the death of the insured should be caused by a beneficiary the certificate should be forfeited to the society, and should not be paid to the beneficiary or his heirs, or the heirs or personal representatives of the insured; another by-law provided that no benefit should be paid if the insured was killed by any of the beneficiaries; and a third by-law provided that in the event of the death of a beneficiary prior to the death of the insured, without his having disposed of the benefit, it should be paid to the insured's personal representative for the benefit of his heirs. It appeared that the beneficiary, the insured's husband, after inflicting mortal injuries upon her, committed suicide and died shortly before she did. It was contended in an action by the insured's administrator that the first two by-laws, in view of the third, were ambiguous, and should be construed most favorably to the insured; that the husband never became the beneficiary, since he died shortly before the insured, and that when the latter died, the designated beneficiary being dead, the insured's heirs became the beneficiaries; as a corollary the plaintiff claimed that the first by-law applied only when the designated beneficiary survived the insured, and thereby became a beneficiary in fact. The court stated that this was a very technical construction of the by-law, and that if followed to its necessary conclusion an insured could never be killed by anyone who was more than a contingent beneficiary when the mortal blow was struck, as lightning or some other quick agency might end the slayer's life before that of his victim. It was held, however, that there was no conflict in the by-laws, that they were written for different purposes, that the last related to policies which were valid obligations after the insured's death, and that the first two related to a different subject, that is, the forfeiture of the policies and the acts and conditions which would make the policy void, and had to do with dead policies incapable of enforcement by anyone.

In Robinson v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. (1918) 69 Pa. Super. Ct. 274, where an industrial life policy provided for the payment of a certain sum to the insured upon his attaining a stated age, and, in case of death before reaching that age, for the payment of a like sum to the beneficiary, personal representative, or any person appearing to be equitably entitled to it, it was held, upon its appearing that the beneficiary murdered the insured, that the fact that the beneficiary named was disqualified from deriving any benefit under the contract did not discharge the insurer, and that the insured's administrator was entitled to recover. The court said: "If the person to whom payment was to have been made had previously died, or was incompetent to be a beneficiary, the company is not thereby absolved from payment. Public policy excuses it from performance according to the terms of the contract so far as the named beneficiary is concerned, but the application of this doctrine cannot be carried to the extent that one is released from the performance of a contract where the full consideration has been received and nothing is left to be done except to pay the money agreed on, where, justly and equitably, payment should be made to the estate of the person who paid the consideration. The condition on which payment was to be made has arisen; the first beneficiary has ceased to exist, legally speaking; the defendant has not paid any other person to whom payment could have been made, and denies liability to pay to anyone. On such a state of facts the fund should be paid to the estate of the decedent. It is not reasonable that the felonious act of the beneficiary should discharge the obligation of the insurer and nothing in the contract requires us to hold it exempted." J. T. W.

NELL E. CONKLING

v.

S. SILVER et al., Appts.

Iowa Supreme Court—November 15, 1919.

(Conklin v. Silver, — Iowa, —, 174 N. W. 573.)

Landlord and tenant — lease for rag business — deprivation of beneficial use.

1. The forbidding by public authorities of further use of a building leased for the rag and junk metal business for the storage of rags in the building does not destroy the beneficial use of the leased property so as to justify the lessee in abandoning the premises.

[See note on this question beginning on page 836.]

Evidence — burden of proof — defense of deprivation of beneficial use of premises.

2. The burden of establishing the defense of deprivation of beneficial use of premises in an action for rent due and unpaid is upon the one pleading it.

Landlord and tenant — validity of lease — contract for forbidden act.

3. A contract leasing property in a city upon which to conduct a junk, metal, and rag business is not rendered void by the subsequent adoption of a statute which prevents the storage of rags in the class of buildings leased.

[See 16 R. C. L. 742.]

Contract — presumption as to lawful intent.

4. If a contract is fairly susceptible of an interpretation or construction which is lawful, it will be conclusively presumed that such was the intention of the parties rather than an agreement for something that is unlawful.

[See 6 R. C. L. 839.]

Landlord and tenant — effect of change of law on lease.

5. A lease which is lawful when made does not become unlawful by a subsequent change in the law, although the change may in some cases annul the contract obligation.

(Conklin v. Silver, — Iowa, —, 174 N. W. 573.)

Evidence — purpose of lease.

6. Upon the question of destruction of the beneficial use of leased property by passage of a statute forbidding the storage of rags upon it, evidence is not admissible of what the lessee told the lessor when negotiating the lease as to the purpose for which the premises were desired.

— evidence of expenditures in fitting up property.

7. In an action for rent alleged to be due and unpaid, where the defense is deprivation of the beneficial use of the building, evidence is not admissible as to expenditures by the lessee in fitting up the building.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County (De Graff, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover rent alleged to be due and unpaid. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. James C. Hume, for appellants:

All contracts are void which provide for doing a thing which is illegal.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is the owner of lot 6, block 2, in Scott & Dean's addition to the city of Des Moines. On a portion of the lot, and as a part of said property, is a frame building constructed and formerly occupied as a dwelling. This is the only building on the lot, and is within the fire limits established by the city. On May 22, 1917, plaintiff, by an agent, let the property by written lease to the defendants for the term of one year from June 1, 1917. By the terms of the lease the lessor was to make certain specified changes and repairs in the building to fit it for the lessees' use, and the lessees on their part undertook "to only use the premises for iron, metal, and rag business," and to pay a rental of $60 on the 1st day of each month. The lessees further bound themselves "not to engage in or permit any unlawful business on the premises, nor to permit the premises to be occupied for any business deemed extrahazardous on account of fire." The lessees took possession of the leased premises, and paid all the monthly instalments of rent up to and including the month of October, 1917, when they abandoned the premises and notified the lessor of their surrender or offer to surrender the lease because of matters hereinafter related. From the date last mentioned lessees have paid no rent, and plaintiff in this action demands a recovery of the unpaid monthly instalments for the rental year.

The reason for defendants' abandonment of the lease and the ground upon which they deny liability in this action is as follows: On July 4, 1917, and when the lessees had been in possession about one month, a statute enacted by the legislature (chap. 184, 37th G. A.) became effective, providing that "the depository or storing of inflammable junk, such as old rags, rope, cordage, rubber, bones and paper by dealers in such articles within the fire limits of any city, unless it be in a building of fireproof construction, is a public nuisance and may be abated and punished as such," and the defendants say that, the leased premises being within the fire limits of the city and the building not being of fireproof construction, the effect of said statute is to prohibit and destroy their rag business, for which the property was leased; that the principal business of the lessees there carried on was the buying, assorting, baling, storing, and shipping of rags, and that the statute which makes such business unlawful, and exposes the defendants to criminal prosecution, deprives them of any substantial or beneficial use of the property, thus releasing them from further obligation to pay rent.

I. Although the defendants as witnesses emphasize the use to which they put the leased premises as "the rag business," the testimony shows they also dealt largely in junk metals. It is shown that the upper story of the building was very largely, if not entirely, given over to the handling and sorting of rags, which were thrown down chutes made for that purpose into bins or boxes below, where they were baled for shipment. Upon the lot outside of the house were stored, in large heaps, quantities of old iron and other metals, while brass, lead, copper, and other of the more valuable kinds of junk were stored in the building. There was a spur or side track from one of the railroads, laid to or across the rear of the lot, which facilitated the receipt and shipment of the wares in which the defendants dealt. Altogether, we are satisfied that, while the operation of the statute mentioned served to narrow or restrict to some extent the scope of the business of the lessees, we think the evidence is insufficient to sustain a finding that it deprives them of the beneficial use of the leased property; and, as the defense is an affirmative one, the burden of establishing which is upon the party pleading it, the trial court did not err in refusing to submit it to the verdict of the jury.

Landlord and tenant—lease for rag business—deprivation of beneficial use.

Evidence—burden of proof—defense of deprivation of beneficial use of premises.

In the case of McCullough Realty Co. v. Laemmle Film Service, 181 Iowa, 594, 165 N. W. 33, on which appellant largely relies, the tenant was held released from his obligation to pay rent because by ordinance the city had prohibited the keeping, storing, or handling of motion picture films in the building leased by him, and, as the lease limited the lessee's use of the building to the keeping of a film exchange and theater supplies, the enactment of the ordinance left no beneficial use to him in the property. It was also held that the term "theater supplies" had reference only to supplies incident to the operation of film picture exhibitions, and that the prohibition of the conduct of a film exchange left the right or privilege of handling "theater supplies" in the building a thing without substantial value.

In this case, however, it seems clear that the right to buy, sell, store, and ship junk metals of all kinds, not only in the building, but upon the entire lot, is not in any sense a mere incident of the rag business, and that a loss of the privilege of using the building for the handling of rags does not deprive the lessees of the beneficial enjoyment of the property for the other specified uses. It may possibly render the use less valuable or less profitable, but there is no rule or principle of law which makes that fact a matter of defense or of counterclaim in an action upon the lease.

II. Counsel cite authorities upon the proposition that contracts to do an illegal act are void. The principle referred to is sound, but it can have no application here, for this contract was not unlawful when made, nor was it rendered unlawful by the statute which came into effect a month later.

Landlord and tenant—validity of lease—contract for forbidden act.

It was not then, nor is it now, unlawful to lease property to be used in the "iron, metal, and rag business." What the new statute does prohibit is, not the

"rag business," but the depositing or storing of old rags by "dealers in such articles" within the city fire limits, except in a fireproof building. There seems to be no legitimate reason for holding that a party may not be engaged in a lawful "rag business," even in a frame building within the fire limits, and he will not offend against the statute until he uses such place for the deposit or storage of rags.

It is an elementary rule that, if a contract is fairly susceptible of an interpretation or construction which is lawful, it will be conclusively presumed that such was the intention of the parties, rather than an agreement for something which is unlawful. Tested by this rule, the lease is not open to the objection of illegality, and we need take no time to discuss or consider what would have been the rights or remedies of the respective parties, were the allegation of illegality sustainable.

III. The same principle renders unnecessary any discussion of the severable or inseverable character of the contract. Defendants' contention that it is inseverable may be conceded. It is one lease of one entire piece of property for one entire consideration. The plaintiff thereby leases her property for a stated term, for a stated rental, and for use in a described business, which is not illegal. If the business be of a nature which is affected unfavorably by a subsequently enacted valid police regulation, it is a misfortune which the lessee must bear, so long, at least, as the beneficial use and enjoyment of the leasehold is not wholly destroyed. Even if wholly destroyed, the lessee is released from his obligation, not because the contract is unlawful, but because by an act of legislative power the exercise by the lessee of his contract rights is forbidden.

In other words, Landlord and tenant—effect of change of law on lease.

a lease which is lawful when made does not become unlawful by a subsequent change in the law; but the change of law may under some circumstances (such, for example, as this court had to deal with in McCullough Realty Co. v. Laemmle Film Service, supra) destroy or annul the contract obligation. This case does not, in our judgment, fall within the exceptional class. See Shreveport Ice & Brewing Co. v. Mandel Bros. 128 La. 314, 54 So. 831; Hecht v. Acme Coal Co. 19 Wyo. 18, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 773, 777, 113 Pac. 788, 117 Pac. 132, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 258.

IV. Error is assigned upon the ruling of the trial court excluding the testimony of the defendants concerning what they said to plaintiff's agent in negotiating for the lease concerning the purpose for which they were leasing the building and the use they proposed to make of the property.

There is no error in this ruling.

Where the written contract is obscure or ambiguous, or contains technical words or terms not in common use, testimony as to what was said by the parties in negotiation is often admissible to make the situation and the intent of the parties clear to the jury; but there is nothing here to call for such aids. The language of the writing is plain and intelligible, and neither party can be heard to add anything thereto. Nor was there any error in refusing to permit the defendants to show what they had expended in "fixing up the building." This was not relevant to any issue on trial, and was a collateral matter, which could only tend to confuse and distract the attention of the jurors from the real question before them.

No reversible error is shown, and the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Ladd, Ch. J., and Gaynor, and Stevens, JJ., concur.

ANNOTATION.

Lease of property for specified exclusive uses as affected by a partial restriction upon such uses by statute, ordinance, or ruling adopted or made during the term.

The present annotation is confined to cases involving leases wherein more than one purpose was specifically mentioned, and one or more less than all was subsequently restricted by statute or ordinance. This limitation excludes the analogous but somewhat distinctive class of cases which involve the question whether the specified use is exclusive or is merely permissive so as to allow the leased premises to be used for purposes not specifically mentioned. Also excluded are the cases which turn upon the question whether or not the specific use mentioned is broad enough to include more than one particular but distinctive beneficial use.

The decided weight of authority is to the effect that where the contract does not restrict the use of the leased premises to a single purpose, it is not invalidated by a subsequent enactment prohibiting the use for less than all of the several purposes specified. CONKLING v. SILVER (reported herewith) ante, 832 (lease to carry on iron, metal, and rag business exclusively); Standard Brewing Co. v. Weil (1916) 129 Md. 487, L.R.A.1917C, 929, 99 Atl. 661, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 1143 (lease for "saloon and restaurant" purposes only); Teller v. Boyle (1890) 132 Pa. 56, 18 Atl. 1069 (property leased for exclusive use as a saloon and dwelling); Grimsdick v. Sweetman [1909] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 740, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1162, 101 L. T. N. S. 278, 73 J. P. 450, 25 Times L. R. 750, 53 Sol. Jo. 717 (lease of "all that beerhouse and premises with the bakehouse in the rear formerly called the Epping Inn, but now The Seymour," and to be used for the enumerated purposes only). And see Lawrence v. White (1908) 131 Ga. 840, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 966, 63 S. E. 631, 15 Ann. Cas. 1099, wherein "the Albion Hotel," consisting of "the corridor, office, bar, barber shop, cigar stand, billiard room," etc., was leased, and in which it was held that the use was permissive so that the passage of a statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors did not, in the absence of a provision in the contract, entitle the lessee to a reduction or proportional abatement of the agreed rental. And see also Christopher v. Charles Blum Co. (1919) — Fla. —, 82 So. 765, wherein a building was leased for the purpose of carrying on a "wholesale and retail business, both or either, and other storage purposes," with a proviso that a certain part of the building was to be used "only for a first-class barroom for white people," and in which it was held that the uses specified were permissive, and not restrictive, so that it could not be said either that the lease was terminated and the lessees evicted, or that the lessees were relieved from further payment of rent by the enactment of a statute rendering the operation of barrooms illegal.

As is illustrated by the decision in Standard Brewing Co. v. Weil (1916) 129 Md. 487, L.R.A. 1917C, 929, 99 Atl. 661, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 1143, supra, this rule proceeds upon the theory that since the leases under consideration are for more than one purpose, the depriving of the lessee of one or more less than all of the specified purposes does not deprive him of the beneficial use of the leased property, he being still entitled to use the premises for the carrying on of the unrestricted part of the purposes specified in the lease. In this connection the court said: "The lessee has not been entirely deprived of the beneficial interest which the lease conferred. The saloon business was not the only use to which the property was agreed to be devoted. It was leased for the double purposes of a saloon and restaurant, and there is no prohibition against its continued use for the latter object.

The specified lines of business were not identical or inseparable. A restaurant is an establishment where meals and refreshments are served, while a saloon, as the term is here used, is a place where intoxicating liquors are sold and consumed. . . . There being, consequently, a serviceable use for which the property is still available consistently with the limitations of the demise, the lessee company is not in a position to assert that it is totally deprived of the benefit of the tenancy. It is further to be observed that while the possibility of a failure to secure a license for a saloon on the rented premises during the whole of the original and renewal terms of the lease might have been reasonably anticipated, no provision is made in the agreement for such a contingency."

And in the reported case (CONKLING v. SILVER, ante, 832) where a building was leased for the sole purpose of carrying on the "iron, metal, and rag business" therein, it was held that a statute inhibiting the storing of rags by dealers therein in buildings of the character leased, did not render the lease invalid, since it did not deprive the lessee of the beneficial use or enjoyment of the property because he could still carry on the business of dealing in iron, metal, and rags on the leased premises, and was merely denied the privilege of storing rags thereon, which, although it possibly rendered the use less valuable, did not destroy the beneficial use.

So, in Grimsdick v. Sweetman [1909] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 740, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1162, 101 L. T. N. S. 278, 73 J. P. 450, 25 Times L. R. 750, 53 Sol. Jo. 717, where the lease was of a "beerhouse and premises with the bakeshop in the rear," in holding that the lessee's inability to renew his license to conduct the beerhouse as such did not terminate the lease, both Darling, J., and Jelf, J., adopted the principle that a lease is not terminated unless the beneficial use of the premises is more than merely impaired, and applying the same argued that there was no such destruction of the uses specified in the lease as would wholly deprive the lessee of an advantage therefrom, since he could still live in the house and use the bakeshop even though he could not run a beerhouse.

And for a further discussion of this rule and the principles upon which it is based, see the dissenting opinion of McCulloch, Ch. J., in Kahn v. Wilhelm (1915) 118 Ark. 239, 177 S. W. 403, as quoted infra.

In a few instances contrary conclusions have been reached, but, as subsequently shown, this, with one possible exception, is not the result of the adoption of conflicting principles of law.

Thus, in Kahn v. Wilhelm (Ark.) supra, the majority of the court, applying the general principle of law that a contract is invalidated by the subsequent enactment of a police regulation which renders its performance illegal as to one of the parties, held that a lease of premises for use as a "hotel and saloon, and for no other purpose whatever," was terminated by a prohibitory liquor law. This was upon the theory that the building was leased for a single purpose, namely, the operation of a hotel and saloon, and Smith, J., speaking for the majority, said: "The lease does not provide for keeping a hotel or saloon, but for a 'hotel and saloon.' . . . The parties to this lease agreed and covenanted that the property should be used as a hotel and saloon and for no other purpose whatever, and, in construing the lease, we have no right to strike out one of the terms there employed. It is argued that the building could be used for a hotel, even though no saloon was kept there, and that a temperance saloon could be kept, where cigars and nonintoxicating drinks could be bought; and further that the property has other usable value. But we think the answer to this contention is that this is not a general lease, but a special one for the purpose of operating a hotel and saloon. . . . It must be conceded that there are courts of the highest authority which sustain appellant's [contrary] view of the law. But we think the better rule is announced by those courts which hold such contracts to be void, where their performance becomes unlawful." However, as previously noted, a strong dissent was entered by McCulloch, Ch. J., who argued that the principle of law applied by the majority was inapplicable, that a distinction should be made between leases which restricted the use of the premises to a single use and those which specified more than one use, and that in the present case two uses were specified which were not inseparable. In the course of his dissenting opinion he said: "I find no fault with the court's statement of the principle, as an abstract proposition of law, that 'a contract is invalidated by the subsequent enactment of a police regulation which renders its performance illegal as to one of the parties,' but that principle is not, in my judgment, applicable to the contract now under consideration. Such a construction of the contract should be adopted as will obviate a forfeiture or abrogation, if that construction be fairly within the meaning of the language used. The clause concerning the use of the leased premises was intended merely to permit the use for the purposes named and to restrict the use to that extent. It was manifestly not intended as a covenant to use the premises for those purposes,—certainly not for both purposes,—the operation of a saloon and a hotel. There is nothing in the contract itself nor in the evidence in the case to show that the lessor was interested in that particular use of the premises. Therefore, it would be a very strained construction of the contract to hold that it was a covenant on the part of the lessee to so use the premises. . . . Treating the contract, therefore, as one merely permitting the use of the premises for the operation of a hotel and as a saloon, and restricting the occupancy to those uses, I do not think the principle referred to should be applied. Under that state of the case, it cannot be said that the contract has been subsequently invalidated by operation of law. The contract is still valid notwithstanding the subsequent enactment of the regulation restricting the use of the premises so as to prohibit the operation of a saloon at that place. That part of the contract specifying the use to which the premises might be put is separable unless the contract be treated as a covenant on the part of the lessee to use the premises for the purposes named. The contract permits the use of the premises as a hotel and as a saloon, and, of course, extends to either one or both of the specified uses. The use of the premises for either one of the specified purposes would be within the letter of the contract. The test is this: Would the lessee be within his contractual rights in using the premises for the operation of a hotel without also operating a saloon? If so, he is not absolved from the obligation of the contract by reason of the fact that the new regulation enacted by the city council renders it unlawful for him to operate a saloon at that place. In order to hold otherwise, it would be necessary to construe the contract as an affirmative undertaking on the part of the lessee to use the premises as a saloon as well as a hotel, but I do not understand the court to go that far,—at any rate, it is not tenable to assume that position."

And in the Kahn Case it was further held that it was immaterial that the lessor was willing that the premises should be used for other purposes than those stated in the lease, the court saying that it could not consider the landlord's present inclination in determining the meaning of his written contract, and that while his permission for a use different from that specified would be essential, it would be a modification of the contract to read into it the landlord's changed purpose.

And a conclusion contrary to that of the majority of the cases was also reached in McCullough Realty Co. v. Laemmle Film Service (1917) 181

Iowa, 594, 165 N. W. 33, it having been held that a lease of premises "for film exchange and film and theater supplies purposes only" was terminated and the obligation to pay rent canceled by the enactment of a valid municipal ordinance which made it unlawful to keep, store, handle, or repair any inflammable motion picture films in buildings of the character of the one leased. But this decision, as is pointed out in the reported case (CONKLING v. SILVER, ante, 832), is clearly distinguishable from cases which fall within and apply the general rule, since in the McCullough Realty Co. Case the conclusion was based on the theory that the term "theater supplies," as used in the lease and under the principle ejusdem generis, had reference only to supplies incident to the operation of film theaters, so that the ordinance left the lessee no beneficial use in the property.

And it seems that the parties to a lease may expressly stipulate that it shall be avoided by enactment of a statute or ordinance which works even a partial restriction on the stipulated use. This supposition finds some support in Hooper v. Mueller (1909) 158 Mich. 595, 183 Am. St. Rep. 399, 123 N. W. 24. In this case a building was rented for hotel and saloon purposes, with a proviso that the lease should be void if the lessors did not furnish bondsmen as required by the Retail Liquor License Law, and it was held that the adoption of local option rendered the performance of the proviso impossible and unlawful so that the lease was avoided and the liability of the lessee for rent terminated.

v.

HANNAH L. ZUBER.

(— Okla. —, 184 Pac. 452.)

1. The leaving open of a switch leading to a sidetrack at a time when a passenger train may be expected momentarily, without ascertaining the location of the train, is "gross negligence," where the statute defines such negligence to be the want of slight care and diligence.

2. When a railroad company gives gratuitously, and a passenger accepts, a pass, the former waives its rights as a common carrier to exact compensation, and if the pass contains a condition to that effect, the latter assumes the risk of ordinary negligence of the company's employees. The arrangement is one which the parties may make, and no public policy is violated thereby; and if the passenger is injured while riding on such a pass gratuitously given, which she has accepted, the company is not liable therefor, in the absence of gross negligence, fraud, or wilful wrong of itself or its servants.

Appeal — instructions considered together.

3. Instructions must be considered together, and while an instruction, standing alone, may be subject to criticism, yet if the instructions, when taken in their entirety, fairly submit the issues to the jury, reversible error is not committed.

[See 14 R. C. L. 817.]

ERROR to the District Court for Washington County (Boone, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Clifford L. Jackson, W. R. Allen, M. D. Green, and Cottingham & Hayes, for plaintiffs in error:

The trial court erred in overruling the demurrers to the evidence and in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendants, because under the provisions of the pass upon which the plaintiff was riding there could be no recovery.

The railway companies were joint tort-feasors, and the release executed to the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company inured to the benefit of the Santa Fe Railway Company.

The validity of the release of liability contained in the pass is to be determined by the acts of Congress and the common law as interpreted by the Federal courts.

Pitchford, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was originally instituted in the district court of Washington county on July 14, 1915, by the defendant in error against the plaintiffs in error. The parties will hereafter be referred to as they appeared in the court below.

The plaintiff was a resident of the city of Sharon, Pennsylvania. The defendant Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company, hereafter referred to as the "Katy," owns and operates a line of steam railroad, which runs from the city of St. Louis, in the state of Missouri, to the city of Oklahoma City, in the state of Oklahoma, which line of steam railroad runs through the city of Bartlesville, in Washington county, state of Oklahoma. The defendant Atchison, Topeka, & Santa Fe Railway Company, hereafter referred to as the "Santa Fe," owns and operates a line of steam railroad, which runs from the city of Independence, in the state of Kansas, to the city of Tulsa, in the state of Oklahoma, and through the city of Bartlesville, in Washington county, state of Oklahoma. At a point approximately 2 miles north and east of the city of Bartlesville, in Washington county, the line of railway of the Katy runs into and connects with the railway line of the Santa Fe, and for a distance of some 2 or 3 miles from the said point, and to a point which is some 8 or 10 blocks south and west of the passenger station of the Santa Fe in the city of Bartlesville, the Katy uses the tracks and roadbeds of the Santa Fe. The portion of the line of railway belonging to the defendant Santa Fe between said points, as aforesaid, and all switches and sidetracks connected therewith between said points, belong to the Santa Fe and are under its exclusive control. The Santa Fe had permitted the Katy to move and propel its trains over that portion of its tracks for some time prior to the date of the injury. On the 24th day of August, 1914, the defendant Katy issued and delivered to plaintiff a certain trip pass, entitling the plaintiff to one trip from St. Louis, Missouri, to Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. Thereafter, on the 23d of September, 1914, plaintiff boarded one of the defendant Katy's regular passenger trains at St. Louis, Missouri, en route to Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. On the 24th day of September, at about 10:30 o'clock A. M., the train upon which plaintiff was a passenger reached a point a short distance north and east of the Santa Fe passenger station in Bartlesville, Oklahoma. Said passenger train was moving south and west at a speed of approximately 30 miles per hour, and ran into an open switch, which branched off from the main line of the Santa Fe track and near said point. The passenger train was wrecked and the plaintiff was injured. On the morning of the wreck, a crew or a gang of section men in the employ of the defendants had been working on and repairing the tracks and sidetracks of the Santa Fe at said point, and were engaged in repairing the same at the time said passenger train arrived at the switch.

The Katy filed an answer, alleging that it issued to the plaintiff, as the mother of E. B. Zuber, brakeman in the employ of the Baltimore & Ohio Railway Company, a free pass, entitling plaintiff to free transportation on the lines of the defendant from St. Louis, Missouri, to Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, and return, and that at the time of the alleged injury to the plaintiff she was being transported on one of defendant's passenger trains under and by virtue of said pass issued to the plaintiff as aforesaid; that said pass was issued to and received by the plaintiff and honored by the defendant under the terms and conditions printed thereon; that the person accepting and using said pass assumed all risk of accident, injury, and damage, whether resulting from the negligence of the servants and agents of the said defendant, or otherwise; and that the plaintiff is now barred from maintaining this action. The answer filed by the Santa Fe was practically the same as that filed by the Katy. The jury in the court below returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $3,000. The defendants appeal.

The assignments of error are numerous, but the main points relied upon by the defendants for reversal are: First, that the plaintiff, in accepting the pass over the defendant road, having thereby assumed all risk of accident, injury, and damage, whether resulting from the negligence of the servants and agents of the company or otherwise, is not entitled to recover; second, that the court erred in giving instructions Nos. 5, 6, 9, 10, and 13.

The pass upon which the plaintiff was being transported contained the following condition: "This pass is not transferable and must be signed in ink by the holder thereof. The person accepting and using it thereby assumes all risk of accident, injury, and damage whether resulting from the negligence of the servants and agents of the companies, or otherwise. It will be forfeited if presented by any other than the undersigned. I am not prohibited by Federal or state laws from receiving free transportation, and this pass will be lawfully used. . . . Accept it on the above conditions."

This pass was issued to the plaintiff as the dependent mother of a son who was in the employ of the Baltimore & Ohio Railway Company, and was a character of pass authorized by the acts of Congress relating to interstate commerce, the particular act in question being entitled: "An Act to Create a Commerce Court, and to Amend the Act Entitled 'An Act to Regulate Commerce,' Approved February Fourth, Eighteen Hundred and Eighty-seven, as Herebefore Amended, and for Other Purposes," approved June 18, 1910 (36 Stat. at L. 539, chap. 309), which provides (§ 7, page 546, Comp. Stat. § 8563, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 359):

"No common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, after January first, nineteen hundred and seven, directly or indirectly, issue or give any interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation for passengers, except to its employees and their families: . . . Provided, that this provision shall not be construed to prohibit the interchange of passes for the officers, agents, and employees of common carriers, and their families."

A case in many respects similar to the instant case was decided by this court in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Smith, 38 Okla. 157, 132 Pac. 494, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 620. There the plaintiff was riding on a free pass at the time the injury occurred, which was delivered to her in the state of Kansas, of which state she was a citizen, and under whose laws the railroad corporation was organized. The pass was good for the round trip between Wellington, Kansas, situated a short distance north of the Oklahoma state line, to Perry, Oklahoma, situated about 53 or 54 miles south thereof. The injury occurred in Oklahoma, while the plaintiff was on the return trip. On the back of the pass was the following provision signed by the plaintiff: "This pass is not transferable, must be signed in ink by the holder thereof, and the person accepting and using it thereby assumes all risks of accidents and damages to person and baggage, under any circumstances, whether caused by negligence of agents or otherwise. . . . I accept the above conditions."

There the court held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. Justice Kane, in the third paragraph of the syllabus, said: "When a railroad company gives gratuitously and a passenger accepts, a pass, the former waives its rights as a common carrier to exact compensation; and, if the pass contains a <sup>Carrier-pass-</sup><sub>injury-liability.</sub> condition to that effect, the latter assumes the risks of ordinary negligence of the company's employees. The arrangement is one which the parties may make, and no public policy is violated thereby, and if the passenger is injured or killed while riding on such a pass gratuitously given, which he has accepted with knowledge of the conditions therein, the company is not liable therefor either to him or to his heirs, in the absence of wilful or wanton negligence."

In the case of Smith v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 114 C. C. A. 157, 194 Fed. 79, the syllabus is as follows:

(1) "Whether a waiver of liability for injuries, printed on the back of a pass delivered to an employee, was valid, so as to constitute a defense to an action for injuries resulting from the carrier's ordinary negligence, depended on the law of the place of the accident, and not on the law of the place where the pass was delivered, since the rule that a contract will be interpreted according to the law of the place of its execution and delivery does not apply to actions of tort.

(2) "The Oklahoma statute (Comp. Laws 1909, § 428) providing that a carrier of persons without reward must use ordinary diligence for their safe carriage was only applicable in the absence of contract, and did not apply to an employee traveling on a pass, who had signed a waiver of liability for any injuries that might occur, which waiver was valid both in Oklahoma and in the Federal courts."

In the opinion, it is stated: "The courts have uniformly held that a contract exempting a carrier from liability for negligence, valid at the place of its execution and delivery, will not avail as a defense when the injury occurs in a state by whose laws such contracts are declared to be void as against public policy. Having adopted that rule when the law of the place of the injury would impose a liability upon the carrier, can a contrary rule be adopted when such law would protect the carrier by enforcing the contract? We think not. The contract is by its terms tied to the tort, and the same law should be applied to the one as to the other."

In the case of Boering v. Chesapeake Beach R. Co. 193 U. S. 442, 48 L. ed. 742, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 515, the action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by Mrs. Boering while riding upon a free pass, which contained the following stipulation: "The person accepting and using this pass thereby assumes all risk of accident and damage to person and property, whether caused by negligence of the company's agents or otherwise."

The contention of the plaintiff in that case was that the company was liable in any event for injuries caused by its negligence, because it did not appear that Mrs. Boering knew or assented to the stipulation. The testimony showed that the husband had secured the transportation, and that they had traveled on these passes before, and plaintiff insisted that the exemption from liability for negligence resulted only from a contract therefor; that there could be no contract without knowledge of the terms thereof and assent thereto, and that she neither had knowledge of the stipulation, nor had she assented to its terms; that, therefore, there was no contract between her and the company exempting it from liability for negligence. The court there held that the plaintiff in accepting the free pass was bound to know the conditions thereof, and that she could not through the intermediary of an agent obtain the privilege—a mere license—and then plead that she did not know upon what conditions it was granted. It was further held that a carrier is not bound, any more than any other owner of property who grants the privilege, to hunt the party to whom the privilege is given, and see that all conditions attached to it are made known; that the duty rested rather upon the one receiving the privilege to ascertain those conditions. While the case just quoted is relied upon by the defendants as strongly tending to support their contention, yet we fail to see wherein there is any similarity between this case and the case at bar.

The case of Northern P. R. Co. v. Adams, 192 U. S. 440, 48 L. ed. 513, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 408, relied upon by defendants, was an action brought by the widow and son of the deceased. The deceased was traveling on a free pass containing the following: "The person accepting this free ticket agrees that the Northern Pacific Railway Company shall not be liable, under any circumstances, whether of negligence of agents or otherwise, for any injury to the person, or for any loss or damage to the property, of the passenger using the same. I accept the above conditions."

The facts in that case are as follows: On November 13, 1898, the deceased started on one of the Northern Pacific trains from Hope, Idaho, to Spokane, Washington. Shortly after leaving Hope, Adams, then in the smoking car, went to the dining car for cigars. To reach the dining car he passed through the day coach to the tourist sleeper. After buying the cigars, he left the dining car and went forward. This was the last seen of him. His body was found the next day opposite a curve in the railway track about 6 miles west of Hope. There was no direct testimony as to how he got off the train, whether by an accidental stumble, or being thrown therefrom through the lurching of the train, which was going at a high rate of speed. The road from Hope to the place where the body was found is in Idaho. There was a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $14,000, which was sustained by the circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit (54 C. C. A. 196, 116 Fed. 324), and thereupon the case was brought to the United States Supreme Court. Justice Brewer, in delivering the opinion, among other things said: "The question, then, is distinctly presented whether a railroad company is liable in damages to a person injured, through the negligence of its employees, who at the time is riding on a pass given as a gratuity, and upon the condition, known to and accepted by him, that it shall not be responsible for such injuries. It will be perceived that the question excludes injuries resulting from wilful or wanton acts, but applies only to cases of ordinary negligence. The facts of this case certainly do not call for any broader inquiry than this. The specific matters of negligence charged are the placing of a non-vestibuled car in a vestibuled train, and the high rate of speed at which the train passed around the curve at the place of injury. But non-vestibuled cars are in constant use all over the country,—were the only cars in use up to a few years ago,—and further the deceased, having passed over the open platform, knew exactly its condition. As the court charged the jury, 'Mr. Adams must be presumed to have known that it was not vestibuled and to have acted with perfect knowledge of the fact.' The rate of speed was no greater than is common on other trains everywhere in the land, and the train was, in fact, run safely on this occasion. We shall assume, however, but without deciding, that the jury were warranted, considering the absence of the vestibuled platform and the high rate of speed in coming around the curve, in finding the company guilty of negligence; but clearly it was not acting either wilfully or wantonly in running its trains at this not uncommon rate of speed, and all that can at most be said is that there was ordinary negligence. Is the company responsible for injuries resulting from ordinary negligence to an individual whom it permits to ride without charge on condition that he take all the risk of such negligence?"

In the case of Charleston & W. C. R. Co. v. Thompson, 234 U. S. 576, 58 L. ed. 1476, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 964, Mr. Justice Holmes, delivering the opinion, said: "The main question is whether, when the statute permits the issue of a 'free pass' to its employees and their families, it means what it says. The railroad was under no obligation to issue the pass. It may be doubted whether it could have entered into one, for then the services would be the consideration for the duty and the pass, and by § 2 [Hepburn Act] it was forbidden to charge 'a greater or less or different compensation' for transportation of passengers from that in its published rates. The antithesis in the statute is between the reasonable charges to be shown in its schedules and the free passes which it may issue only to those specified in the act. To most of those enumerated the free pass obviously would be gratuitous in the strictest sense, and when all that may receive them are grouped in a single exception, we think it plain that the statute contemplates the pass as gratuitous in the same sense to all. It follows, or rather is saying the same thing in other words, that even on the improbable speculation that the possibility of getting an occasional free pass entered into the motives of the employee in working for the road, the law did not contemplate his work as a conventional inducement for the pass, but, on the contrary, contemplated the pass as being what it called itself, free."

The contention of the plaintiff in the case just cited was that the pass, being given to one of the employees of the defendant company, was really not a free pass, but was issued upon consideration of the services of the employee as an incident to the right to issue a free pass to an employee or his family, and conceded that the carrier had the right to impose upon the issuance, acceptance, and use of a free pass the condition that the carrier shall not be liable in damages for personal injury to the recipient in consequence of its ordinary negligence, but that this exemption would not apply to employees. The question of gross negligence was not there raised by the plaintiff, or considered by the court.

It is conceded by the plaintiff in the instant case that if the injury complained of resulted from ordinary negligence on the part of the defendants, she would not be entitled to recover, but that the provision in the pass exempting the defendants from liability was not intended to, nor did it, have the effect of protecting the defendants from injury resulting from gross negligence.

We have seen in the case of Smith v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 114 C. C. A. 157, 194 Fed. 79, that in an interstate pass the carrier may relieve itself from negligence, except in case of wilful negligence. As to what constitutes gross or wilful negligence, the authorities seem to be divided. Our statutes define the various degrees of negligence. Section 2916, Rev. Laws 1910, gives three degrees of care and of diligence, namely, slight, ordinary, and great; the latter includes the former. Under § 2917, id., slight care or diligence is defined to be such as persons of ordinary prudence usually exercise about their own affairs of slight importance; ordinary care or diligence is such as they usually exercise about their own affairs of ordinary importance; and great care or diligence is such as they usually exercise about their own affairs of great importance. Section 2918, id., gives three degrees of negligence, namely, slight, ordinary, and gross; the latter includes the former. These degrees of negligence are defined by § 2919, id., as follows: "Slight negligence consists in the want of great care and diligence; ordinary negligence, in the want of ordinary care and diligence; and gross negligence, in the want of slight care and diligence."

If the negligence complained of in the instant case was only ordinary negligence, the defendants would not be liable. Whether or not defendants were guilty of gross negligence was left for the jury to decide under the court's instructions defining the degrees of negligence. They found that the defendants were guilty of gross negligence. Whether or not acts surrounding a particular injury would constitute ordinary or gross negligence would depend upon all the circumstances surrounding the accident. We can conceive of many instances where the negligence would only be ordinary, and, on the other hand, we can conceive of cases where the negligence would be gross. As long as the English language is spoken, we shall hear acts constituting negligence denominated as defined by our statutes. Defendants cite many respectable authorities seeming to hold that the negligence contemplated in the issuance of passes means any negligence, and that it is impossible to define negligence as being ordinary, gross, or wilful, and that when it is said the carrier is relieved from negligence, it clearly means all kinds of negligence. There is some conflict of opinion in the several states of the Union as to what is covered by the stipulation in a free pass exempting the railroad from liability for injury caused by its negligence. There are a number of opinions holding that such a stipulation is valid and binding on the passenger, precluding a recovery for injuries, whether caused by the carrier's negligence or otherwise, and attempting to abolish degrees of negligence. Other courts, while conceding the validity of such exemptions in case of ordinary negligence hold the carrier responsible in cases of wilful, wanton, or gross negligence, and in Oklahoma it is declared by § 797, Rev. Laws 1910: "A common carrier cannot be exonerated, by any agreement made in anticipation thereof, from liability for the gross negligence, fraud or wilful wrong of himself or his servants."

The California statute is identical with the above section. In the case of Walther v. Southern P. Co. 159 Cal. 769, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 235, 116 Pac. 51, the wreck was caused by the passenger train running into an open switch. The court uses the following language:

"In her complaint she alleged that the accident and consequent death of deceased were caused by the 'gross negligence' of defendant, and these allegations were found by the trial court, which tried the case without a jury, to be true. . . . We think that the question of public policy in regard to such contracts of exemption, even as to passengers carried gratuitously, has been settled in this state by legislative enactment. Section 2175 of the Civil Code provides: 'A common carrier cannot be exonerated, by any agreement made in anticipation thereof, from liability for the gross negligence, fraud, or wilful wrong of himself or his servants.' Aside from the question of the meaning of the term 'gross negligence' as used in this section, it is earnestly contended that the section has no application in the case of one carried without consideration of any kind, and that as to such a passenger the carrier is not a common carrier at all. We are of the opinion that the question of consideration cuts no figure in determining the applicability of the section. Section 2168 of the Civil Code, contained in the same chapter, which is entitled 'Common Carriers in General,' declares that 'everyone who offers to the public to carry persons, property, or messages, excepting only telegraphic messages, is a common carrier of whatever he thus offers to carry.' And, of course, the defendant was, under this definition, a common carrier of persons. As such, under other provisions of the same chapter and other chapters, it was entitled to refuse to carry any person except upon compliance with certain requirements, including the payment of a prescribed reasonable compensation, but, at the time of this accident, at least, it could legally waive any of these requirements on the part of the passenger, and could receive and carry him for a reduced or different consideration, or altogether without consideration.

"But on whatever terms a common carrier of persons voluntarily receives and carries a person, the relation of common carrier and passenger exists. This is recognized by some of the authorities upholding the exemption from liability for negligence provision in the case of a passenger carried gratuitously. See Rogers v. Kennebec S. B. Co. 86 Me. 261, 25 L.R.A. 491, 29 Atl. 1069, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 590. The sole inquiry in this regard is, as has been said, whether the person was lawfully on the vehicle (see Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Muhling, 30 Ill. 9, 81 Am. Dec. 336), has been voluntarily received by the common carrier on any terms for the purpose of carriage, and is not, as was the case in Sessions v. Southern P. Co. 159 Cal. 599, 114 Pac. 982, a mere trespasser on the vehicle. The voluntary waiver of all claim for compensation for carriage of a person does not take away from the status of the carrier as a common carrier so far as the person carried is concerned, any more than would a special reduction in the amount of compensation charged or a special concession as to some other authorized requirement accomplish such effect. The carrier is still a common carrier as to such person, with all the obligations of a common carrier, except in so far as those obligations are limited by contract provisions which are not inhibited by law. Other sections of our Civil Code permit such limitations as to certain matters not here involved, but § 2175 expressly prohibits limitations of liability for gross negligence on the part of the common carrier or his servants, whatever, as we read the various sections bearing upon this matter, may be the terms upon which it receives and undertakes to carry a passenger.

"This brings us to a consideration of the question of the meaning of the term 'gross negligence,' as used in § 2175 of the Civil Code, for under the views already stated the exemption provision in the pass of deceased was not effectual to free defendant from liability for damages resulting from 'gross negligence' of the defendant or its servants, within the meaning of the term 'gross negligence,' as used in said section. The contention of learned counsel for defendant is that these words, in the connection in which they are used, imply something in the nature of wilful wrong, and do not include anything in the nature of a mere omission to exercise care without knowledge that such omission will probably result in injury to others. Section 2175 was, as it now stands, a part of the original Civil Code adopted in the year 1872. This Code contained two sections declaring that there are three degrees of care and diligence,—slight, ordinary, and great,—and three degrees of negligence,—slight, ordinary, and gross. Slight care was defined as that 'which is such as persons of ordinary prudence usually exercise about their own affairs of slight importance,' and gross negligence was defined as that 'which consists in the want of slight care and diligence.' Sections 16 and 17. These sections were repealed outright in 1874, but such repeal cannot affect the question of the construction of the words 'gross negligence' in § 2175 of the Civil Code, as it is the intention of the legislature at the time of the adoption of the latter section that must control.

"We see no warrant for holding that the term 'gross negligence' as used therein was intended to mean other than the 'gross negligence' defined in § 17 of the same act 'to establish a Civil Code,' which was simply 'the want of slight care and diligence.' This must necessarily have been the view of this court in Donlon Bros. v. Southern P. Co. 151 Cal. 763, 766, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 811, 91 Pac. 603, 12 Ann. Cas. 1118, for an examination of the record shows that there could have been no other ground for the expression of opinion 'that there was sufficient evidence in the case warranting the jury in finding that the defendant was guilty of gross negligence occasioning the loss and injury complained of.' . . . Accepting this definition of gross negligence, it cannot reasonably be contended that the evidence was not legally sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the deceased was killed by the gross negligence of defendant's servants."

In the case of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Stone, 34 Okla. 364, L.R.A. 1915A, 142, 125 Pac. 1120, the plaintiff at the time of the injury was a trespasser upon a regular passenger train of defendant company. The accident occurred in the west end of the railway yards of Yukon. The train on which he was riding was running at the rate of about 30 miles an hour when approaching the west end of the passing track at Yukon station. On this passing track were some twelve or fifteen cars which in some way not clearly shown were permitted to run down grade to the switch block and onto the main track, and collide with the incoming passenger train, on which the plaintiff was riding. These loose freight cars struck the passenger car, thereby causing the injury complained of. Commissioner Sharp, in delivering the opinion, said: "To leave a string of freight cars on such siding, not under control, and where the same, either by momentum or gravitation, might run down grade to where the siding connected with the main line, and then upon the said main line, . . . even though in the daytime, and at a time when a regular passenger train was due, would be proof to show such gross and wanton negligence and recklessness as would manifest a disregard of all consequences."

In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Bodemer, 139 Ill. 596, 32 Am. St. Rep. 218, 29 N. E. 692, the facts were that the train which committed the injury was traveling at a speed of 35 or 40 miles an hour in the crowded city of Chicago, over street crossings upon unguarded tracks, so connected with the public street and so apparently a continuation of the public street as to be regarded by ordinary citizens as to be located in the public street along a portion of the city tracks, where persons are known to be passing and crossing every day, in conceded violation of the city ordinance as to speed and without warning of the approach of the train by the ringing of the bell. It was said by the court: "This conduct tended to show such a gross want of care and regard for the rights of others as to justify the presumption of wilfulness."

In the case of Northern P. R. Co. v. Adams, 192 U. S. 440, 48 L. ed. 513, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 408, we find the following: "It will be perceived that the question excludes injuries resulting from wilful or wanton acts, but applies only to cases of ordinary negligence."

If the court in the Adams Case was not of the opinion that there were degrees in negligence, why use the language quoted? There has been nothing said or indicated by the United States court, since the Adams Case, so far as we have been able to find, to the effect that the provision in a free pass, waiving claims against the carrier for negligence, was intended to include every degree of negligence.

In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Read, 37 Ill. 484, 87 Am. Dec. 260, the first paragraph of the syllabus is as follows: "A passenger, while traveling in the cars of a railroad, received injuries to his person occasioned by a collision of trains. At the time of the accident, the passenger was traveling under a free pass given him by the company, upon the back of which was this printed indorsement: 'The person accepting this free ticket assumes all risks of accidents, and expressly agrees that this company shall not be liable under any circumstances, whether of negligence of their agents, or otherwise, for any injury to the person, or for any loss or injury to the property, of the passenger using the ticket.' In an action on the case against the company to recover damages for the injuries thus received by the passenger, it was held that this agreement did not exempt the company from liability for the gross negligence of its employees, but it did exempt it from liability for any other species or degree of negligence not denominated gross, or which might have the character of recklessness. For such unavoidable accidents as will happen to the best managed railroad trains, this agreement would be a perfect immunity to the company."

To the same effect see Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Beggs, 85 Ill. 80, 28 Am. Dec. 613. In Indiana C. R. Co. v. Mundy, 21 Ind. 48, 83 Am. Dec. 339, the court said: "Where a person traveling on a railroad receives from the company a free pass, upon which is indorsed a statement that 'it is agreed that the person accepting this ticket assumes all risk of personal injury and loss or damage to property whilst using the same on the trains of the company,' such indorsement or agreement does not cast upon such person any risks arising from the gross negligence of the servants of the railroad company in running the train; and it would seem that such agreement does not cast upon such person any risks arising from any negligence of the servants of the railroad company in running the trains."

To the same effect see Philadel- phia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 468, 14 L. ed. 502, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 602; The New World v. King, 16 How. 469, 14 L. ed. 1019, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 614.

The evidence introduced at the trial in the case at bar tended to show that the car upon which plaintiff was riding could not have gotten onto the sidetrack without the switch being open. The section foreman of the Santa Fe had a key to the switch, and the trainmen had a key, and the evidence further tends to show that the foreman of the concrete gang working at the switch on the date of the accident also had a key. The train upon which plaintiff was riding was due at Bartlesville about 11 o'clock A. M. The question whether the action of the defendants, in leaving open the switch at that time, knowing that a passenger train might be expected at that hour, without ascertaining the location of the train, and without having anyone looking after the switch, would be considered gross negligence, was a matter to be submitted to the jury under proper instructions. Under the evidence in the case, we are of the opinion that the jury was justified in finding the accident resulted from gross negligence on the part of defendants.

We recognize the rule is well established that the right of the carrier to stipulate for exemption from liability for its own negligence in regard to an interstate pass is not a local question, but is a matter for the Federal courts. As we understand, the rule as enunciated in the case of Missouri P. R. Co. v. Castle, 224 U. S. 541, 56 L. ed. 875, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 606, is as follows: A statute of the state where the injury occurred can be applied until Congress has acted in the matter. In the above case, the plaintiff based his right to recover upon a Nebraska statute, which undertook, among other things, to take away the defense of contributory negligence in cases of that character, when the negligence of the employer was gross in comparison to that of the employee, but the damages were to be diminished according to the negligence of the employee. The railroad company there contended that in respect to interstate transactions this legislation could not control as the same violated the commerce clause of the Constitution. In delivering the opinion, Chief Justice White uses the following language: "The repugnancy of the statute to the commerce clause of the Constitution was also averred on the ground that 'the plaintiff at the time he received the injuries complained of was engaged as an employee of an interstate railroad engaged in commerce between the states of Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska,' and the statute of Nebraska 'attempts to regulate and control, as well as create, a cause of action and remedy, imposing upon the defendant company a liability inconsistent with and repugnant to the action of the Congress of the United States on said subject.' . . . And as, at the time the plaintiff received the injuries complained of, there was no subsisting legislation by Congress affecting the liability of railway companies to their employees, under the conditions shown in this case, the state was not debarred from thus legislating for the protection of railway employees engaged in interstate commerce."

If Congress has ever enacted a statute relative to interstate free passes, defining the degrees of negligence, we have been unable to find the same, nor have we been cited to any by counsel; therefore we see no reason why the Oklahoma statute, that a "common carrier cannot be exonerated by an agreement from liability for gross negligence," etc., would not be applicable to the case at bar. Certainly the decisions of the Federal court, quoted supra, clearly seem to contemplate that even in the absence of any state statute the common carrier could not be exonerated by any agreement as against the gross negligence, fraud, or wilful wrong of itself or its servants.

The defendants complain of instructions Nos. 5, 6, 9, 10, and 13, which are as follows:

(5) "Under the law of this state, gross negligence, as is used in these instructions, is defined as the want of slight care and diligence. It is the doing of some act or thing which a person of ordinary prudence and intelligence would not do under the circumstances, or the failure to do some act or thing which a person of ordinary prudence and intelligence would do under like circumstances. Should such conduct or acts be of such a nature as to amount to a gross want of care and regard for the rights of others, it amounts to wilfulness, and it is not necessary, in order to raise an inference of such negligence, to prove that the defendant's servants were actuated by ill will directed specially towards the plaintiff, or to have known that she was in such position as to be likely to be injured."

(6) "Slight care and diligence as used in these instructions is such care and diligence as persons of ordinary prudence usually exercise about their own affairs of slight importance."

(9) "You are instructed that the defendants owed to the plaintiff the duty of conveying her from St. Louis, Missouri, to Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, using ordinary care and prudence to so maintain and operate their trains, lines of railroad, and roadbed, switches, and yards, as to make them reasonably safe for travel by the public in general, without regard to whether the plaintiff was riding on a pass or not."

(10) "You are instructed that the acts of Congress relative to interstate commerce authorize and permit carriers to issue free passes to dependent members of the family of employees of railroad companies, and to stipulate in such passes that the person using the same for transportation shall assume all risks of accident, injury, and damage, whether resulting from the ordinary negligence of the servants and agents of the company issuing the pass, or otherwise; but in this connection, you are instructed that the law does not permit the defendants to contract against injury resulting from the acts of their employees amounting to gross negligence, or a wanton disregard of the rights of others."

(13) "You are therefore instructed that, should you find from the evidence in this case, by a fair preponderance thereof, that the plaintiff was riding upon a passenger train of the Katy Railroad Company on the 24th day of September, 1914, over the railroad line of the defendant Santa Fe Railroad Company, and that the servants, agents, or employees of the defendants, or either of them, were not in the exercise of slight care and diligence to keep the lines and appliances in and about the yard in the city of Bartlesville in a reasonably safe condition for traffic, but were guilty of gross negligence, as defined by these instructions, in opening and permitting to remain open a certain switch, and that said train ran into said open switch and collided with a freight train standing upon said switch or sidetrack, and that thereby plaintiff was injured, it will be your duty to find for the plaintiff, and, if you fail so to find, you will return a verdict for the defendants."

The court may have been in error in giving instruction No. 9, but it is a settled rule in this jurisdiction that instructions Appeal—instructions
together. must be construed as a whole and together, and it is not necessary that any particular paragraph thereof contain all the law of the case. It is sufficient if, when taken together and considered as a whole, they fairly present the law of the case, and there is no conflict between the different paragraphs thereof, and while an instruction, standing alone, may be subjected to the criticism of being indefinite and uncertain, yet, if other instructions fairly submit the material issues to the jury, reversible error is not committed. Ponca City Ice Co. v. Robertson, — Okla. —, 169 Pac. 1111; Lons-

ANNOTATION.

What amounts to gross negligence for which carrier is liable to free passenger.

- I. Introductory, 852.
- II. Acts amounting to gross negligence, 852.
- III. Acts not amounting to gross negligence, 854.

I. Introductory.

The question, What amounts to gross negligence for which a carrier will be liable to a free passenger, must be decided by the particular circumstances of each case, since the law furnishes no adequate definition of the term "gross negligence" beyond such generalities as that "gross negligence is the want of slight diligence" and the like. Indeed, it has been said by the Supreme Court of the United States that "if the law furnishes no definition of the terms gross negligence, or ordinary negligence, which can be applied in practice, but leaves it to the jury to determine, in each case, what the duty was, and what omissions amount to a breach of it, it would seem that imperfect and confessedly unsuccessful attempts to define that duty had better be abandoned." The New World v. King (1853) 16 How. (U. S.) 469, 14 L. ed. 1019, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 614. For this reason no attempt has been made to deduce any general rule from the cases falling within the scope of the present discussion, but the decisions have been classified merely in accordance with the holding of the court as to the presence or absence of gross negligence.

The discussion excludes cases wherein it was apparent that the passenger was a drover or other person accompanying freight, or a mail clerk, express messenger, news agent, etc., since by the weight of authority such persons are considered as passengers for hire.

II. Acts amounting to gross negligence.

In each of the following cases the negligence of the carrier was held to be of that degree denominated as gross, subjecting the carrier to liability to a free passenger:

Canada.—Ryckman v. Hamilton, G. & B. Electric R. Co. (1905) 10 Ont. L. Rep. 419, 4 Ann. Cas. 1126.

In The New World v. King (U. S.) supra, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff had been scalded by steam and hot water from the explosion of a boiler flue on the defendant's steamboat, on which he was traveling as a free passenger, the court held that the failure of the defendant to exert the skill required for the proper management of the boilers and machinery of the steamboat amounted to gross negligence for the results of which the defendant was liable. In defining gross negligence the court, quoting the supreme court of Maine, said: "How much care will, in a given case, relieve a party from the imputation of gross negligence, or what omission will amount to the charge, is necessarily a question of fact, depending on a great variety of circumstances which the law cannot exactly define."

In Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby (U. S.) supra, it appeared that the plaintiff had been injured by jumping from one of the defendant's cars to avoid an impending collision with another car approaching on the same track. The plaintiff was a stockholder of the defendant company, and at the time was riding by invitation of the president of the company and paying no fare. The evidence disclosed that the engineer of the colliding locomotive had acted in disobedience of his orders in running the locomotive on the track on which the collision occurred. The court, affirming a verdict for the plaintiff, held that the acts of the defendant's servant constituted gross negligence for which the plaintiff was entitled to recover, although he was not traveling in one of the usual passenger cars.

In Walther v. Southern P. Co. (Cal.) supra, the evidence showed that the train on which the deceased had been riding was wrecked by running into a switch which had been left open by a switch foreman in violation of the defendant's rules. The deceased was, at the time, a free passenger, and had agreed not to hold the defendant liable for any injuries suffered by him. It was held, however, that the act of the defendant amounted to gross negligence for which it was liable.

In Illinois C. R. Co. v. O'Keefe (1896) 63 Ill. App. 102, it was held that the action of an agent of the defendant company in ordering a train to proceed, on the theory that another train was late, when such was not the case, amounted to gross negligence for which the carrier was liable to the representative of a free passenger killed in the resulting collision. (That case was reversed in (1897) 168 Ill. 115, 39 L.R.A. 148, 61 Am. St. Rep. 68, 48 N. E. 294, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 48, on the ground that the deceased, by riding on the front platform of a baggage car without the defendant's consent, did not thereby become a passenger.)

In Pennsylvania Co. v. Purvis (1906) 128 Ill. App. 367, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by a collision between the train on which he was traveling as a free passenger, and a freight train of the defendant which at the time was backing down the track to take up some freight cars which had broken away. The court, affirming a verdict for the plaintiff, despite a contract limiting the carrier's liability for negligence, stated that in its opinion the evidence warranted a finding of gross negligence, although it quoted authorities to the effect that any negligence when the passenger was not at fault was gross negligence.

In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Read (1865) 37 Ill. 484, 87 Am. Dec. 260, approved in Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Beggs (1877) 85 Ill. 80, 28 Am. Rep. 613, the evidence showed that the plaintiff, while traveling as a free passenger on the defendant's train, was injured by the running of the engine of a freight train into the car in which he was riding. At the time of the collision it was dark and foggy and the track was slippery. The court held that the defendant would not be protected by a contract limiting its liability for negligence, saying: "The negligence in this case was found by the jury to have been gross, amounting, as we are inclined to think, to recklessness on the part of the conductor having charge of the train in which appellee was a passenger, consequently the company are not protected by this special contract." But a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed on the plea of a release of all damages.

In a case where the evidence showed that the track of the defendant railroad was rough and uneven, the ties rotten, and the rails battered, split, and insecurely fastened, the court held that the jury were fully warranted in finding that such a condition was the result of gross negligence, for which the defendant was liable to a free passenger injured by the derailment of a car, regardless of a contract by which the plaintiff agreed to assume all risk of injury. Jacksonville Southeastern R. Co. v. Southworth (1889) 32 Ill. App. 307, affirmed in (1890) 135 Ill. 250, 25 N. E. 1093.

In Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1894) 162 Mass. 66, 25 L.R.A. 157, 44 Am. St. Rep. 335, 37 N. E. 770, it appeared that a train of the defendant had collided with a car in which one Doyle was riding as a free passenger. The collision occurred by reason of the carelessness of the engineer of the colliding train. The court held that the defendant was chargeable with gross negligence and liable for the death of Doyle, although he had agreed to assume the risk of all injury.

In Jacobus v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. (1873) 20 Minn. 125, Gil. 110, 18 Am. Rep. 360, the plaintiff, who had been injured while riding on the defendant's train as a free passenger, sought to recover for the injuries incurred, although he had agreed to assume all risk of accident caused by the negligence of the defendant. It appeared that the injury was caused by the breaking of a stick of cross-grained cordwood which was used as the stake of a loaded lumber car in the train, while the train was traveling at a rapid speed. It was held that the facts showed gross negligence, for the results of which the defendant was liable.

In Bryan v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1888) 32 Mo. App. 228, the court said that where a free passenger was himself without fault, any negligence of the carrier resulting in his injury would be gross negligence.

In the reported case (MISSOURI, K. & T. R. Co. v. ZUBER, ante, 840) it is held that the leaving open of a switch at an hour when a passenger train may be expected, without ascertaining the location of the train and without leaving anyone to guard the switch, constitutes gross negligence for which the defendant is liable in damages to a passenger injured while traveling on a gratuitous pass.

In Annas v. Milwaukee & M. R. Co. (1886) 67 Wis. 46, 57 Am. Rep. 388, 30 N. W. 282, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 546, the plaintiff sought to recover damages for the death of her husband, occasioned by the alleged negligence of the defendant railroad. It appeared that the husband was killed while traveling as a free passenger in one of the defendant's trains which, while stalled in a snowstorm, was struck by an engine with a snowplow attached, which had approached without slackening speed. The husband had agreed to assume all risk of injury, but it was held that the evidence was sufficient to show gross negligence for the results of which the defendant was liable.

In Ryckman v. Hamilton, G. & B. Electric R. Co. (1905) 10 Ont. L. Rep. 419, 4 Ann. Cas. 1126, the court said that evidence of a head-on collision between the car on which a free passenger was riding, and another car of the defendant company, was prima facie evidence of gross negligence for which the carrier was liable.

III. Acts not amounting to gross negligence.

In each of the following cases the act or omission of the carrier was held not to amount to gross negligence, subjecting the carrier to liability to a free passenger: Northern P. R. Co. v. Adams (1903) 192 U. S. 440, 48 L. ed. 513, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 408; Smith v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1912) 114 C. C. A. 157, 194 Fed. 79; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Beggs (1877) 85 Ill. 80, 28 Am. Rep. 613; John v. Northern P. R. Co. (1910) 42 Mont. 18, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 85, 111 Pac. 632; Welles v. New York C. R. Co. (1858) 26 Barb. (N. Y.) 641.

In Northern P. R. Co. v. Adams (U. S.) supra, it was held that the placing of a nonvestibuled car in a vestibuled train was at most but ordinary negligence, so that no liability would ensue for the death of a free passenger who was thrown from the train while going from one car to another, such passenger having agreed to assume the risks of ordinary negligence.

It was held in Smith v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1912) 114 C. C. A. 157, 194 Fed. 79, that the derailing of a train, causing injuries to a free passenger thereon, presented a case of ordinary negligence only, and failed to show a wanton breach of duty for which the company would have been liable to a free passenger who had signed a waiver of liability for any injuries caused by the negligence of agents of the carrier, or otherwise.

In Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Beggs (1877) 85 Ill. 80, 28 Am. Rep. 613, an action to recover for injuries sustained by reason of the breaking of a wheel of the car in which the plaintiff was riding, the court said by way of dictum that, assuming that the plaintiff was a passenger on a free ticket containing the usual conditions, he could not recover, since the breaking of the wheel, which had been thoroughly tested, did not amount to gross negligence.

In John v. Northern P. R. Co. (1910) 42 Mont. 18, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 85, 111 Pac. 632, the court said that proof of the derailment of a train would not, standing alone, be sufficient to show gross negligence so as to charge a carrier with liability to a free passenger injured thereby.

In Welles v. New York C. R. Co. (1858) 26 Barb. (N. Y.) 641, it appeared that a free passenger was injured by a collision between the train on which he was riding, and certain cars of a freight train standing on the same track. The court said: "All collisions of trains must be the result of negligence in some degree, perhaps in the scale or degree of gross negligence. But . . . there is nothing in this case to warrant the finding that the defendants were guilty of such gross negligence as is equivalent to fraud, or evidence of fraud or bad faith." And it was held that by reason of a contract by which the passenger had agreed to assume the risk of all injury, the defendants were absolved from liability.

ANN E. MARSTON.

Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals—June 14, 1917.

(121 Va. 79, 92 S. E. 821.)

1. A plaintiff in ejectment need not trace title beyond the common source.

Estoppel — to dispute common source of title.

2. The rule that a plaintiff in ejectment need not trace title back of the common source rests upon the principle of estoppel, the defendant not being allowed the inconsistency of claiming both under and against the same title.

Ejectment — tracing title beyond common source — conveyance of adjoining tract.

3. In ejectment arising out of a dispute as to the location of a boundary line between two distinct tracts, one of which a common grantor derived from one source and conveyed to plaintiff, and the other of which he derived from another source and conveyed to defendant, the rule of common source of title does not apply to relieve plaintiff from tracing title beyond such common source.

Estoppel — deed without warranty — acquisition of conflicting title.

4. A deed without warranty to secure a debt does not estop the grantor from acquiring a conflicting title to a portion of the tract.

Ejectment — recovery on strength of title.

5. A plaintiff in ejectment must recover upon the strength of his own title, which he must connect with the commonwealth or with a common source with that of defendant.

[See 9 R. C. L. 838.]

Boundary — on pond — marked line on water's edge.

6. Bounding a grant on a pond does not per se extend title to the center if the boundary of the tract is indicated by an old and marked line following the high-water mark of the pond bed.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the City of Williamsburg and County of James City to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. S. O. Bland and Henley, Anderson, & Hall, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff must recover upon the strength of her own title, and not upon the weakness of her adversary's title.

Spriggs v. Jamerson, 115 Va. 250, 78 S. E. 571.

There can be no such thing as tracing title to a common source when the tracts or parcels of land are separate and distinct.

Messrs. Frank Armistead and B. D. Peachy, Jr., for defendant in error:

Defendant Jennings is estopped to deny the title of the Cranstones in the Badkins tract.

Laidley v. Central Land Co. 30 W. Va. 505, 4 S. E. 705.

The southern boundary of the Badkins tract in all of the deeds in the chain of title is given as Cranston's mill pond. The legal construction of this call is the center of Cranston's mill pond or the main thread of the stream, just as if the center or main thread of the stream had been expressly called for in the deed.

Whether the line stopped at the edge of the pond or went to the center or main thread of the stream is a question of law which was in the province of the court to decide.

It is immaterial as to legal rights what construction the former owners may have put upon the deed, or what they may have thought was the true line, for no oral disclaimer of title on their part to the land in dispute could affect the plaintiff's interest.

Kelly, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment brought by Ann E. Marston against A. W. Jennings. We will hereinafter designate these parties, respectively, as plaintiff and defendant, in accordance with their positions in the circuit court. There was a judgment below for the plaintiff upon a demurrer which she interposed to the evidence, and thereupon the defendant brought the case here upon a writ of error.

No effort was made by the plaintiff to trace title to the commonwealth, and the first question presented for our decision is whether the title under which she claims is shown to have been derived, as she contends, from a source common with that of the defendant.

The tract of land described in the declaration is known as the "Badkins tract," and its southern boundary, as called for in all of the deeds in evidence describing the same, is the "Cranston mill pond." This pond or dam has been down for a number of years, and the stream which formerly flowed into and made it now runs through the land once constituting its bed. The land in actual dispute lies between the middle thread of the stream and what was formerly the edge of the pond on the side next to the "Badkins tract." (The plaintiff's ultimate contention, denied by the defendant, is that the deeds under which she claims and which call for the pond as a boundary carry her title to the center of the stream.)

The plaintiff's documentary title, so far as shown, is as follows: (1) Deed of trust (to secure a debt), dated January 20, 1886, from A. H. and Charles Cranston (alleged common grantors) to E. B. Ratcliff, trustee; (2) deed, dated October 6, 1890 (consummating a foreclosure and sale under the trust deed), from H. B. Ratcliff, trustee, to D. W. Marston; (3) deed, dated June 1, 1914, from the heirs at law of D. W. Marston, deceased, to Ann E. Marston, the plaintiff. Each of these deeds conveys the "Badkins tract," and, as stated, describes it as bounded on the south by the mill pond.

Having traced her own title as above, the plaintiff then introduced two deeds in the defendant's chain of title which, with their recitals and certain oral and undisputed evidence, show that the defendant's title was derived from Charles Cranston in his own right and as the survivor of his brother, A. H. Cranston. These two deeds, so far as they are material in this connection, were as follows: (1) Deed dated January 15, 1913, from Charles Cranston and wife to the Cambridge Manufacturing Company for "a certain water grist mill formerly known and called Bush's mill . . . and the mill pond, which, by estimation, is 90 acres of land, be the same more or less, covered with water, and about 35 acres of land, be the same more or less, being a portion of the 100 acres belonging to said mill property." The deed contains no further description of the 90-acre tract, but describes the 35 acres by metes and bounds. (2) Deed dated April 28, 1914, from Cambridge Manufacturing Company to A. W. Jennings, the defendant in this case. This deed conveyed the 90 acres and the 35 acres by substantially the same description as above; and each of the two deeds warranted the title, generally as to the latter, and specially as to the former, tract. It is under the conveyance of the 90 acres that the defendant claims title to the land in controversy.

It will thus be seen that the title of the plaintiff and defendant, respectively, is each derived from the same grantors, Charles and A. H. Cranston; but at this point the question arises, whether conveyances from the same grantor of separate tracts of land, although they be adjoining tracts, necessarily constitute, in contemplation of law, a common source of title. It is contended by the plaintiff that the terms, "common grantor" and "common source of title," are synonymous and may always be used interchangeably. We do not think this can be maintained as a proposition universally and necessarily true. In most cases the facts are such that the two terms do mean the same thing, and it is possibly for this reason that the question arising in this case is an open one in Virginia, as well as elsewhere generally. The question was raised in Smith v. Stanley, 114 Va. 117, 75 S. E. 742, but was not decided because the defendant had asked for an instruction which practically admitted that the common grantor was, in fact, the owner of the identical right or title under which both he and the plaintiff claimed. Looking to the reason of the rule that a plaintiff in ejectment need not trace title back of the common source, there is no difficulty in settling the question under discussion. The rule rests upon the principle of estoppel, the defendant

Estoppel—to dispute common
source of title.

not being allowed the inconsistency of claiming both under and against the same title. But the inconsistency must be actual and substantial; and when it affirmatively appears, as we shall see it does in this case, that the real dispute is as to the location of a boundary line between two distinct tracts, one of which the common grantor derived from one source and conveyed to the plaintiff, and the other of which he derived from another source and conveyed to the defendant, there is no inconsistency, and, therefore, no estoppel to prevent the defendant from denying that the plaintiff's grantor had title to the land in dispute.

Ejectment—
tracing title beyond common source—conveyance of adjoining tract.

The oral evidence of the defendant, which was not objected to, shows that Charles and A. H.

Cranston derived their title to the "Badkins tract" from one source, and to the mill pond from another source, and that they had disposed of their interest in the former before they acquired their interest in the latter.

If we assume that the deeds under which the plaintiff claims the "Badkins tract" did extend to the middle thread of the stream, forming the mill pond, the Cranstons were not estopped from subsequently purchasing the land in dispute, and would not have been estopped from purchasing the entire tract, because their deed to Ratcliff, trustee, was made merely ly for the purpose of securing a debt, contained no warranty of title, and, to use the language of Baldwin, J., in Sutton v. Sutton, 7 Gratt. 234, 56 Am. Dec. 109: "The grantor undertook no responsibility, either as to title or quantity."

The fact that the Cranstons conveyed the mill-pond tract to the Cambridge Manufacturing Company with special warranty is plausibly accounted for by the testimony of Charles Cranston himself, who says that the 90-acre tract was conveyed by special warranty because of an adverse claim which had been asserted thereto by a third party, who does not appear to, at any time, have had any interest in or claim to the "Badkins tract."

The established and familiar general rule is that in an action of

ejectment the plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title, which he must connect with the commonwealth, or with a common source with that of the defendant. There are exceptions to the rule, but this case does not fall within any of them. The defendant, for example, was not a mere trespasser or intruder, but held a deed for the land under which he was exercising the acts of ownership and possession resulting in this suit.

Having reached the conclusion that the plaintiff failed to make out a prima facie case entitling her to recover, it becomes unnecessary to go at length into a discussion of the further question whether the deed under which she claims the "Badkins tract" should be construed to extend to the edge or the middle of the stream. She claims to the middle, and the defendant claims between the middle and what was formerly the northern edge thereof. That the question of construction does not arise may be demonstrated by supposing that the defendant's deed, instead of covering only a part, had covered all of the "Badkins tract." Either in the case supposed, or in the case as it exists, the plaintiff was bound, in the first instance, to make out her own title under the rule above indicated, and, having failed to do so, her demurrer to the evidence should have been overruled.

We may add, however, that there was evidence tending to show that the former owners of the "Badkins tract" had never, in fact, owned or claimed further than the edge of the pond; and that the southern boundary of that tract was indicated by an old and marked line following the high-water mark of the pond bed. In this state of the case, it by no means follows, as a matter of law, that the deed to D. W. Marston extended further than the northern edge of the pond. Riparian owners (on non-navigable streams) are presumed to own to the middle thread of the stream; and when they do own to the middle and convey by a deed calling for the stream as a boundary, they are conclusively presumed in law to convey to the middle, unless they expressly exclude that presumption by words in the conveyance. The presumption of ownership to the middle of the stream, however, is a rebuttable presumption, and yields to proof that the edge of the stream is the true boundary line. When this latter fact affirmatively appears, there can be no presumption that a deed calling for the stream was intended as a conveyance to the middle. A grantor is not presumed to intend to convey more than he owns.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment of the Circuit Court will be reversed, and this court will enter up judgment for the defendant upon the demurrer to the evidence.

ANNOTATION.

Rule that plaintiff in ejectment need not trace title back of common source.

- I. General rule, 860.
- II. Reason of rule, 866.
- III. Application of rule:
  - a. In general, 867.
  - b. Title claimed by descent or devise, 871.
  - c. Title claimed under judicial sale, 877.
- IV. Affidavit of title from common source under Illinois statute, 881.
- V. Exceptions to rule:
  - a. In general, 883.
  - b. Acquisition of paramount title, 886.

I. General rule.

It is a well-established principle in the law of ejectment that, where both parties to an action claim title from the same third person each is estopped to deny the validity of the title of such third person and the one having the better title deraigned from the common source must prevail.

Wyoming. — Hecht v. Boughton (1880) 2 Wyo. 385.

The rule is recognized with practical unanimity in the several jurisdictions, and is expressed by the various courts with noticeable similarity of language.

Thus, in Scott v. Singer (1875) 54 Ga. 689, in the official syllabus, the rule as applied to the facts of that case was stated as follows: "If both parties in an action of ejectment, or of complaint for land, claim under the same third person, title need not be traced into such third person."

And in Roe v. Doe (1869) 38 Ga. 597, the rule was thus laid down by the court: "When both parties derive their title from the same person, plaintiff in ejectment need not show title in such person."

The rule was recognized in the opinion of the court in Funk v. Newcomer (1856) 10 Md. 301, wherein it was said: "A party is estopped from denying a title which is recognized in a deed under which he claims."

In Wade v. Thompson (1876) 52 Miss. 367, the rule is stated as an exception to the doctrine as to the proof of title, as follows: "In the action of ejectment, if both parties trace title to the same source, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to go further and prove that it is good against all the world. Both litigants tracing their right to a common origin, the inquiry is limited to the ascertainment of which has the elder and better title. . . . When both parties derive title from the same person, it is not competent for either, as a general rule, to dispute that title. That principle, when it applies, is an exception to the general rule that the plaintiff must prove a complete title in himself."

"It is a well-established rule of law that, when both the plaintiff and defendant claim the property in controversy under the same person, neither of them can deny the right or title of the person under whom they so claim; and, as between themselves, the one having the elder has the better title, and must prevail. The conclusion thus established between the parties is not strictly and technically an estoppel, but it is in the nature of and has the practical force and effect of an estoppel." Ryan v. Martin (1884) 91 N. C. 464.

"It is well established as an inflexible rule that, where both parties claim under the same person, neither of them can deny his right, and then, as between them, the elder is the better title and must prevail." Christenbury v. King (1881) 85 N. C. 229.

"It is not necessary to show that the defendant has a complete title to the land; if there is no title paramount to it, it is sufficient to show that under a valid contract he claims to hold and has possession of the property under the common source. If the defendant has a bond for title, or other contract of purchase, or an unregistered deed for the land, and is in possession thereof, this will be sufficient evidence of a claim under the common source. It will be presumed that he claims under such contract. The purpose is to show that he claims the property under the common source, that he admits his relation to it and claims under it, without regard to the sufficiency or perfectness of the title." Ryan v. Martin (N. C.) supra.

In Hecht v. Boughton (1880) 2 Wyo. 385, the general rule was thus expressed: "It is a uniform principle of ejectment that, if both parties claim title from the same source, it is treated for all the purposes of the case that title resided in that source; each party is estopped from denying it; and so far as respects that source, the controversy is reduced to the inquiry, Which party, plaintiff or defendant, if either, has got title from that source?"

"A plaintiff must generally show title good against the world, while a defendant can ordinarily prevent his recovery by showing a better outstanding title in any person. But it is an old and well-established rule, adopted originally for convenience in the trial of actions of ejectment, that where both parties claim title under the same person, neither will be allowed to deny that such person had title. While a defendant in such cases may set up a title superior to him through whom both claim as the common source, provided he connects himself with it, he is not allowed, as in other cases, to show a better title than that of the plaintiff in a third person. . . . Where the plaintiff shows from the deeds offered, or the admissions in the pleadings, that both claim from a common source, he is required to exhibit a better title in himself, derived from it, than that of the defendant, in order to establish prima facie his right of recovery." Bonds v. Smith (1890) 106 N. C. 553, 11 S. E. 322.

"The principle deducible from [the] authorities seems to be that, whatever may be the form or nature of the conveyance used to pass real property, if the grantor sets forth on the face of the instrument, by way of recital or averment, that he is seised or possessed of a particular estate in the premises, and which estate the deed purports to convey; or, what is the same thing, if the seisin or possession of a particular estate is affirmed in the deed, either in express terms or by necessary implication, the grantor and all persons in privity with him shall be estopped from ever afterwards denying that he was so seised and possessed at the time he made the conveyance. The estoppel works upon the estate, and binds an after-acquired title as between parties and privies." Van Rensselaer v. Kearney (1850) 11 How. (U. S.) 297, 13 L. ed. 703.

"Where the parties in an action of ejectment claim title from a common source, the plaintiff in the first instance is only required to show title in himself from the common source. . . . It must be understood, however, that this rule applies to cases where the common source of title is either admitted by the defendant or established by the plaintiff's proof, not in cases where the defendant denies that he derives his title from the common source with the plaintiff. If the plaintiff relies upon a chain of title starting at such common source, the burden is upon him to show the title in the alleged common source." Butt v. Mastin (1905) 143 Ala. 321, 39 So. 217, quoting Newell, Ejectment, 579.

The ruling in Cox v. Hart (1892) 145 U. S. 376, 36 L. ed. 741, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 962, supra, was approved and followed in Cooke v. Avery (1892) 147 U. S. 375, 37 L. ed. 209, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 340, wherein the court said: "Defendants could not question the validity of their grantor's title at the time of the conveyance to them, in a contest with plaintiff, claiming under the same grantor, unless, indeed, they claimed under a paramount title, which they had acquired or connected themselves with."

And in Robertson v. Pickrell (1883) 109 U. S. 608, 27 L. ed. 1049, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407, it was said: "Nor can the grantee in a contest with another, whilst relying solely upon the title conveyed to him, question its validity when set up by the latter. In other words, he cannot assert that the title obtained from his grantor, or through him, is sufficient for his protection, and not available to his contestant. Where both parties assert title from a common grantor, and no other source, neither can deny that such grantor had a valid title when he executed his conveyance."

In Winding Gulf Colliery Co. v. Campbell (1913) 72 W. Va. 449, 78 S. E. 384, the rule was thus stated in the official syllabus: "A well-recognized and established exception to the rule requiring the plaintiff in ejectment to trace his title from the state is the estoppel in law arising out of a common source of title. In such case, the plaintiff need not trace his title to the state."

In William James Sons Co. v. Hutchinson (1914) 73 W. Va. 488, 80 S. E. 768, it was said in the official syllabus: "For a plaintiff in ejectment to rely on a common source of title, it must appear that the defendant's claim of title somewhere connects with a party under whom the plaintiff claims."

In a few cases, the courts seem to have disregarded the rule when the facts, according to the weight of authority, would bring them within its provisions. Thus, in Henry v. Reichert (1880) 22 Hun (N. Y.) 394, the defendant was permitted to go back of the common source and show that no title had vested in him. Each party showed a chain of conveyances from one Wright to himself. Of the two deeds executed by Wright, the one under which the plaintiffs claimed was prior in date and registry to that on which the defendant relied. The general rule as to a common source of title was disregarded, and it was held that the defendant need not show title in himself until the plaintiffs had shown some right to disturb his possession. Applying the doctrine in ejectment, of which the general rule under discussion is an exception, that a plaintiff can only recover on the strength of his own title, the court said: "If nothing more had appeared, that state of the proof would have entitled the plaintiffs to recover, for as against the defendant it showed, prima facie, that Wright had the title at the date of his conveyance under which the plaintiffs claim. Cox v. James (1871) 45 N. Y. 557; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 307. But the defendant was not thereby concluded. The deed from Wright under which the plaintiffs claimed was a mere quitclaim, and it does not appear that the deed to the defendant's grantees was anything more. It was, therefore, competent for the defendant to show, if he could, that Wright had not the title, and that nothing passed by either of the deeds which he executed. Sparrow v. Kingman (1847) 1 N. Y. 248; Averill v. Wilson (1848) 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 180; Bigelow v. Finch (1851) 11 Barb.

(N. Y.) 498. It appeared without dispute that the parties through whom the plaintiffs claimed to have derived title from Wright were never in possession of the premises. . . . If Wright had no title, the plaintiffs had none. They have not even a possessory right, for Wright's possession was not under claim of title until 1867, and his grantees, under whom the plaintiffs claim, and the plaintiffs themselves, have never been in possession."

It is essential to the defendant's case to show that the outstanding title has been acquired by him. Christenbury v. King (1881) 85 N. C. 229.

So in Curtis v. Butts (1867) 3 Keyes (N. Y.) 626, the defendant was permitted to assail the title of the common source, and the court applied the principle that the plaintiff has to recover on the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of his adversary. Both parties claimed by conveyance from one Lowe, and it was held that, as the plaintiff had failed to establish the validity of the title in Lowe, it was proper for the court to give binding instructions for the defendant.

"It is not true that the defendant in ejectment, who claims from a common source of title with the plaintiff, may not in any case defeat the action by showing an outstanding title superior to the plaintiff's." McCready v. Lansdale (1881) 58 Miss. 877.

The only exception to the general rule in South Carolina is found in Lyons v. Holmes (1883) 19 S. C. 406. In that case both parties traced title to one Sarah Hane, claimed by the plaintiff to be a "free person of color," and by the defendant to be presumptively a slave, and therefore incapable of acquiring or transmitting title. Notwithstanding the application of the general rule in other cases in this state, it was held that the plaintiff must prove the title of the common source, and overcome by sufficient evidence the presumption that she was a slave, and hence incapable of holding title.

II. Reason of rule.

The rule is one both of convenience and justice, and is based on the principle that it does not lie in the mouth of one to dispute the title under which he claims. Thus it has been said: "The doctrine is founded, when properly applied, upon the highest principles of morality, and recommends itself to the common sense and justice of everyone. And although it debars the truth in the particular case, and therefore is not infrequently characterized as odious and not to be favored, still it should be remembered that it debars it only in the case where its utterance would convict the party of a previous falsehood; would be the denial of a previous affirmation, upon the faith of which persons had dealt, and pledged their credit or expended their money. It is a doctrine, therefore, when properly understood and applied, that concludes the truth in order to prevent fraud and falsehood, and imposes silence on a party only when in conscience and honesty he should not be allowed to speak." Van Rensselaer v. Kearney (1850) 11 How. (U. S.) 297, 13 L. ed. 708, wherein it was further said: "The reason is that the estate thus affirmed to be in the party at the time of the conveyance must necessarily have influenced the grantee in making the purchase, and hence the grantor and those in privity with him, in good faith and fair dealing, should be forever thereafter precluded from gainsaying it."

Similarly, in Ryan v. Martin (1884) 91 N. C. 464, the court said: "This rule of law is founded in justice and convenience, and its purpose is to prevent the necessity on the part of the plaintiff . . . of proving title out of the state, and a good title in the person under whom he claims, when the opposing party claims the same property under the same person. If the defendant has the same source of title as the plaintiff, and no other, wherefore need the plaintiff go beyond that as to the defendant? Such an inquiry would be idle. It is plain that no injustice in such case could be done the defendant; and if the rule were otherwise, it might, and would in many cases, put the plaintiff to great inconvenience and much needless expense."

"The rule is applied on the grounds of convenience, and as a means of promoting the ends of justice." Reid v. Anderson (1898) 13 App. D. C. 30.

And see Howard v. Masterson (1890) 77 Tex. 41, 13 S. W. 635, wherein the court said: "The rule is just, useful, and convenient."

"The reason underlying the rule forbidding either party in ejectment to deny the common source of title is that one cannot dispute the title by which he claims." Wilson v. Wilson (1917) 137 Tenn. 590, 195 S. W. 113.

It "is not based on the idea of an estoppel, but is a rule of practice, which has become a rule of law, adopted by the courts for the purpose of aiding the administration of justice, by dispensing with the necessity of requiring the plaintiff to prove the original grant and mesne conveyances (which, in many cases, it was out of his power to do) upon proof that the defendant claimed under the same person." Newlin v. Osborne (1855) 47 N. C. (2 Jones, L.) 163.

"The general rule . . . is not strictly an estoppel, but a rule of justice and convenience adopted by the courts to relieve the plaintiff in ejectment from the necessity of going back behind the common source, from which he and the defendant derive title, and deducing his title by a chain of mesne conveyances from the state." Christenbury v. King (1881) 85 N. C. 229.

"The principle upon which these decisions are based is that the plaintiff is not required to be prepared with proof of the common grantor's title, and that such evidence, if offered, is presented upon an immaterial question, not in issue in the case." McDonald v. Hannah (1894) 8 C. C. A. 426, 15 U. S. App. 348, 59 Fed. 977. And see the reported case (JENNINGS v. MARSTON, ante, 855.)

III. Application of rule.

a. In general.

It is not necessary for the plaintiff to prove the genuineness of a disputed deed to the common ancestor, where both parties claim title from this common source. Thus, in Cox v. Hart

(1892) 145 U. S. 376, 36 L. ed. 741, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 962, wherein an attempt was made to attack the validity of a deed conveying the land to the common ancestor, because of imperfect execution and the suggestion of forgery, the court below charged the jury that "where a common source was shown a party could not go back of the common source to impeach a deed for forgery," and that the defendants, having themselves offered the deed from the administrators of the common ancestor, were concluded on the question of common source, and estopped to deny the genuineness of the deed to the common ancestor, and that it was immaterial whether the deed was genuine." Sustaining that instruction, the court said: "It is not necessary for the plaintiff . . . to prove the genuineness of the alleged deed of April 12, 1854, to De Cordova, the common source. He claimed under De Cordova, by virtue of the marshal's deed conveying all his right, title, and interest in the lands in dispute. The plaintiff introduced the same deed without disclaiming the title conveyed by it, for the purpose, the bill of exceptions distinctly states (and this court must accept that statement as conclusive), of showing title in themselves, as well as good faith in making improvements. So that, upon this branch of the case,—it appearing that the parties claimed under a common source,—the law was clearly for the plaintiff."

In Byers v. Rodabaugh (1864) 17 Iowa, 53, the plaintiff claimed title through the defendant, and on the trial introduced evidence tending to show a regular chain of title from the defendant to herself, but did not introduce or offer any evidence to show a title deducible from the government down to the defendant. The defendant asked the court to instruct the jury that, in order for the plaintiff to recover, she must trace her title back to the general government, or show twenty years' peaceable possession, etc. This instruction was refused, and the refusal was assigned as error. In sustaining the decision of the trial court the rule was thus stated: "It was sufficient for the plaintiff to trace her title back to the chain through which the defendant claimed, or to the point at which the defendant is, by law, estopped from denying the title."

And in Monette's Succession (1874) 26 La. Ann. 26, it was held that the defendant could not be heard to attack the validity of a statute by which the plaintiff claimed legitimacy and inheritance, when the defendant himself was made legitimate by the same act.

"A defendant may not defeat the rule of common source by a declaration that he does not claim under it," and if, as a matter of fact, the defendants deraign title from the heirs of a common ancestor, they thereby admit the validity of that title, and they will not be permitted to defeat it by showing an outstanding title in the heirs of the common ancestor, with which they are not in any way connected. Dycus v. Hart (1893) 2 Tex. Civ. App. 354, 21 S. W. 299.

In Gable v. Gable (1908) 130 Ga. 689, 61 S. E. 595, the court said in its official syllabus: "Where both parties claimed title to land under the same person, and one of them sought to have the deed under which the others claimed title canceled on account of alleged mental incapacity on the part of the person under whom both claimed, it was not competent for the defendants to attack the title of such person, or to show that the deed conveying title to him had not been properly attested for record, by offering proof that the official witness did not reside in the county where the deed purported to have been executed."

In Slone v. Kelley (1911) 143 Ky. 135, 136 S. W. 138, wherein the plaintiffs relied on a deed which had, by order of a court of competent jurisdiction, been set aside and canceled, and the defendant's claim rested on a deed from the same source, it was held that, the latter being unassailed, judgment was properly given for the defendant under the general rule.

In Clough v. Welsh (1911) 229 Pa. 386, 78 Atl. 1000, on the abstract of title filed by the plaintiff, he showed title out of the commonwealth to one

Thompson, a number of tax sales being in the line of title. The defendant claimed by adverse possession and by grant from the heirs of Thompson. In applying the rule, the court said: "Notwithstanding the fact that the only evidence of title offered by defendant on the trial was based on the title in Thompson, yet he attempted to attack the validity of some of the tax sales in the line of the Thompson title. As both parties were claiming under Thompson, the trial court was undoubtedly right in holding, as set forth in its opinion sur motion for new trial, that 'the pleadings in this case clearly show that the plaintiff and defendant both claim under a common source, to wit, from Alexander Thompson. Such being the case, it does not lie in the defendant's mouth to question the title of said Thompson.' The only effect of permitting defendant to invalidate the Thompson title would have been to deprive him of any standing whatever. The authorities are clear that, when both parties claim title under a common source, it is unnecessary to make proof of title beyond that source."

In Bethea v. Allen (1913) 95 S. C. 479, 79 S. E. 639, it was held that, as both parties claimed title from a common source, the defendant could not take advantage of a defect in the execution of a deed to the common ancestor.

Where the common ancestor has only the equitable title, but, subsequent to the deed to the plaintiff, completes the contract of purchase and receives the legal title, such contract relates back and inures to the benefit of her grantee, making the rule applicable. McAvoy v. Franklin (1911) 146 Wis. 390, 131 N. W. 823.

In Burchett v. Scott (1917) 176 Ky. 669, 197 S. W. 397, the appellant claimed ownership of the land by a paper title, as the remote vendee of one Blackburn, to whom a patent was issued in 1857, and also under a paper title, as the remote vendee of one Dean, who secured in 1848 a patent for land, part of which, as appellant claimed, was the land in controversy. The patents, it was claimed, overlapped, and the land in dispute, according to appellant, was covered in whole, or at least in part, by both of them. The appellee claimed under a paper title as the remote vendee of Dean. The court found as a fact that the land in dispute was a part of the Dean patent, and held, therefore, that any assertion of title on the part of the appellant, going back to the Blackburn patent, should be put to one side as not available.

In Cronin v. Gore (1878) 38 Mich. 381, the plaintiff, Gore, brought an action of ejectment and recovered a strip of land, 44½ feet wide, as included in a grant to himself of a tract of 4 acres, which, by a surveyor's error, had been laid out that much narrower than was correct. The proof showed a purchase by plaintiff from one Stewart, and that, immediately on the execution of the deed, a survey was made and lines set by the plaintiff according to it. This survey was subsequently used as a basis for survey and deed to the grantor of the defendant. Later, the first survey was found incorrect, and the boundaries extended to take in part of the tract conveyed to the defendant. In reversing a judgment of the lower court, it was said: "Inasmuch as all parties claim through Stewart, and Sullivan's [defendant's grantor] deed refers to that of Gore for boundaries, it is not necessary to show title back of the common grantor."

In Nitche v. Earle (1889) 117 Ind. 270, 19 N. E. 749, it was claimed that, as the appellee had never taken possession of the land, it was incumbent on him to show a complete chain of title from the United States. In disposing of this contention, the court said: "This theory is not tenable in this case. Courts of this state take knowledge of the acts of Congress granting to this state swamp land, which, taken in connection with the patent from the state, make a complete chain of title. In addition to this, it is a well-settled principle that, when the plaintiff and defendant claim through a common source of title, it is sufficient for the plaintiff to deduce his title from the common source of title. In this case both plaintiff and defendant claim title from the state of Indiana, and it was only incumbent on the plaintiff to show that he had the better title from the state."

Where both parties claim title by patent from the county to swamp lands, and it is conceded that at the time of the issuance of the patent to the plaintiff the title was in the county, the defendant will not be permitted to attack the validity of the plaintiff's claim by showing that his patent, because of an alleged irregularity, has been revoked. Cunningham v. Snow (1884) 82 Mo. 587.

In Barton v. Erickson (1883) 14 Neb. 164, 15 N. W. 206, the plaintiff, acting for a church corporation, claimed title by deed from the Union Pacific Railroad, while the defendants claimed by deed from the same company through an agent. It was very strenuously insisted that the plaintiffs must fail in their action because they did not introduce the patent from the government of the United States to the railroad company for the lots in question, but the court, in applying the general rule, said: "The rule seems to be well settled that a party is estopped from denying a title under which he claims to derive his right to the premises. Where both parties claim title from the same grantor, it is sufficient prima facie to prove derivation of title from him, without proving his title. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 307; Hart v. Johnson (1833) 6 Ohio, 89; Conger v. Converse (1859) 9 Iowa, 554. It was unnecessary, therefore, to introduce the patent from the United States for the lots in question."

In McCarthy v. Birmingham (1902) 2 Neb. (Unof.) 724, 89 N. W. 1003, the plaintiff showed title by purchase from her immediate grantor, and the defendants claimed under a verbal contract with the plaintiff. In appealing from a judgment for the plaintiff, the defendants urged that the evidence was insufficient, because plaintiff failed to trace her chain of title to a grant from the United States government. The court said: "But under the issues involved in this controversy this was not necessary, for defendants asserted a title and a right of possession bottomed on a contract alleged to have been made by one of them with the plaintiff, and hence they all claim title from a common source, and it is a well-established rule in actions in ejectment that, where title is derived from a common source, plaintiff need only prove title from this common source."

The fact that the plaintiff filed an abstract of title, under which he claimed, that reached back to the sovereignty of the soil, which he did not establish by proof, does not alter the rule. Sellman v. Hardin (1882) 58 Tex. 86.

In Thompson v. Graham (1872) 9 Phila. (Pa.) 53, the plaintiffs deduced title through sundry mesne conveyances from Richard W. Wells and wife, by deed made in 1847. They then gave in evidence a letter of attorney, dated April 16, 1856, from the parties owning the entire property (including plaintiffs' predecessors in the title to the one-seventh now in suit), to William F. Griffiths, as attorney in fact, and a lease by Griffiths under said power, to one Rutter, for fifteen years from June 7, 1856. They then called Griffiths, and proved by him that defendants went into possession of the premises as assignees of the said term to Rutter, and that the lease had expired. Thereupon plaintiffs closed, and defendants moved for a nonsuit, on the ground that plaintiff in ejectment could not recover without showing title out of the commonwealth. It was held that this was properly refused, the court saying: "Plaintiffs having shown that defendants came into possession as tenants, it was not competent for the latter to attack the title by showing a better one in any third person. We see no reason why title in the commonwealth should be treated as any exception to the general rule."

Where both parties claimed title to land under different grants on the same entry, it was held that the legality of the entry and the fact that the land was open to entry could not be denied. Waldo v. Wilson (1917) 173 N. C. 689, 92 S. E. 692.

Where, in an action of ejectment, the answer admits the title in a grantor, it is sufficient for the plaintiff to prove a chain of title to such grantor, who is regarded as the common source of title. Horning v. Sweet (1880) 27 Minn. 277, 6 N. W. 782. See to the same effect: Cooper v. Galbraith (1819) 3 Wash. C. C. 549, Fed. Cas. No. 3,193; Pollock v. Cocke (1851) 19 Ala. 188; Seabury v. Stewart (1853) 22 Ala. 207, 58 Am. Dec. 254; Florence Bldg. & Ins. Asso. v. Schall (1895) 107 Ala. 531, 18 So. 108; Anderson v. Smith (1853) 2 Mackey (D. C.) 275; Beall v. Brown (1888) 6 Mackey (D. C.) 574, affirmed in (1892) 149 U. S. 766, 37 L. ed. 960, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1043; Johnstone v. Scott (1863) 11 Mich. 232; Gillum v. Case (1890) 67 Miss. 538, 7 So. 551; Smith v. Lindsey (1886) 89 Mo. 76, 1 S. W. 88.

The rule is not confined to conveyances by deed from the common source, but is applied as well where one or both parties claim by descent or devise from a common ancestor, and when parties, if living, would thus be estopped, their heirs and privies in estate are likewise estopped.

Thus, in Kerbough v. Vance (1873) 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 110, it is said: "The doctrine as applicable to privies and heirs is that the heir, to be estopped, must claim the property as heir, and therefore must be a privy in estate with his ancestor." In that case, the rule and distinction are well illustrated. It was held that as to an undivided interest of one fifth, owned by one Vance, and by him conveyed to Kerbough by deed which embraced another contract, the defendants would be estopped, because they occupied the relation of heirs and privies of Vance; but as to four fifths which the defendants did not claim under Vance, but as common heirs of their father, they were not estopped.

In Robinson v. Hillman (1911) 36 App. D. C. 576, the plaintiffs claimed title as devisees, and the defendants under a deed from the common source, and it was held unnecessary to inquire into the sufficiency of the instruments to show title from the sovereignty of the soil.

In Hellard v. Nance (1908) — Ky. L. Rep. —, 114 S. W. 277, the rule was applied where the plaintiffs claimed as the heirs of the common ancestor, and the defendant by deed from his widow.

In Watkins v. Northern Coal & Coke Co. (1909) — Ky. —, 119 S. W. 225, the court said: "It is also contended by appellee that appellants failed to show title in themselves, and that therefore the judgment denying them a recovery should have been affirmed. Both parties claim from a common source of title. It was not necessary for appellants to trace the origin of their title further back, as appellee is estopped to deny the title of its grantor. When appellants proved that the title had been vested in their father, that he was dead and intestate, and they his lawful issue, they had made out a prima facie right to recover. If their father had made a conveyance of the land, or had otherwise parted with his title, or if appellants had been divested of their title, that was upon the appellee to show."

In Myrick v. Wells (1876) 52 Miss. 149, it was held proper to refuse a request for instructions that the rule of law which relieves a plaintiff in ejectment from proving a perfect title in a common source, from which both parties claim, applies only to cases in which both parties claim their title by deed, the court saying: "This position, though pressed in argument, seems unsupported by any authorities which have been produced, or with which we are familiar; nor do we see any reason or principle why the rule should be different in cases of common descent from that in cases of common title deeds."

In Griffin v. Sheffield (1860) 38 Miss. 359, 77 Am. Dec. 646, both parties claimed by descent from the common ancestor, and the rule was laid down by the court as follows: "It is admitted as a general rule that it is competent for a defendant in ejectment to protect himself in his possession by showing an outstanding title in another, upon the principle that the plaintiff in ejectment must recover upon the strength of his own title. This rule is as ancient as the action itself, and has its origin in the just presumption that the party in possession is either the true owner, or holds under the true owner, until the contrary is made to appear. But the exception is almost as ancient as the rule, that when the plaintiff in ejectment shows that both parties derive their title from the same common source, and that he has the older and better title from that source, it is not competent for the defendant, after such acknowledgment of the title of the common source, to protect himself in possession by proving an outstanding title in a third person, with which he shows no connection. For, in such case, the law will presume from such acknowledgment on his part that such title is vested in the common source, and inures to the benefit and support of the plaintiff's title. The authorities to this point are numerous and almost unbroken."

In Clemens v. Meyer (1892) 44 La. Ann. 390, 10 So. 797, both parties claimed from one Groves,—the plaintiff by inheritance, and the defendant by deed from the coheir of the plaintiff's father. In applying the rule, the court said: "It is held as settled, if the parties trace their title to the same source, neither will be permitted to attack the title of their common author."

In Wood v. McGuire (1856) 17 Ga. 308, the plaintiffs claimed title by the will of their grandfather, and the defendant by deed from the same source, and it was held that it was not incumbent on the plaintiffs to go beyond him and "deduce the chain, link by link," from the original grantee to the common source.

In Perolio v. Doe (1916) 197 Ala. 560, 73 So. 197, it appeared that the plaintiff claimed title through the enforcement of a vendor's lien against the common source, and the defendant as heir and by purchase from the children of the common source. The court held that neither could deny the title of the common grantor, "nor was it necessary to trace the title beyond" him.

In Ware v. Dewberry (1887) 84 Ala. 568, 4 So. 404, the defendants had come into possession of the land sued for, as the heirs of one Aaron Dewberry, holding by privity of estate under him as their deceased father and ancestor. He had purchased the land from the plaintiff, having paid a part of the purchase money and gone into possession during his lifetime. Under this state of facts it was held that the defendants were estopped from denying the original title of the plaintiff, from whom they claimed derivatively, the court saying: "They must show either a divestiture of the plaintiff's title by conveyance of some kind from him, or else an adverse possession for a sufficient time to bar the right of entry on his part."

In Pendley v. Madison (1887) 83 Ala. 484, 3 So. 618, action in ejectment was brought by the administrator of the estate of one Madison, deceased. It appeared that the widow, claiming under his will, had sold the land to the grantor of the defendant, and the decision turned on the construction of the will. The court, holding that since the will gave to the widow only a life estate in the property, a judgment in favor of the plaintiff was correct, said: "Both parties to the suit claim to have derived title from the same common source—James Madison, the testator of the plaintiff. The whole contention, therefore, resolves itself into one as to the relative superiority of the two claims of title put in evidence before the court on the trial, each party being estopped from denying the validity of Madison's title."

In Jay v. Michael (1895) 82 Md. 1, 33 Atl. 322, the plaintiffs claimed by inheritance from their ancestor, and the defendants by deed from the same source. The court said: "It was not necessary, therefore, for the plaintiffs to produce evidence to establish the title beyond the Misses Smith in order to make out a prima facie case, for it is well settled that when the plaintiff and defendant in an ejectment suit are claiming title through the same party, it is 'prima facie sufficient to prove derivation or title from that party, without producing any patents or deeds to prove title in him,'—following the decisions in Ahern v. White (1873) 39 Md. 409, and Elwood v. Lannon (1876) 27 Md. 200. In the former case it was said: "There are many cases in which the well-settled rule of ejectment law that to enable a plaintiff to recover he must show title regularly deduced from the state, or adverse possession for twenty years or more, is dispensed with. Instances of such exceptions to the general rule are where the action is brought by a mortgagee against his mortgagor, by a landlord against his tenant, by a purchaser at sheriff's sale against the judgment debtor, and also where both parties claim under conveyances from the same grantor. . . . In our opinion, the present case falls directly within the reason of these exceptions, and that it was the duty of the court, upon the state of the case made by the defendant himself, simply to determine which was the better title, that under the judgment and that under the mortgage both being derived from the same party."

And in Elwood v. Lannon (Md.) supra, where by an admission of the defendants it was shown that they and the plaintiff both claimed under the same person, it was decided that it was prima facie sufficient to prove derivation of title from that party, without producing any patents or deeds to prove title in him.

In Gaines v. New Orleans (1867) 6 Wall. (U. S.) 642, 18 L. ed. 950, the complainant sought to recover valuable real estate in the city of New Orleans, under the will of her father, made in 1813. There was interposed as one of the defenses that an equitable title of two thirds of the property was in two persons, as partners and creditors of the deceased, by virtue of certain partnership articles of June 19, 1813, the legal title being admittedly in the deceased. The court said: "If, however, it was, and there is an outstanding equitable title in Chew and Relf to the property in litigation, the defendants cannot plead the fact in bar of the right of complainant to recover. The defendants, equally with the complainant, claim title from the same common source. This is clear from the pleadings and proof. If, therefore, both parties claim title from the same person, neither is at liberty to deny that such person had title. On this point the Louisiana authorities are uniform. This rule is the same in equity as at law, and is well stated in Garrett v. Lyle (1855) 27 Ala. 589. The court in that case says: 'We do not deny in equity as well as at law the plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title; but because this is the rule it does not follow he must show a good title against all the world; it is enough that he shows a right to recover against the defendants. And there are many cases in which he has this right, although another person must recover it from him.'"

Where the plaintiffs claimed title through a deed from the heirs of one Crohan, who was the common source of title, the court said: "Defendants insist that the deed by the widow of Crohan . . . was independent of any right derived from the husband of the grantor, and that, therefore, he was not the source of their title and no common source was shown. We do not think this contention can be sustained. The deed was, doubtless, made and accepted under the belief of both parties to it that the grantor derived some assignable interest from her deceased husband; otherwise a deed had as well have been taken from any disinterested person. Indeed, defendants, on the trial, admitted that they based their claim solely under the deed from the widow as such. The question is not whether the defendants secured a good title by the deed, but whether their claim of title is from a source through which plaintiffs also claim. We think it sufficiently appears that both plaintiffs and defendants claim through Thomas Crohan." The general rule is declared by the court as follows: "When both parties to an ejectment suit claim title through the same third person, it is not usually necessary for plaintiff to go back of the common source in order to prove a title upon which he can recover. It is enough that he shows a better title through the common source than defendant can show through the same source. Before a defendant can be allowed to impeach the common source, he must establish that he has acquired a superior title. To show a better outstanding title will not help him." Sell v. McAnaw (1897) 138 Mo. 267, 39 S. W. 779.

In Robinson v. Hillman (1911) 36 App. D. C. 576, the plaintiffs claimed title as devisees, and the defendants under a deed from the common source, and it was held unnecessary to inquire into the sufficiency of the instruments to show title from the sovereignty of the soil.

In Chouquette v. Barada (1862) 33 Mo. 249, the plaintiff claimed title by descent and also by purchase from other heirs of one Motier, after the death of his widow, and the defendants by sheriff's deed in execution against the widow, offering in evidence a will of Motier by which, without mentioning any of his children, he devised all of his property to his widow, and it was held that evidence of both plaintiffs and defendants to show interest claimed by the widow in the property was properly admitted.

In Phelan v. Kelly (1841) 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 389, the rule was applied. In that case all the parties were heirs of one Bond, who, it appeared, had no paper title. The defendants had taken a lease from a prior claimant of the land, and attempted to set this up in bar of the claim of the plaintiff, a coheir, and it was held that an outstanding title could not be set up to defend a possession acquired in common with other heirs, to the exclusion of the latter.

In Jackson ex dem. Norris v. Smith (1827) 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 717, a peculiar state of facts existed. The plaintiffs claimed title as the heirs of one Norris, and it appeared that the defendant had executed a deed to him, taking a bond or contract to repurchase the premises, under which he was still in possession. The defendant attempted to prove that the entire transaction was a cover for a usurious loan from Norris, and it was held that, the defendant, having taken a contract from Norris for the purchase of the premises in question, was estopped from denying his title, or showing title in himself, unless he could succeed in proving the whole transaction to have been a cover for a usurious loan.

In Caldwell v. Neely (1879) 81 N. C. 114, the plaintiff claimed by descent from one Neely, and the defendant by deed from another heir, and it was held to be error to permit the defendant to deny the descent from Neely to the heirs, from one of whom the plaintiff, and from the other the defendant, deduced title to a moiety of the land.

In Den ex dem. Ives v. Sawyer (1838) 20 N. C. 179 (4 Dev. & B. L. 51), the plaintiff claimed by devise from her father, and on the objection of the defendant that no grant from the state was shown, she offered in evidence a deed from her husband and herself to one Leigh, under whom the defendant claimed, which recited that the land was part of that held by her father. The plaintiff contended that this deed was void as to her for want of private acknowledgment, and it was held that, although void as to her, the deed was an acknowledgment on the part of the defendant that the father of plaintiff had title in the land, and that he derived title from the same source, and hence could not deny the latter's title.

In Riddle v. Murphy (1821) 7 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 230, the plaintiffs were the heirs of the devisees of one Murphy, and the defendant claimed under a sheriff's sale in execution against Murphy's estate, and it was contended that the plaintiffs were bound to show title in Murphy at the time of his death. The court, per Gibson, J., said: "Both parties claim under the same title [derived from one Cornelius Murphy]. It is too clear, therefore, for argument, that the plaintiffs were not bound to trace back their title beyond Cornelius Murphy. If there was a title adverse to his, either in the commonwealth or in a third person, it lay on the defendant to show it."

In Kilgore v. Kirkland (1904) 69 S. C. 78, 48 S. E. 44, the plaintiff claimed as the heir of one Kilgore, and the defendants as heirs of the grantee of the same person. And it was held that the question as to the connection of the plaintiff with that common source was one of fact for the jury, and a nonsuit was properly refused. This ruling followed the decision in Smythe v. Tolbert (1884) 22 S. C. 133.

In Ferebee v. Hinton (1889) 102 N. C. 99, 8 S. E. 922, the plaintiffs claimed title as devisees under the will of their mother, the defendants by deed of trust for the same property to their assignor, and it was held that the charge of the lower court that there was no need to show title out of the state" was "so manifestly correct that it is needless to cite, in support of it, any of the numerous authorities in our state."

In Johnson v. Cobb (1888) 29 S. C. 372, 7 S. E. 601, the plaintiffs claimed as the heirs at law of one Buchanan. It appeared that, during their minority and absence from the state, their grandfather applied for a partition of the property, and as guardian ad litem consented to its sale without notice to the minors. He retained the purchase money, and the property by mesne conveyance became, as alleged, vested in the defendants. It was contended that the plaintiffs had shown no title in themselves, but the court held that it was unnecessary for the plaintiffs to trace title further back than Buchanan, the common source.

In Rhett v. Jenkins (1886) 25 S. C. 453, the common source was a person of color, through whom the defendants claimed by devise, and the plaintiffs by sheriff's deed in execution of two judgments. It was contended that the original grantor, being a slave, could not have a good legal title. The court held that the right of the common source to hold the title could not be disputed.

In Pyles v. Reeve (1851) 38 S. C. L. (4 Rich.) 555, the plaintiffs claimed title by descent, and the defendant by purchase from the same source, and it was held that a nonsuit, on the ground "that plaintiffs had not shown title to the land in dispute, and defendant, being in possession, should have been protected," was properly refused.

In Geiger v. Kaigler (1880) 15 S. C. 263, the plaintiffs claimed under the will of their father, and the defendant by possession, held under the administrator in a way not disclosed. In affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs, the court speaks of the rule under discussion as being an exception to the general rule in ejectment, that a plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title.

In Hill v. Robertson (1846) 32 S. C. L. (1 Strobb.) 1, the land in controversy had been purchased by the plaintiff's father, who soon after died intestate, leaving the plaintiff an infant. His administrator leased the land to the defendant, who later bought it at judicial sale. It was held that the rule applied.

The general rule was recognized, but not applied, in Wilson v. Wilson (1917) 137 Tenn. 590, 195 S. W. 113. In that case the plaintiffs claimed as the widow and children of one Wilson, a slave, and the defendants as children by a first wife. By the law of Tennessee, "all free persons of color who were living together as man and wife in this state while in a state of slavery are hereby declared to be man and wife," and persons of color who have been living as man and wife in other states, and who have moved to this state," are within the provisions of the law. It appeared that the first wife of Wilson died before he left Mississippi for Tennessee, which latter state he entered with the mother of the plaintiffs, and it was held that the children of the first wife, being without the enabling act, could not inherit; the rule as to the common source, therefore, not being applicable.

In Carver v. Maxwell (1902) 110 Tenn. 75, 71 S. W. 752, the plaintiffs claimed as the descendants of a former slave, and the issue of a slave marriage, and the defendant under a deed made by the widow, who was the second wife of the slave referred to. The second marriage was entered into during the slave period, but continued after the slaves were emancipated. It was held that the statute (Shannon's Code, § 4179) referred to in Wilson v. Wilson (Tenn.) supra, applied, and since both parties thus claimed from a common source, it was unnecessary for the plaintiffs to trace their title further.

In Beasley v. Rowly (1898) — Tenn. —, 52 S. W. 322, it appeared that, prior to 1868, one Hare was the owner of the land in question, and that he became bankrupt and his assignee conveyed the property by deed to his daughter, who then executed a deed to her father for his life, reserving the fee in herself. The plaintiffs were children and heirs of this daughter, and the defendants claimed by devise from Hare. There was no evidence of fraud as against creditors, and it was held that even if there had been it would not affect the conveyance, and the arrangement would have been binding on Hare and his heirs, devisees, and assignees, and they could not raise the question.

In Bleidorn v. Oakdale Iron, Coal & Transp. Co. (1896) — Tenn. —, 43 S. W. 360, the plaintiff claimed by will, and the defendant by tax title and possession thereunder, and set up a certain outstanding title. The jury found that both plaintiff and defendant derived from a common source, and the court, after a review of the authorities, held that the defendant was estopped from setting up and showing outstanding title for the purpose of defeating plaintiff's suit.

In Wortham v. Cherry (1859) 3 Head (Tenn.) 468, the plaintiffs claimed as the heirs of one Wortham, and the defendant by a tax deed from the same source. On the trial, exceptions were taken to the probate and registration of certain of the conveyances executed to the plaintiff's ancestor, and it was said: "In the view we have taken of the case, it is not necessary that we should notice these exceptions. On the other hand, the regularity of the proceedings in the tax sale was impeached; but we are likewise relieved from the necessity of noticing the objections to the validity of said sale. We place the decision upon grounds different from those assumed in the argument. First. In the present case, both parties derive their title from Lewis F. Wortham,— the plaintiffs by descent, and the defendant by purchase at the tax sale. And it is a well-established principle in the action of ejectment that, where both parties claim title under the same third person, it is sufficient to prove the derivation of title from him, without proving his title. Tillinghast's Adams, Ejectment, 248; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 307. The introduction of the title papers excepted to was, therefore, unnecessary, and they will be left out of view. The defendant derives whatever title he may have under Lewis F. Wortham, and is therefore estopped to gainsay his title."

In Royston v. Wear (1859) 3 Head (Tenn.) 8, the plaintiffs claimed one undivided third part of the land in question as the children of Hugh and Margaret Wear, the former of whom had executed a deed to the ancestor of the defendants without joining his wife. It was held that the defendants were estopped from denying the title in the common source, since they were parties and privies of their ancestor, who would have been estopped if living.

In Paschal v. Acklin (1863) 27 Tex. 175, the plaintiff claimed as the widow of one Franklin, and the defendant by will from the same source, and it was held that a charge that it was not necessary for the plaintiffs to show a continuous chain of title in writing from the common source was correct.

In Second M. E. Church v. Humphrey (1894) 142 N. Y. 137, 36 N. E. 812, the premises in question were claimed to have been purchased by the plaintiff from one Dixon, who died in 1849, and the defendant claimed under a deed from the only heir at law through mesne conveyances. It was held that the claim of title by the defendant recognized the title of the plaintiff, and admitted its existence; therefore, he could not dispute that title.

In Crabtree v. Whiteselle (1885) 65 Tex. 111, wherein it appeared that land had been partitioned among a mother and her children, the part in controversy falling to the mother, the court said: "If there was a mistake in the partition, by which she got more than her share, still what she got was the land in controversy, and by agreeing that she was the common source of title, the appellant is precluded from claiming an interest in the land not derived from her."

Where a sheriff's deed is the common source of title, the rule applies, and neither party is at liberty to contest it. Doe ex dem. Foster v. Dugan (1837) 8 Ohio, 87, 31 Am. Dec. 432.

In Den ex dem. Love v. Gates (1839) 20 N. C. 498 (4 Dev. & B. L. 363) both parties claimed by sheriff's deed in execution of different judgments against the same person, and the defendant offered to prove an outstanding title, at the same time attacking the title of the common source by offering in evidence a patent to a third person, prior to the possession of the common source. The admission of this evidence was held to be reversible error, the court saying: "As the party in possession of land is presumed to be the owner until the contrary appears, the claimant in ejectment must show a good title in himself; he cannot found his claim upon the weakness of that of the defendant; for possession gives the defendant a right against every man who cannot establish a good title in himself against everybody. The defendant, therefore, generally is permitted to show a better title than the plaintiffs in a third person. But it has been decided in this state that, where both parties claim title under the same person, it is not competent to either, as such claimants, to deny that such person had title."

In Stewart v. Shoenfelt (1825) 13 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 360, both the plaintiff and the defendant claimed title under a sale for unpaid taxes, and it was contended that the plaintiff could not recover without showing title to be out of the commonwealth. In applying the general rule, the court said: "Under the circumstances of this case, I have no doubt that the plaintiff might recover, without direct proof of the title being out of the commonwealth; because both plaintiff and defendant claimed under the commonwealth, which was an indirect admission by the defendant that the title had passed from the commonwealth. The plaintiff gave evidence of a title under a sale for taxes, and so, likewise, did the defendant. Now land cannot be assessed for taxes while the title remains in the commonwealth. The fact, therefore, of the title being out of the commonwealth was virtually admitted by the defendant; and it is evident that what is admitted by one party need not be proved by the other."

Where the plaintiff and the defendant respectively claimed under separate and distinct tax sales and deeds made at different dates, it was held that there was nothing in the position of the parties to preclude a denial by either of the validity of the other's title, although, since it was the effort of each party to show that he had acquired the title of the same person to the land in dispute, neither could have required the other to go beyond that common source of title. Feagin v. Jones (1891) 94 Ala. 597, 10 So. 537. See also Pollard v. Cocke (1851) 19 Ala. 188.

The rule was recognized, although not applied, in McClure v. Engelhardt (1855) 17 Ill. 47. In that case the plaintiffs claimed title from one Shares, by execution under a mortgage foreclosure and sheriff's deed, and for the defendant deduced title from the same source. The defendant himself offered to show title in the mortgagees, and there rested, contenting himself with objections to the plaintiff's title, without setting up any in himself. A judgment in favor of the defendant was reversed, the court saying: "If the defendant has any title, he should have presented it." This case appears to be an exception to the general rule, in that the court stressed the point as material that the claim as to the source of the defendant's title was made by the plaintiff, and not by the defendant himself.

The rule is equally applicable where the plaintiff alone claims title by a judicial sale. Thus where, in an action of ejectment, the plaintiff claimed title by purchase under a writ of fieri facias in a suit against the common source, and the defendant claimed under a deed of conveyance, it was held to be proper to admit evidence to prove that the deed was fraudulent and void as against the plaintiff. Remington v. Linthicum (1840) 14 Pet. (U. S.) 84, 10 L. ed. 364.

In Sexton v. Rhames (1860) 13 Wis. 99, it appeared that the plaintiff based his title on a sheriff's sale and deed under two judgments against one Robert Rhames, and the defendant made the point that the plaintiff had failed to show that the judgment debtor at any time was the owner of the premises in fee, or had an interest therein, or that he was entitled to the possession of the premises. A judgment of nonsuit was set aside, the appellate court saying: "After a general denial in his answers of the allegations in the complaint, the respondent proceeded to set up another distinct ground of defense. He alleged that one John N. Rhames, his lessor, was the owner of the land described in the complaint, and that said John N. claimed title in fee under a decree of the circuit court of Dodge county, made on the 15th of October, 1855, in a case between said John N. and Robert Rhames and wife, and then the decree is set out hæc verba. From the decree it appears that on the 6th of March, 1855, the title to the premises was in Robert Rhames; that on that day he sold the same to the lessor of the respondent for a consideration therein named, and Robert and wife made and executed a deed for the same, but there was a mistake in the description of the land, the wrong tract being described therein; and that John N. commenced a suit in chancery to reform the deed, and to have the title to the correct tract (the one in dispute) decreed to be in him from and after the said 6th of March; and that such a decree was rendered on the 15th of October, 1855. Now, it will be seen, here was a direct admission in the answer that the title to the premises was in Robert Rhames long after the Littell and Baker judgment was docketed. What reason is there for saying that the appellant could not avail himself of this admission of record? We know of none. Was the appellant under the necessity of showing that the title to the property was in Robert Rhames, so that the lien of the Littell and Baker judgment attached, when this fact was admitted in the answer? We think not. Both parties claim under Robert Rhames, and it was sufficient to derive title from him without proving his title."

In Hyder v. Butler (1899) 103 Tenn. 289, 52 S. W. 876, the plaintiff claimed under a sheriff's deed, and the defendant by a deed from the judgment debtor before the levy and sale. It was urged that the plaintiff could not recover because he had not made a full deraignment of his title, but the court said: "He has . . . produced only the deed of the sheriff, and the record supporting it, yet that is sufficient, since he and the defendant both claim under Maupin. Deraignment to the common source is all that the law requires in such a case, the defendant being estopped to gainsay the title of the person under whom he claims to hold."

In an action in ejectment where the defendant pleaded adverse possession the common source of title was admitted. It appeared that the plaintiff claimed under a sheriff's deed under an execution for delinquent taxes, and the defendant offered evidence to show that at the time of the sale the property was not assessed in the name of the judgment debtor. It was held that the plaintiff's objection to this evidence should have been sustained. Stevenson v. Black (1902) 168 Mo. 549, 68 S. W. 909.

In Izlar v. Haitley (1885) 24 S. C. 382, the plaintiff deduced title from one Clayton by sheriff's deed, and the defendant, in her answer, by adverse possession. On the trial, however, there was evidence of a verbal gift and possession of the land from her father, the common source. The distinction between the two lines of defense is pointed out by the court as follows: "Where the gift is relied upon, proved, and sustained by ten years' possession under it, that would, as it seems to us, be a case where both of the parties claimed through a common source, and in that event the plaintiff would not be required to prove title in the common source either by papers or ten years' possession, as in such case neither party would be allowed to dispute the title of the common source."

In Murphy v. Barnett (1818) 6 N. C. (2 Murph.) 251, the plaintiff claimed by sheriff's deed on a sale under an execution against one Barnett. A short time prior to the issuance of the fi. fa., the debtor executed to his son, the defendant, a deed of the property. The defendant offered evidence to show a defect in Barnett's title, but the court held that this could not be done, and as both parties claimed directly from him, they were privies in estate, and neither was competent to deny his title.

In Brown v. Smith (1861) 53 N. C. (8 Jones, L.) 331, the plaintiff claimed title under a sheriff's deed given on a sale under execution and judgment against one Turner. He then showed a deed for the same land executed by Turner to the defendant, and offered to prove that the latter deed was without consideration and was given to defeat a judgment obtained against Turner. The defendant then offered evidence to show that by a sale under the second judgment the property was conveyed to one Miller by conveyance antedating the deed of the plaintiff. The court said: "There seems to be nothing to prevent the application of the principle that, when both parties claim title under the same person, the defendant cannot defend an action by showing title in a third person, unless he has acquired such outstanding title, or connects himself with it."

In Whissenhunt v. Jones (1878) 78 N. C. 361, both parties claimed title under one Yount, the plaintiff by deed, introducing in evidence a sheriff's deed to connect the defendant with the common source, and to estop him from denying Yount's title. Applying the general rule, the court said: "In such case the rule is settled in this state that it is not competent for either claimant to deny that such person had the title; and though the defendants may show that they have in themselves a better title than the plaintiff, they cannot set up a title in a third person. Den ex dem. Love v. Gates (1839) 20 N. C. 498 (4 Dev. & B. L. 363). The plaintiff here had the elder and superior title, and was, therefore, entitled to recover."

In Jackson ex dem. Witherell v. Jones (1828) 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 182, it appeared that the plaintiff claimed a right to recover the premises in question as purchaser at sheriff's sale under two judgments, and the defendant in possession claimed under a lease from the same source. It was held that the plaintiff need not show title in the judgment debtor, and that the defendant was estopped from denying his title as landlord.

In Huff v. Morton (1887) 94 Mo. 405, 7 S. W. 283, it was held that the plaintiff's title under a sheriff's sale and deed, made in 1874, was superior to that of the defendant under a deed of trust from the common source, made in 1872, and plaintiff was entitled to recover, it being unnecessary to notice defects alleged to exist in the plaintiff's chain of title from the government to the common source.

In Conger v. Converse (1859) 9 Iowa, 554, it appeared that both parties claimed under one Bullis,—the plaintiff under a purchase at sheriff's sale, the defendant by deed from the execution defendant,—and the doctrine was thus stated by the court: "As both parties claim under the same third person, it was unnecessary for the plaintiff to prove title in Bullis."

In Hall v. Lance (1861) 25 Ill. 277, it appeared that one Howard was seised in fee of the land which plaintiffs claimed by sheriff's deed in execution of a judgment against him, and the defendants offered in evidence a mortgage given by the common source, judgment and execution upon it, and a sheriff's deed to them. The trial court refused an instruction that "if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the defendant Lance was in possession of the premises at the time of the commencement of the suit, that makes out a prima facie right in the plaintiffs to recover against the defendant Lance," and judgment was rendered for the defendants. In reversing this, the appellate court said: "A mortgage, even after condition broken, is not an absolute outstanding title of which a stranger can take advantage and defeat a recovery in ejectment by the mortgagor or one claiming under him. It is available for the mortgagee or his tenant, but not for the tenant of the mortgagor. It may be that the defendant might have shown that he had attorned to the mortgagee, of the condition broken, and thus defended his possession under the mortgage; but of this the record affords no proof. The defense, then, must rest entirely on the judgment of foreclosure. Whether that judgment would constitute a defense must depend entirely on the fact whether the record of the mortgage on which the judgment was rendered was older than the judgment under which the plaintiff claimed title. This the record fails to disclose. There is nothing to show that the scire facias was brought on the record of the mortgage produced on trial. For aught that appeared, the foreclosure may have been of a junior mortgage, subsequent to the judgment under which the plaintiff claimed. The judgment, then, of foreclosure on the scire facias, was not sufficient to constitute a defense to the plaintiff's title."

In Bay State Min. & Townsite Co. v. Jackson (1900) 27 Colo. 139, 60 Pac. 573, the plaintiff claimed title to a placer mining claim by virtue of a sheriff's deed in execution against one Welch, and the defendants by a later deed from Welch himself. It was held that neither could attack the title of Welch.

In Frink v. Roe (1886) 70 Cal. 296, 11 Pac. 820, the plaintiff deraigned title through sundry mesne conveyances following a sheriff's deed to one McHenry, in the chain of title being one Rising, the common source. It was held that the defendants could not attack the validity of the sheriff's deed to McHenry.

In Rucker v. Hyde (1907) 118 Tenn. 358, 100 S. W. 739, the complainants relied on a deed made by a trustee under a foreclosure sale, and since the defendants claimed title from the same source, it was held that the complainants need not deraign title from the state.

In Mickey v. Stratton (1879) 5 Sawy. 475, Fed. Cas. No. 9,530, it was said: "The plaintiff and defendant both claim under Shiel, and it is not necessary for either to prove title farther back than he. The defendant sets up an estate in fee in Willis in the premises, to defeat a recovery by the plaintiff in this action, and, if he has any interest therein upon the evidence, it is derived from Shiel by means of the sheriff's sale and deed. The plaintiff claims under Shiel also, by a conveyance subsequent to that of the sheriff. Neither is, therefore, at liberty to deny Shiel's title at the time of the sheriff's sale."

In Alabama White Marble Co. v. Eureka White Marble Quarries (1914) 190 Ala. 595, 67 So. 505, the defendant claimed through mesne conveyances following a sheriff's deed under a foreclosure of mortgage, while the plaintiff had title by quitclaim deed. The immediate grantor of the plaintiff was a foreign corporation, and the latter, not having complied with the state laws relating to foreign corporations, could not, it was held, transfer a good title to oust the defendant in ejectment.

In Miller v. Surls (1856) 19 Ga. 331, 65 Am. Dec. 592, the plaintiff claimed by mesne conveyance from one Perry, while the defendant's claim rested on a sheriff's sale in execution of a judgment after the deed to plaintiff's grantor, and it was held that the title by which Perry claimed was immaterial, the only question being who was prior in point of time.

In Feimster v. McRorie (1854) 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 547, the defendant admitted the general rule, but contended that it did not extend to a defendant who claimed as a purchaser at sheriff's sale. The court disposed of this contention as follows: "We are not aware of any principle upon which the first objection can be sustained, and it is directly opposed by the case of Den ex dem. Gilliam v. Bird (1848) 30 N. C. (8 Ired. L.) 280, 49 Am. Dec. 379, where the defendant claimed from a purchaser at sheriff's sale, and yet it was not pretended that the rule was excluded on that account."

In an action of ejectment for a house and lot, the plaintiff showed title by deed, and the defendant claimed under a sheriff's sale in execution of a judgment against the plaintiff's grantor. It appeared that the property was part of what had once been a public street. It was held that the defendant, in attacking the plaintiff's title, could not set this up as an outstanding title. Den ex dem. Gilliam v. Bird (N. C.) supra.

In Brown v. Brown (1870) 45 Mo. 412, the plaintiff claimed title from his deceased brother, under a purchase from the latter's administrator. It appeared that soon after the purchase he entered into possession, and so continued during a period of nine years. During his absence in California the defendant got into possession, and claimed title alleged to have been acquired from the plaintiff himself through a judicial sale. It was held that he could not attack the plaintiff's deed from the administrator.

In Holland v. Adair (1874) 55 Mo. 40, both parties claimed title to the land in controversy through one Holland, the plaintiff by deed directly, and the defendants by virtue of a sheriff's deed, founded on an attachment, judgment, and execution under which the land was sold by the sheriff to the defendant. It was held that all that was requisite for the plaintiff, in order to make a prima facie case, was to deduce his title from the common source.

In Butcher v. Rogers (1875) 60 Mo. 138, the plaintiff claimed title by mesne conveyance from the same person under whom the defendant claimed by sheriff's deed. It was held that, since both claimed title through the common source, it was entirely unnecessary for the plaintiff to trace a chain of title back to the government.

In Luen v. Wilson (1887) 85 Ky. 503, 3 S. W. 911, the plaintiff claimed by deed, and the defendant by foreclosure of a lien, both tracing title to a common source. It was contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, because he did not exhibit or trace his title back to the commonwealth. But it was said by the court: "Both parties are, however, claiming under the same third party, and in such a case it is sufficient to show a derivation of title from him."

In Doyle v. Wade (1887) 23 Fla. 90, 11 Am. St. Rep. 334, 1 So. 516, during the course of the trial the defendant offered evidence to show that the title to the property in suit was in a third person, but this was held inadmissible, since the plaintiffs claimed title through a deed to their ancestor, and the defendant through a purchaser at a sale of the property under a judgment against him.

In Feller v. Lee (1910) 225 Mo. 319, 124 S. W. 1129, the plaintiff claimed through mesne conveyance and foreclosure of a deed of trust, while the defendant held by adverse possession and by a sheriff's sale in execution against the common grantor. It was held that the title of the common source would not be attacked.

In Bliss v. Tidrick (1910) 25 S. D. 533, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 854, 127 N. W. 852, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 671, both parties claimed title from a common source, one by deed, and the other by sale under an attachment execution. It was said: "Whenever both parties claim under the same person, neither of them can deny the title of such person, and, as between two parties claiming from the same person, the one holding the elder title must prevail, with, of course, the reservation that a subsequent purchaser in good faith, for value and without notice, actual or constructive, will be protected as against a prior conveyance."

IV. Affidavit of title from common source under Illinois statute.

In Illinois, it is provided by statute that, where the plaintiff in ejectment swears that both parties claim title through a common source, he is not obliged to go back of the common source and trace his title from the government, unless the defendant denies under oath that he claims title under that source, or swears that he claims title under some other source. Burns v. Edwards (1895) 163 Ill. 494, 45 N. E. 113; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Hardt (1891) 138 Ill. 120, 27 N. E. 910; Cairo & St. L. R. Co. v. Parrott (1879) 92 Ill. 194. See also Smith v. Laatsch (1885) 114 Ill. 271, 2 N. E. 59.

In Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Whitham (1895) 155 Ill. 514, 28 L.R.A. 612, 46 Am. St. Rep. 355, 40 N. E. 1014, the plaintiff sought to bring his case within the provisions of the act. In holding the plaintiff's affidavit to be sufficient, the court said: "Upon the trial he stated, on oath, that he claimed title from the Johnston heirs, and that, as he understood it, the defendant claimed title from the same source. This, we think, was sufficient to require the defendant, or its agent or attorney, to deny, on oath, that it claimed title through such source, or that it claimed title through some other source, in order to compel the plaintiff to deduce title from any other than such common source. No such denial was made, on oath, by or on behalf of the defendant, and we think, therefore, it was sufficient, prima facie, for him to trace his title to such common source."

In Roosevelt v. Hungate (1884) 110 Ill. 595, the plaintiff showed by affidavit that one Iselin was the common source of each party's title to all the lands in dispute, except the undivided one-sixth part of a certain 40-acre tract, and that one McKnelly was the common source of title as to that. He then introduced in evidence deeds from each to himself, and it was held that this proof made out a prima facie case for the plaintiff, and entitled him to a judgment for the lands, unless a good defense was shown by the defendant.

The sufficiency of an affidavit as to the common source was also passed on in Hartshorn v. Dawson (1875) 79 Ill. 108. On the trial, the attorney for the plaintiff, being sworn, stated that he was acquainted with the title to the lands in controversy, as it appeared of record; that both plaintiff and defendants claimed title from a common source, stating what it was; and that he also knew this from conversation with the parties. On being cross-examined, he stated that his only knowledge was derived from the records and what appellant said when he purchased, and that he had held no recent conversation with him on the subject, and did not know what he might then claim. It was held that this was sufficient, the court saying: "The section must have a reasonable construction, and it cannot be required that a party, to avail of its benefit, must be able to positively state that he knows the secret thoughts of his adversary at the time he makes the oath. A party purchasing a particular claim to property, and placing a deed therefor on record, is presumed to claim in accordance with that purchase and deed; and in the absence of evidence of any other or different claim, another person, acquainted with such purchase and the contents of such deed, might well swear that he knew the nature of his claim. If appellant, in fact, claimed under another or different source of title, it was only necessary that he should have so stated on oath, when appellee would have been compelled to go behind that source of title. Not having done so, he has no cause to complain that appellee was permitted to commence with his evidence where he did."

In Brown v. Schintz (1902) 203 Ill. 136, 67 N. E. 767, it was said by the appellants "that the appellee did not prove his title from the government down to the time of the conveyance relied on, and that the affidavit of common source was not sufficient to avoid the necessity of that proof. Appellants and two of their tenants were parties defendant in the court below, and the affidavit as to common source related solely to the tenants, and was that they and the plaintiff claimed title from a common source, through appellant Brown. Appellee was appellants' grantee, and for the purpose of that trial, and as between them, we think it sufficient for appellee to have introduced the deed from appellants, by which the appellants conveyed and warranted the title to the premises. The words of that grant were 'convey and warrant,' and if the question was only between the grantors and the grantee we can see no reason for requiring the evidence as to title, when they alone were concerned, to go beyond that. Appellants were estopped to deny that they had conveyed a good title to appellee."

Where the plaintiff alleges a common source of title, and the defendant denies on oath that he claims title through a common source with the plaintiff, it is incumbent on the latter to prove title in himself as at common law. This he could do in two ways: First, by showing such title derived from a paramount source of title as from the government; or, second, by proving that he and the defendant did claim through a common source and that his was the better title. North Chillicothe v. Burr (1900) 185 Ill. 322, 57 N. E. 82, following the rule as laid down in Smith v. Laatsch (Ill.) supra.

V. Exceptions to rule.

a. In general.

The doctrine does not apply where the defendant denies the derivation of title from the same source as the plaintiff, and claims an independent source. Kerbough v. Vance (1873) 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 110.

In Butt v. Mastin (1905) 143 Ala. 321, 39 So. 217, wherein the plaintiff attempted to prove that the defendant held title from one Hunt, but the deeds introduced for that purpose carried only a portion of the land in dispute to Hunt, it was said by the court: "We think the rule as to common source applies to the land involved in this suit, and that a claim from a common source is not established by showing that defendant claims title to a part of a subdivision, of which the land in controversy is a part, but is distinct from the portion claimed by the defendant; and it makes no difference that the grantor set up as the common source acquired title to the entire subdivision, of which the defendant's parcel is a part, by a single conveyance. In other words, we do not think that a party who claims title to only a part of fractional section 34 through Hunt admits by so doing that Hunt had a title to the other part of fractional section 34, although Hunt had a deed or patent purporting to convey to him all of it. It might be that the defendant's grantor purchased the part to which he thought Hunt had a good title, and did not purchase the balance of the subdivision for the very reason that he considered Hunt's claim thereto defective. Could it, therefore, be pretended that, in purchasing a part only, the purchaser admitted the title of his grantor to the part of the subdivision that he did not purchase? We think not."

So in Leech v. Karthaus (1904) 141 Ala. 509, 37 So. 676, wherein the plaintiffs claimed title through one McCracken, and the defendants, excepting one, were not shown to claim through him, or to have made any admission respecting title, it was held that, to show a right to recover against them, the plaintiffs were under the necessity of proving that they, the plaintiffs, had held prior possession of the lot in question, or that McCracken, or someone else with whom they were in privity, had held title or prior possession.

In Miller v. Wilson (1798) 2 Yeates (Pa.) 294, the plaintiff claimed the lands in question under the will of his great-grandfather, while the defendant deduced under a deed from the tax commissioners under sale for unpaid taxes. It was said by the court: "The defendant has affirmed the right of the grandfather, tenant in tail, by purchasing from the commissioners the lands as his property. The plaintiff has shown under what title and in what manner his grandfather came into possession of the lands, and that his interest therein ceased with his death, the estate then becoming vested in the plaintiff. Unless the defendant can show some other right under which the grandfather held the lands,

In Union Bank v. Manard (1873) 51 Mo. 548, the plaintiff attempted to derive title to the land in itself by a patent from the United States, tracing title from the patentee, through others. In this attempt it wholly failed, but, in order to show its right to a recovery, introduced a deed purporting to convey the land described in the petition to G. and H. The plaintiff, then, to show that the defendant claimed to hold title derived from the same persons from whom the plaintiff claimed, and that he could not, therefore, dispute the title of plaintiff's grantors, offered in evidence a sheriff's deed in execution against G. and others, purporting to convey the same lands, and then by mesne conveyances to the one under whom the defendant had entered and was in possession, invoking the rule of law that, where "both parties in an ejectment suit claim under a common grantor, it is admitted that all that is necessary for the plaintiff to do in order to insure a recovery in such case is to show that he has the better title derived from the common grantor. That someone else may have a better title in such case does not matter." It was held, however, that since the plaintiff showed title in itself from G. and H., and title in the defendant only from G., that the latter was not estopped from denying the title of H., and, having shown a better title from G. than the plaintiff's, he was entitled to recover.

Where the defendant claims under a mortgagor by a private sale subject to the mortgage, under the foreclosure of which the plaintiff claims, it will not prevent a recovery against him to prove that another person was in possession prior to the mortgagor, and that such person put the mortgagor in possession. Scott v. Singer (1875) 54 Ga. 689.

The rule is inapplicable where the deed from the common source is uncertain as to the interest conveyed. Thus it has been said: "While the rule referred to may be correct and applicable in ordinary cases, and the presumption may be that where a person in possession of premises, exercising rights of and claiming ownership therein, conveys the same, a grantee thereof might be able to maintain ejectment against another claiming title from the same person, yet this cannot be extended to cases where the deed from such common grantor does not purport to convey the entire title, or leaves it uncertain and indefinite what interest was conveyed, without the aid of other testimony which is not furnished." Campau v. Campau (1877) 37 Mich. 245.

The rule does not prevent the defendant from showing that at the time of conveyance the common ancestor had parted with the legal title. Thus the defendant may show that the common source had parted with the title to the defendant's grantor for a valuable consideration, prior to the execution and sheriff's sale under which the plaintiff claims. Newlin v. Osborne (1855) 47 N. C. (2 Jones, L.) 163.

The rule does not apply where the plaintiff and defendant derive title to separate and distinct tracts from a common grantor, who derived the tracts from different sources. In such cases the term "common grantor" is not synonymous with "common source." See the reported case (JENNINGS v. MARSTON, ante, 855).

A question of disputed boundaries arose in Smith v. Stanley (1912) 114 Va. 117, 75 S. E. 742, where, as in the reported case (JENNINGS v. MARSTON), the defendant denied that the conveyance of two distinct parcels of land, one to one grantee and the other to another grantee, showed that the parties derived title from a common source, within the meaning of that term, although the deed to the junior grantee called for the lines of the senior grantee. It was held, however, that whatever might be the merits of such a contention, it could not be raised for the first time in the appellate court, since in the trial court both parties had proceeded upon the theory that it was a case of common source of title.

The rule does not apply where one of the parties can show a better title in himself. Copeland v. Sauls (1853) 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 70.

In New England Mortg. Secur. Co. v. Clayton (1898) 119 Ala. 361, 24 So. 362, it appeared that the common source had executed two mortgages, one in 1882 to the predecessor in title to the defendant, and a second one in 1887 to the plaintiff. In the chain of defendant's title there was an indorsement of a mortgage not using "apt words" to convey the legal title to land. In affirming judgment for the defendant, the court said: "A mere statement of the facts is sufficient to justify the judgment of the court. Both parties claim title from a common source, Jasper N. Hendricks, the mortgage executed to Paden, under which defendant holds, being the older. Not only was the Paden mortgage the older, but the mortgage day transpired before the execution of the plaintiff's mortgage, and there was no legal title in the mortgagor at the time of the execution of the second mortgage. Again, the rule of law which will not permit a defendant in ejectment to set up an outstanding superior legal title, when both parties claim from a common source, has no application. There was no attempt to show an outstanding title superior to the title of Jasper N. Hendricks, the common source of both titles. The purpose of the introduction of the mortgage was to show that whatever title Jasper N. Hendricks owned had passed from him, before the execution of the second mortgage, and did not vest in the plaintiff. Conceding that there were no apt words to convey the legal title to land by the transfer from Paden to J. H. Hendricks, the evidence shows that J. H. Hendricks went into possession of the land, under and by virtue of the transfer of the mortgage to him, and being in possession, he executed a deed of conveyance to Charles Clayton, who took possession under his purchase. He certainly had a perfect equity to the land, derived from the first mortgage. Being in possession, with a perfect equity, the rule did not prohibit him from introducing in evidence the first mortgage."

Where the defendant claimed title

under the plaintiff by virtue of a sheriff's deed to him, made in pursuance of a sale under an execution issued against a third person, whom defendant contends derived title from the plaintiff, it was held that, the plaintiff having thereafter occupied the property as a homestead, it was exempt from sale and execution, and the defendant acquired no title by the sheriff's deed. Worley v. Hicks (1901) 161 Mo. 340, 61 S. W. 818.

Where the deed from the common source, introduced by the plaintiff, is void because of insanity, he is not estopped from denying the title of the defendant, who claimed by sheriff's deed through an intermediate holder. Doe ex dem. McDougald v. McLean (1863) 60 N. C. (1 Winst. L.) 120.

Likewise, where it was conceded by both parties that A. was the original owner of the land, and the plaintiff, claiming to have purchased of him, exhibited his deed, showing title, the deed was attacked by the defendants, heirs of A., on the ground of the grantor's want of mental capacity to make a deed, and it was held to be incumbent on the defendants to show a want of capacity on the part of the grantor before they could defeat a recovery, and not to be incumbent on the plaintiff to show title from the commonwealth down. Alsop v. Weir (1885) 7 Ky. L. Rep. 366 (abstract).

An exception to the general rule is found in McConnell v. Rhodes (1853) 14 Ga. 313. In that case the plaintiff by a subpoena duces tecum compelled the defendant to produce her deeds, which connected her with the common source, and, in affirming a judgment for the defendant, the court said: "The evidence relied upon by the plaintiff in execution was forced out of the claimant at his instance for his use. It was not before the court by the claimant's consent. It does not appear that her title is derived alone from the defendant in execution. Non constat but that she has and will rely upon other title and better title. The rule, therefore, that a party is estopped from denying the title under which both litigants claimed, does not apply."

In Smith v. Otley (1853) 26 Miss. 291, the general rule is recognized, but under the facts of the case, it was held that it did not apply. It appeared that the plaintiff claimed as purchaser at sheriff's sale under an execution against one Hill, and the defendant was permitted to show that Hill's only connection with the premises was a deed of trust executed by him for the benefit of a third person, who in turn paid the purchase money and took possession.

And it has been held that the doctrine does not go to the extent of denying to the defendant the right to show the character of the title in the common source, whether of a term for years, or whether it was legal or equitable. Such proof does not deny the title, but discloses precisely what it is. Morgan v. Hazlehurst Lodge (1876) 53 Miss. 665, wherein it is said: "When the plaintiff has shown that the defendant derails title back to the same person under whom he claims, he is not required to go further, and show that such title is good against all opposers. He has made out a prima facie case. Both parties have acted on the assumption that the title is good; and the question is, which holds the title, or which has the oldest derivation. The defendant is under estoppel no further than that he shall not be permitted to prove a paramount title in a stranger, with which 'he shows no connection.' Griffen v. Sheffield (1860) 38 Miss. 391, 77 Am. Dec. 646; Den ex dem. Paul v. Ward (1833) 15 N. C. (4 Dev. L.) 247; Den ex dem. Love v. Gates (1839) 20 N. C. 498 (4 Dev. & B. L. 363). If, however, he has acquired that title, he has done no wrong to the plaintiff, has violated no trust, and has broken no allegiance. Wade v. Thompson (1876) 52 Miss. 367."

b. Acquisition of paramount title.

Notwithstanding the insufficiency of his title under a common source, the defendant may in ejectment defeat the action by showing that there is a title superior to that of the common source, and that he is the holder of that title. Rice v. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. (1894)

87 Tex. 90, 47 Am. St. Rep. 72, 26 S. W. 1047.

An exception is made to the general rule when the defendant can show that the true title was in a third person, paramount to the title of the person under whom the plaintiff and defendant both claim; and that the defendant has acquired this paramount title from such third person, or can connect himself with such third person, as by showing that he held possession for him, or under him. Newlin v. Osborne (1855) 47 N. C. (2 Jones, L.) 163.

The defendant, if not otherwise estopped, may still set up a title paramount to the common source, and derive the title to himself, or a title from the common grantor by a deed, or under an encumbrance created by such grantor, prior to the title of the plaintiff. Reid v. Anderson (1898) 13 App. D. C. 30; Moss v. Union Bank (1874) 7 Baxt. (Tenn.) 216.

See also Anderson v. Reid (1897) 10 App. D. C. 426, a former appeal of (1898) 13 App. D. C. 30, wherein it was said: "The mere verbal disclaimer of a common source, made at the time of the offer of the proof thereof, cannot affect the operation of the rule. When the plaintiff, assuming the hazard, makes proof of the common source, and shows that his is the older title, duly protected by registration in accordance with the requirements of the law against an innocent purchaser, he makes a prima facie case, entitling him to recover, unless the defendant, being under no estoppel, can show that he claims under another and different title. 'Where both parties assert title from a common grantor, and no other source, neither can deny that such grantor had a valid title when he executed his conveyance.' Robertson v. Pickrell (1883) 109 U. S. 608, 615, 27 L. ed. 1049, 1051, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407."

"But while the defendant is thus precluded as to the common source of title, he may show a better title in himself, obtained from other sources than that of the person under whom he so claims." Ryan v. Martin (1884) 91 N. C. 464.

"When the adversary parties to an action for the recovery of real estate derive their claims from one and the same person, neither is at liberty to dispute his title or to assert a superior and better title in another, unless he has acquired that title, or in some way connects himself with the true owner." Caldwell v. Neely (1879) 81 N. C. 114.

"Ordinarily, the defendant may rest on his possession merely, or he may show an outstanding title in a stranger. In either case he will succeed, unless the plaintiff has shown such right of possession as is good against all the world. This rule has no application where both parties trace title to a common source. In that case the defendant cannot protect his possession by setting up a paramount title in another person, with which he has no connection." Wade v. Thompson (1876) 52 Miss. 367.

"The defendant cannot defeat a recovery by the plaintiff having the better title, by showing a superior title outstanding in a third person, with which he has no connection; but the superior title meant is one older than the common source, or the title under which both claim as the foundation of their title. The reason why the defendant may not protect himself by appealing to an outstanding title in a third person, with which he has no connection, is that he has acknowledged the title of the common source, and for that reason is precluded from questioning its validity, at the time of his taking under it. But this reason does not apply to a title in a third person which accrued after the date when defendant recognized the common source of title by taking title under it; and as to such subsequently accrued title, there is no hindrance to the defendant to avail himself of it. As to that there is no estoppel upon him. A tenant is estopped to deny the title he acknowledged by accepting the lease, but he may show that that title has been divested from the landlord and vested in another since he accepted the lease, because the estoppel relates only to the time of the act which gives rise to it. The same principle applies to the defendant who derived title from a common source with that of the plaintiff in ejectment, and the same rule exists." McCready v. Lansdale (1881) 58 Miss. 877.

In Chesapeake Beach R. Co. v. Washington, P. & C. R. Co. (1904) 23 App. D. C. 587, it was said: "No principle is more firmly established than that the plaintiff in ejectment must recover upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of his adversary's. Until the plaintiff has made a prima facie case the defendant is not called upon to justify his possession. Where the plaintiff's right is not founded upon a previous adverse possession under all the conditions requisite to confer title, he must, as a general rule, connect himself by a chain of transfer with the sovereignty of the soil. An exception to the rule arises where he can show that the title under which the defendant claims has an intermediate common source with his own."

In setting up a defense of an outstanding title in a third person, not only must the defendant connect himself with that title, but, in order to defeat the action in this way, the outstanding title must be most clearly and satisfactorily made out, and a suit cannot be defeated by the existence of a doubtful claim to title, on the part of a third person, in no wise connected with the title of either party. Brain-tree v. Battles (1834) 6 Vt. 395.

Unless the defendant can show that he has in himself the outstanding title, the plaintiff must recover. Johnson v. Watts (1853) 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 228.

"It is a familiar rule of law that a defendant in ejectment cannot avail himself of an outstanding paramount title unless he connects himself with that title. But, to bring the defendant within this rule, the outstanding title must be prior and paramount to the common source. The reason for this rule is that both parties are estopped from disputing the title in the common source, hence, neither will be heard to set up an outstanding title paramount to the common source, unless he can connect himself with it. Where plaintiff establishes and relies upon a common source, he opens his chain of title deraigning from that common source to any attack which the defendant may find available." Bursey v. Lyon (1908) 32 App. D. C. 231.

In Thomas v. Kelly (1854) 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 375, it was held that the defendant was estopped from setting up an outstanding title in a third person, after it had been proved that the deed to him from the common ancestor was never delivered, but was wrongly and forcibly taken by him. The court, in distinguishing the rule from technical estoppel, said: "The law applicable to this case is well settled, and the only difficulty which it presents arises from a misapplication of terms. The defendant, for the reasons given by his counsel, is not, technically speaking, estopped from denying the title of Joseph Thomas, Jr., under whom the plaintiff's lessor claims. But, as both the lessor and the defendant set up a claim to the land under the same person, neither of them can deny the title of that person. This is a rule, not strictly of estoppel, but one founded in justice and convenience, which has been long recognized, and acted upon in this state."

In Mathews v. Lecompte (1857) 24 Mo. 545, both parties claimed title from a common source, and the defendant, having the junior conveyance, offered to show an outstanding title in a third person. The evidence was held to be inadmissible.

In Jackson ex dem. Livingston v. Walker (1827) 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 637, it appeared that the plaintiff claimed from one Storm, who was in possession of the premises under a contract of sale. The defendant claimed as the lessee of one Garnsey who, during the absence from the country of Storm, entered into possession by agreement with the latter's wife. It was held that defendant was estopped to show Garnsey's title or an outstanding title against Storm, the plaintiff being entitled to the latter's possession, thus acquired by the defendant.

The same question of an outstanding title in another arose in Den v. Winans (1833) 14 N. J. L. 1. In that case the plaintiff claimed by sheriff's deed in execution of a judgment against the defendant, who offered evidence to prove a prior judgment and execution by sheriff's deed to a third person, under whom he claimed as lessee. It was held that the evidence was properly rejected.

So in Wolfe v. Dowell (1849) 13 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 103, 51 Am. Dec. 147, it was said: "The 7th, 8th, and 9th charges are but variations of a single proposition, 'that if both parties to an ejectment claim title through one person as a common source, the defendant will not be permitted to set up an encumbrance by such person as an outstanding title.' This proposition is too broad. The law is laid down very plainly in Doe ex dem. Huntington v. Pritchard (1848) 11 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 327. It is there said: 'The plaintiff in ejectment can only recover upon the strength of his own title, as being good against the world, or as being good against the defendant by estoppel.' The plaintiff, in the first instance, need go no farther than the title of the person under whom they both claim. But the defendant may set up a title adverse to that of such person, and if he does, the plaintiff must show such title to be invalid, or produce some superior title, or fail. The defendant may hold adversely to the debtor, because of an encumbrance. He may have the title of the encumbrancer as well as of the debtor; and if he have, we see no reason why he may not oppose it to the plaintiff."

In Burns v. Goff (1891) 79 Tex. 236, 14 S. W. 1009, it was said: "The rule which renders it unnecessary for a plaintiff to deraign title beyond the common source is one of convenience, and does not deprive a defendant of the right to show that he has the superior right through the common source or otherwise. The statute provides that 'proof of a common source may be made by the plaintiff, by certified copies of the deeds showing a claim of title to the defendant emanating from and under such common source.' When a deed is introduced which shows such a claim by a defendant, that is sufficient, although the deed may be for some cause inoperative. If a defendant claims through a purchaser under execution against a plaintiff, the sheriff's deed may not for some cause pass the title, yet such a deed will be sufficient evidence of common source, and the plaintiff in such a case need not deraign title beyond himself as common source. . . . If defendant has superior right to the land, whether this arises from adverse possession or other fact, this he is not precluded from showing; but, in the absence of some evidence on his part tending to show such superior right, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover on proof of claim of title by defendant, emanating from and under the common source, made in the manner prescribed by the statute."

"It is well-settled law that a defendant in ejectment, who is not a mere trespasser on the land sued for, may always set up a paramount title, outstanding in a third person, unless the plaintiff and defendant claim title, or whatever right less than absolute title they assert and rely on, from a common source." Hence, where the defendant does not claim title or any right from the ancestor of the plaintiffs, whose title they rely on for a recovery, but by conveyance from one in possession and transmitting that possession to the defendant, it was open to him to set up in defense of the action a paramount outstanding title. Stephenson v. Reeves (1891) 92 Ala. 582, 8 So. 695.

The ruling in Stephenson v. Reeves was recognized in Matkin v. Marx (1892) 96 Ala. 501, 11 So. 633, but the facts in the latter case showed that both the plaintiff and defendant claimed title and right from a common source, and it was held that the defendant was not in a position to plead that the title to the property sued for was not in the common source, but in third parties.

But see Rice v. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. (1894) 87 Tex. 90, 47 Am. St. Rep. 72, 26 S. W. 1047, where the court said: "And even without showing that he holds such superior title, it may be that his defense ought to prevail, provided he prove affirmatively not merely that someone had the title anterior to that of the common source, but also that such previous title never vested in the common source. . . . There are eminent authorities which hold that in order to defeat a recovery when the plaintiff has proved that both parties claim from a common source, and that his is the superior title under that source, the defendant must not only show that there is an outstanding title, but that he must connect himself with that title. Cooke v. Avery (1892) 147 U. S. 375, 37 L. ed. 209, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 340; Cox v. Hart (1892) 145 U. S. 376, 36 L. ed. 741, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 962; Christenbury v. King (1881) 85 N. C. 229; Caldwell v. Neely (1879) 81 N. C. 114. But it seems to us that so great a restriction of the defendant's right is not in accordance with sound principles. Since the plaintiff must prove his title in order to recover, it would seem that when he has shown title under the common source, that proof by defendant, however made, that the common grantor had no title, ought to be a defense."

In Fenn v. Louisell (1908) 87 C. C. A. 670, 160 Fed. 458, it was held that, as both parties deraigned title from a common source, the validity of a prior tax title was immaterial, and as the defendant neither connected himself with the alleged outstanding title, nor traced it to any person at a time subsequent to the conveyance to the common-source title, the questions arising in relation to outstanding title in another were also immaterial.

If the defendant does not derive his possession from the plaintiff, but claims adversely, he may buy in an outstanding title to defend his possession. But such title will not suffice unless the defendant shows that it was subsisting and available, on which a recovery could be had in ejectment. Wade v. Thompson (1876) 52 Miss. 367. W. M. C.

W. F. LEACH, as Guardian, etc., Appt.,
v.

WILLIAM GRAY et al.

Alabama Supreme Court — December 20, 1917.

(— Ala. —, 77 So. 341.)

Partnership — liquidation — set-off against loan by partner.

1. Where a partner, guardian of a minor, lends his ward's money to the firm without taking the security required by statute, the claim against the partnership is his own, which, in the liquidation of the partnership, upon its insolvency, may be set off against debts due by him to the partnership.

[See note on this question beginning on page 894.]

Guardian and ward — loan without security — personal liability.

2. A guardian lending the money of his ward upon security which he knows to be insufficient, or has no good reason to believe is sufficient, is personally liable for its loss.

[See 12 R. C. L. 1182.]

— individual liability of guardian.

3. The lending by a guardian of his ward's money without taking the security required by statute results in an individual liability of the guardian unless the ward elects to ratify the transaction.

[See 12 R. C. L. 1182, 1183.]

— borrower of ward's money as trustee.

4. One borrowing a ward's money from his guardian without giving the security required by statute becomes a trustee of the money in invitum, and the ward may hold borrower and lender accountable as joint and several trustees.

Set-off — against claim of partnership.

5. That a partner could not sue the partnership at law to recover money due from it to him does not prevent equity, upon a partnership accounting, from setting off against a partnership claim upon him a loan made by him to it of money belonging to his ward.

[See 24 R. C. L. 870, 871.]

APPEAL by the guardian from a decree of the Circuit Court for Tallapoosa County (Whiteside, J.) correcting and confirming the report of the register, in a suit for the dissolution of a partnership and an accounting of its affairs. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. James W. Strother and J. P. Oliver for appellant.

Mr. D. W. Crawford, for appellees:

When a guardian uses funds of his wards in the business of a partnership of which such guardian is a member, or lends such funds without mortgage or other security than the credit of the borrower, he is guilty of a devastavit and conversion of such funds.

Lee v. Lee, 55 Ala. 590, 67 Ala. 406; May v. Duke, 61 Ala. 53; McGowan v. Milner, 195 Ala. 44, 70 So. 175; Bank of Guntersville v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. — Ala. —, 75 So. 168.

Anything which the guardian receives as the proceeds of such devastavit, whether notes or simple contract indebtedness, is not assets of the estate of his ward, and does not become such assets without a ratification of his unauthorized act by his ward, after such ward reaches his or her majority, or by a ratification thereof by a court of competent jurisdiction, acting on behalf of such ward.

May v. Duke, 61 Ala. 53; Tomkies v. Reynolds, 17 Ala. 109; Lee v. Lee, 67 Ala. 406.

Until such guardian has been relieved of liability for such devastavit, he can sue and recover the proceeds thereof in his own name, even though he has been removed or has resigned as guardian.

Tomkies v. Reynolds, 17 Ala. 109; Bryan v. Wilson, 27 Ala. 208; Collins v. Greene, 67 Ala. 211; Wright v. Robinson, 94 Ala. 479, 10 So. 319; Dickson v. McLarney, 97 Ala. 383, 12 So. 398.

The proceeds of such devastavit being the personal property of the guardian, in the absence of the ward intervening and claiming such proceeds in an action by the guardian therefor, the debtor can plead as a set-off, a debt due by the guardian in his individual capacity to such debtor.

May v. Duke, 61 Ala. 53; Tomkies v. Reynolds, supra; Drennen v. Gilmore Bros. 132 Ala. 246, 90 Am. St. Rep. 902, 31 So. 90.

Even though strict mutuality of demands is lacking, equity will allow a set-off, if justice and good conscience require that it be allowed, and insolvency is a recognized ground for set-off in equity.

Pom. Eq. Jur. 8d ed. § 189, p. 239; High, Inj. § 244; Farris v. Houston, 78 Ala. 250; Renfroe v. Yarbrough, 144 Ala. 487, 39 So. 660; Fowler v. Bellingher, 140 Ala. 240, 37 So. 225; O'Neill v. Perryman, 102 Ala. 522, 14 So. 898; Nixon v. Clear Creek Lumber Co. 150 Ala. 602, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1255, 48 So. 805.

The chancery court, having taken jurisdiction for the purpose of dissolving the partnership and stating an account between the partners, properly determined all controversies relating to partnership affairs.

Northen v. Tatum, 164 Ala. 368, 51 So. 17.

When a guardian has been guilty of a devastavit, the payment thereof to the guardian, or the return of the proceeds thereof to him, would not discharge his surety for his liability for said devastavit, but the liability of the surety is fixed when the devastavit is committed, and remains until the wards have been settled with.

Matthews v. Mauldin, 142 Ala. 484, 38 So. 849, 4 Ann. Cas. 344; May v. Duke, 61 Ala. 53.

The only method by which the surety on the bond of a guardian can be relieved from liability on such bond is the method prescribed by statute.

Hamner v. Mason, 24 Ala. 480.

Only those sureties who join in the application to be relieved from future liability by reason of such suretyship are discharged from such future liability; and those will only be discharged from liability for breaches committed subsequent to the filing of the new bond by the guardian.

May v. Duke and Matthews v. Mauldin, supra.

Where an estate is being administered in the chancery court, the court has jurisdiction to marshal the debts as well as the assets of the estate, and to require all persons holding claims against the estate, to file their claims with the register, and to bar all claims not so filed.

Louisville Mfg. Co. v. Brown, 101 Ala. 273, 13 So. 15; Taber v. Royal Ins. Co. 124 Ala. 681, 26 So. 252; 34 Cyc. 340.

Messrs. N. D. Denson & Sons also for appellees.

Thomas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is but one question presented by the appeal, and the record is unnecessarily voluminous in the presentation of that question.

May a guardian who, without security, has loaned money of his ward to a firm of which he is a member, in a suit in equity to dissolve and settle that insolvent partnership, have the amount so loaned paid back to him by the receiver out of the assets of the partnership, or may the individual indebtedness of such partner to his firm be set off against such claim?

In answering concretely the question propounded, it may be important to observe that one of the complainants in this case, a member of the partnership being liquidated in the court of equity, was a surety on the bond of the respondent guardian (appellant here) at the time the questioned loan was made to said firm; that said complaining partner and surety is a large creditor of the partnership, having liquidated many of its general debts; that respondent member of the partnership, who made the loan thereto, was the active managing member of the firm; and that this partner personally was insolvent at the time of the settlement of the partnership affairs in equity.

The decree of the chancellor was to the effect that the amount so loaned was a devastavit of the guardian. Thereafter the sureties on his official bond were responsible to the ward, on accounting to the court having jurisdiction; and, the respondent partner being indebted to the firm in a sum largely in excess of the loan, said amount may be credited upon said partner's individual indebtedness to the partnership.

It is not denied that, when the guardian loaned his ward's funds to the partnership without "bond or mortgage, or a good personal security," as required by statute, he committed a devastavit. Code of 1907, § 4376; Lee v. Lee, 55 Ala. 590; May v. Duke, 61 Ala. 53; Lee v. Lee, 67 Ala. 406; McGowan v. Milner, 195 Ala. 44, 52, 70 So. 175.

In the absence of statute, it is a guardian's duty to loan the moneys of his ward with security; and if he knows the security to be insufficient, or "has not good reason for believing sufficient, whatever was the credit, or the solvency of the borrower," he is liable, because such a loan is a breach of trust,—a violation of duty. Smith v. Smith, 4 Johns. Ch. 281; Lee v. Lee, supra.

In McGowan v. Milner, supra, we said on this subject: "The use of trust funds, or a loan to the firm of which the guardian was a member, was a devastavit for which the guardian must account, and he is not entitled to commissions thereon."

A necessary consequence of such a devastavit by the guardian, his making a loan in disregard of the statute, is that he and his sureties assume, and are subject to, the repayment of such money to the ward.

As between the borrower and the lender, such a devastavit results in an individual obligation, that may be superseded only by ratification of the transaction by the ward,—his election to treat the debt as an asset of his estate. That is to say, where the ward is under no legal disability, and, having the right of election under the law, freely exercises that right by ratifying the unlawful act of his guardian, such property becomes that of the ward's estate. Without such election, the conversion involves the guardian in liability from which he cannot be relieved "until satisfaction is made to the cestui que trust. The debt contracted by the borrower (by way of the devastavit) is his individual property, unless the cestui que trust elects to treat it as assets, and when the trustee collects it, in the absence of an election by the cestui que trust, it is his own debt he collects." May v. Duke, 61 Ala. 53, 57.

In Tomkies v. Reynolds, 17 Ala. 109, 115, 116, Chief Justice Dargan said: "For instance, if an executor or administrator make a contract in reference to the assets of the estate, which would amount to a devastavit and render him individually liable to the estate for the amount of money due on the contract, those interested may hold him responsible and may decline to pursue the party who contracted with the executor. Should he be denied the right to sue the party who contracted with him, because he has been removed from office, when he is individually liable to the estate for the debt that the defendant promised to pay him?"

Of the Tomkies Case it is interesting to note that Judge Stone was the attorney for appellee, who maintained the right of the executor who loaned the money or choses in action of the estate without authority to do so to sue on the contract in his own name until he has been discharged from liability incurred by the devastavit, and that this right of action exists notwithstanding such executor has resigned or been removed from the executorship. Bryan v. Wilson, 27 Ala. 208, 215; Waldrop v. Pearson, 42 Ala. 636; Dunlap v. Newman, 47 Ala. 429; McGehee v. Slater, 50 Ala. 431; Waring v. Lewis, 53 Ala. 615; Collins v. Greene, 67 Ala. 211, 215.

The debt for the loan of his ward's money was an individual demand of W. F. Leach against the partnership at the time of the devastavit, and thereafter down to the holding of the reference. He had the legal right to collect the debt in his individual capacity. In a suit to liquidate the partnership, the partnership could set off, as against such individual claim, debts due the partnership by the said Leach. In Drennen v. Gilmore Bros. 132 Ala. 246, 90 Am. St. Rep. 902, 31 So. 90, it is said of set-off: "A set-off, to be available, must be owned by defendant in absolute right at the time suit is brought. It is not enough that, together with another partner, the defendant owns the claim. It must be such demand as that he, in his own name, or in the names of defendants sued, without bringing in the name of a stranger to the suit, may maintain an action of debt or indebitatus assumpsit upon it against the party or all the parties suing, as the case may be. Less than that is not mutuality. Ownership at the time of suit brought is of the very essence of the right." . . . In order to sustain a set-off under the statute, the debts must be mutual, and the demands must be subsisting causes of action such as will give to the plaintiff and defendant a simultaneous cause of action, the one against the other, at the time the suit is brought."

Guardian and ward—loan without security—personal liability.

dividual claim, debts due the partnership by the said Leach. In Drennen v. Gilmore Bros. 132 Ala. 246, 90 Am. St. Rep. 902, 31 So. 90, it is said of set-off: "A set-off, to be available, must be owned by defendant in absolute right at the time suit is brought. It is not enough that, together with another partner, the defendant owns the claim. It must be such demand as that he, in his own name, or in the names of defendants sued, without bringing in the name of a stranger to the suit, may maintain an action of debt or indebitatus assumpsit upon it against the party or all the parties suing, as the case may be. Less than that is not mutuality. Ownership at the time of suit brought is of the very essence of the right." . . . In order to sustain a set-off under the statute, the debts must be mutual, and the demands must be subsisting causes of action such as will give to the plaintiff and defendant a simultaneous cause of action, the one against the other, at the time the suit is brought."

If the amount due on said note of the partnership to W. F. Leach, guardian, is not set off by the amount due that partnership by him, the ward may maintain suit against the individual members of the firm for the conversion, since it is clear that the partnership had notice of the trust nature of the funds. It is established, not only that when a guardian lends the moneys of his ward without security he is guilty of a breach of official duty, but that, if the borrower thereof is cognizant of such breach of duty, he becomes a trustee of the money in invitum; and the ward may hold them accountable as joint and several trustees. Lee v. Lee, supra; Robinson v. Peabworth,

It cannot be urged against the set-off that Leach, being a partner, could not sue the partnership at law. The same rule does not obtain in equity, since that court, having taken over the liquidation of the partnership, "will proceed to the complete determination of all controversies touching . . . its demands against the members" thereof "and their claims." Northen v. Tatum, 164 Ala. 368, 374, 51 So. 17; Hicks v. Meadows, 198 Ala. 246, 69 So. 432; Nixon v. Clear Creek Lumber Co. 150 Ala. 602, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1255, 43 So. 805; Farris v. Houston, 78 Ala. 250.

The guardian and the sureties on his official bond, becoming liable for the conversion of the fund at the time of the devastavit, will be held to account on final settlement of the guardianship. In this suit the ward is not exercising his right of election to ratify the unauthorized act of the guardian in making the loan, by filing his claim therefor against the partnership. The ward may elect to require the guardian and the sureties on his official bond to respond therefor on final settlement, or to require the guardian (Williamson v. Howell, 4 Ala. 693; Chilton v. Parks, 15 Ala. 671; Ragland v. Calhoun, 36 Ala. 606; Gravett v. Malone, 54 Ala. 19; Hailey v. Boyd, 64 Ala. 399; Grace v. Martin, 47 Ala. 135; Randall v. Wadsworth, 130 Ala. 633, 31 So. 555) and the individuals composing the partnership when the loan was made, one or both, having knowledge of the existence of the trust, to account therefor.

It results that the decree of the Chancellor is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Right to set off personal indebtedness of guardian or other fiduciary against claim arising out of transaction involving devastavit.

An exhaustive search has failed to reveal any case, other than the reported case (LEACH v. GRAY, ante, 890), discussing the right to set off a personal indebtedness of a guardian or other fiduciary against a claim arising out of a transaction involving a devastavit. In the reported case it is held that where a guardian loans, without the security required by statute, the funds of his ward to a partnership of which the guardian is a member, he commits a devastavit which makes him and his surety liable on his bond, so that he can treat the loan as an individual demand against the firm, and therefore in a suit in equity to dissolve and settle the partnership, the individual indebtedness of the guardian to the firm can be set off against the claim arising out of the devastavit.

Whether or not the rights and remedies of the ward could in any circumstances be prejudiced by allowing such a set-off is not specifically discussed; but it is pointed out that the ward had not elected to ratify the unauthorized loan or file any claim against the partnership, and it is also pointed out that the remedies of the ward may be against the guardian and sureties on the bond, or by requiring an account from the guardian and any other members of the firm who knew of the trust in the money loaned.

As the controversy in this case seems to have been between the guardian and other members of the partnership, and the court says "it may be important to observe" that one of the copartners was surety on the guardian's bond and was also a large creditor of the firm by reason of liquidating many of its general debts, these facts should, perhaps, not be overlooked in interpreting the decision.

They suggest a special reason why the creditor-partner, who was a surety on the guardian's bond, should have this set-off allowed him in order to extinguish the loan. If the guardian had been allowed to collect it as an individual demand, and had failed to pay the money over to the ward, the surety might have eventually been held to make the loan good, while the allowance of the set-off protects him against this contingency.

While not squarely in point therewith, two cases may be cited as supporting the doctrine of the reported case at least by way of analogy, it not appearing clearly in either of those cases whether a devastavit was committed. Thus in Montgomery v. Rauer (1899) 125 Cal. 227, 57 Pac. 894, an action for moneys had and received, it appeared that the mother of the plaintiffs, who was also the guardian of their estates, had put into the defendant's hands a portion of the funds of the estates. These funds were received with full knowledge of their origin and character by the defendant. It was held that he could not set off against the claim for these funds, certain individual debts of the guardian. So, in Jeffray v. Towar (1902) 63 N. J. Eq. 530, 53 Atl. 182, an action for an accounting by the complainant against the administrator of his deceased trustee and a third person, it appeared that the trustee had carried two accounts with the third person, a stockbroker, one being an individual account and the other an account as trustee. The court held that, having knowledge of the character of the funds carried under the trustee account, the defendant broker could not set off against it a balance due on the individual account of the trustee.

JOSEPH COLLINS, Plff. in Err.,
v.
OKLAHOMA STATE HOSPITAL et al.

Oklahoma Supreme Court — July 25, 1916.

(— Okla. —, 184 Pac. 946.)

Libel — publication — writing name on hospital records.

1. The mere writing of the word "colored" opposite the name of a patient on the records of a hospital is not a publication so as to become libelous if there is nothing to show that the records had ever been examined or read by any person whatever.

[See note on this question beginning on page 900.]

— calling white person colored.

2. In this state it is libelous per se to write of or concerning a white person that said person is colored.

[See 17 R. C. L. 292.]

— placing white person in colored ward.

3. A cause of action for libel cannot be maintained against a hospital for the insane on account of the act of its officers and employees in placing a white patient in that part of the institution set apart and used for colored patients.

— construction of language — rule.

4. In construing language alleged to be libelous, the courts should give to said language the same meaning and understanding as is usually applied thereto.

[See 17 R. C. L. 312.]

Statute — construction — libel.

5. Section 4956 of the Revised Laws of 1910 considered, and held, that the general words, "or other fixed representation," are used for the purpose of including other species of the same kind as the particular words there used, "writing, printing, picture, or effigy."

[See 25 R. C. L. 996.]

Libel — privilege — letter.

6. The letter which constitutes the second cause of action, and attached to the petition as a part thereof, examined, and the same held to be privileged.

[See 17 R. C. L. 341.]

Definition — colored.

7. The word "colored" and its abbreviation "col.," as applied to a person, is synonymous with "negro."

Headnotes 1-5 by HOOKER, C.

ERROR to the District Court for Oklahoma County (Hayson, J.) to review a judgment sustaining a demurrer to a petition filed to recover damages for an alleged libel. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Robert L. McLendon, Charles West, Joseph L. Hull, and H. H. Hagan for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Parker & Simons, Burford, Robertson, & Hoffman, S. P. Freeling, and R. E. Wood for defendants in error.

Hooker, C., filed the following opinion:

It is alleged in the petition in this case that Joseph Collins is a white person, and that Lee Collins, a female about thirty-three years of age, is his daughter by his wife, and is a white person of pure Caucasian blood; that the defendant companies are domestic corporations, and that the Oklahoma Sanitarium Company was on July 14, 1914, engaged in the business of operating for profit a hospital for the insane at Norman, Oklahoma, and that about November 19, 1914, the Oklahoma State Hospital became the successor to the Oklahoma Sanitarium Company in said business; that on or about the 30th of July, 1914, the said Lee Collins, having been previously adjudged insane and committed by the proper court to the asylum, was taken by the plaintiff to the Oklahoma Sanitarium Company as an insane patient for treatment, where she was received by said company and placed in a ward used by the white people at said place; that a few days thereafter those in charge of the institution placed her in a ward set apart for negro patients, and entered upon its records opposite her name the word "colored," and thereby held her out to the world as a woman having negro blood, which condition continued until February, 1915. It is alleged by the plaintiff that by reason of this act said defendants falsely and maliciously imputed to this plaintiff either the commission of a crime against the laws of this state, or else of being of negro blood, and that, inasmuch as he and his family were respected in the community in which they resided and recognized as white people, this false imputation caused a doubt upon his social status, and caused him great humiliation, etc., for which he sought damages in the sum of $25,000.

In the second cause of action it is alleged that on or about the 22d day of January, 1915, said defendants did commit a wrongful libel by publishing a written statement made by them to Joseph Collins, this plaintiff, in the form of a letter, which is as follows:

Oklahoma State Hospital,
Norman, Okla., Jan. 22, 1915.
Joe Collins,
Valliant, Okla.

Dear Sir:—

I have yours of the 15th inst., in answer beg to say that Lee Collins (Col.) is in fairly good mental condition; also good physical condition. We are unable to say whether this improvement is more than temporary at this time.

Yours truly,

AAT.AK D. W. Griffin, Superintendent.

—and that said letter was exhibited to A. A. Thurlow and other persons, and sent through the United States mail, which contained the false statement that Lee Collins was a negro, and by reason thereof the plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $25,000.

The first question for us to determine is whether it is libelous within the purview of our statute for the authorities in charge of an insane institution to place a white person in that part thereof set apart for negro patients. It is charged in the petition that the officers and agents of the company placed Lee Collins in a ward set apart for negro patients, and thereby declared to the world that she was a negro woman, and that it entered upon its records opposite her name, wherever it appeared, the word "colored."

It will be noticed that there is no charge in this first cause of action in said petition contained that the word "colored," written opposite the name of Lee Collins, was ever published, and in order to constitute libel there must be a publication. Under the allegations of the petition the writing of the word "colored" opposite her name upon the records of the institution is not a publication, as it is not alleged that the same was ever seen by anyone, or that said books had ever been examined by anyone whatsoever, or that the word thus written had ever been seen or read by any person whomsoever. This, in our judgment, is necessary before an action for libel can be based thereon, so far as the writing of said word is concerned. Necessarily the person who wrote the word in the books must have seen it, but that person must have been the agent of the corporation, if the act is to be said to be the act of the corporation, and such agent was for that purpose the corporation itself. It can hardly be said to be a publication of a libel for one to show the libelous matter to himself.

Libel—publication—writing name on hospital records.

This eliminates the charge in the first cause of action that the word "colored" was written opposite the name of Lee Collins, and leaves for us to determine whether it is libelous under our statute for an institution of this character to place a white person in a ward set apart for its negro patients. The question whether it is libelous per se to write of or concerning a white person that he is a negro has been before the courts of many states of this Union, and has been decided from both viewpoints. To determine this, however, we must refer to § 4956 of the Revised Laws of 1910, and by that we see that any false or malicious unprivileged publication by writing, printing, etc., which exposes any person to public hatred, contempt, etc., is libelous. In this state, where a reasonable regulation of the conduct of the races has led to the establishment of separate schools and separate coaches, and where conditions properly have erected insurmountable barriers between the races when viewed from a social and a personal standpoint, and where the habits, the disposition, and characteristics of the race denominate the colored race as inferior to the Caucasian, it is libelous per se to write of —calling white person colored. or concerning a white person that he is colored. Nothing could expose him to more obloquy or contempt, or bring him into more disrepute, than a charge of this character. Spencer v. Looney, 116 Va. 767, 82 S. E. 745; Spotorno v. Fourichon, 40 La. Ann. 423, 4 So. 71; Flood v. News & Courier Co. 71 S. C. 112, 50 S. E. 637, 4 Ann. Cas. 685; Jones v. Polk, 190 Ala. 243, 67 So. 577; Upton v. Times-Democrat Pub. Co. 104 La. 141, 28 So. 970.

Is the placing of a white patient in that part of the institution used and set apart for colored patients libelous, so as to give to the patient or others a cause of action within the statutory definition of libel? What is libel in this state must be determined by the provision of the statute as defined by § 4956 of the Revised Laws of 1910. In other words, a cause of action for libel in this state is statutory, and to determine what is libelous herein we must refer to the statute, as that is controlling.

Section 4956 of the Revised Laws of 1910 is as follows: "Libel is a false or malicious unprivileged publication by writing, printing, picture, or effigy or other fixed representation to the eye which exposes any person to public hatred, contempt, ridicule or obloquy, or which tends to deprive him of public confidence, or to injure him in his occupation, or any malicious publication as aforesaid, designed to blacken or vilify the memory of one who is dead, and tending to scandalize his surviving relatives or friends."

But we cannot see, under the view that we take of this provision of the statute, how an action for libel can be based thereon. By reference to this statute we find that the general words, "or other fixed representation," follow the enumeration of particular classes of things contained in said section, to wit, "writing, printing, picture, or effigy," and under the well-known rule of statutory construction the general words "or other fixed representation" will be construed as applicable only to the things of the same general nature or class as those enumerated, to wit, "writing, printing, picture, or effigy."

The particular words used are presumed to describe certain species, and the general words are used for the purpose of including other species of the same kind or genus. The words "or other fixed representation," following the enumeration of "writing, printing, picture, or effigy," are therefore to be read as "other such like kind or character." What was the legislative intent in the enactment of this statute, when the words "or other fixed representation" were incorporated therein? If the legislature had intended the general words, "or other fixed representation," to be used in their unrestricted sense, they would have made no mention of the particular classes mentioned above in said statute. The generic term in this statute is the false and unprivileged publication, and the special words are used to describe the classes or species of the generic term, and the general words are used to include other species of the same kind as those referred to in the particular words above given. In 86 Cyc. 1119, it is said: "By the rule of construction known as 'ejusdem generis,' where general words follow the enumeration of particular classes of persons or things, the general words will be construed as applicable only to persons or things of the same general nature or class as those enumerated. The particular words are presumed to describe certain species and the general words to be used for the purpose of including other species of the same genus. The rule is based on the obvious reason that if the legislature had intended the general words to be used in their unrestricted sense, they would have made no mention of the particular classes. The words 'other' or 'any other,' following an enumeration of particular classes, are therefore to be read as 'other such like,' and to include only others of like kind or character."

See the authorities cited in the notes on page 1120.

In 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1012, it is said: "Where general words follow particular ones, the rule is to construe the former as applicable to persons or things ejusdem generis. This rule, which is sometimes called Lord Tenterden's rule, has been stated, as to the word 'other,' thus: Where a statute or other document enumerates several classes of persons or things, and immediately following and classed with such enumeration the clause embraces 'other' persons or things, the word 'other' will generally be read as 'other such like,' so that persons or things therein comprised may be read as ejusdem generis with, and not of a quality superior to or different from, those specifically enumerated."

See the authorities cited in the note on this page.

This court, in the case of Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Wallace, 38 Okla. 233, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 112, 132 Pac. 908, said: "It is true that, under the doctrine ejusdem generis, general words, such as those just referred to, for the purpose of ascertaining the intent of the legislature, are generally restricted in their scope to the specific class of objects named. But, as is said by the supreme court of Missouri in the case of State v. Smith, 288 Mo. 242, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 179, 185 S. W. 465: "The rule of ejusdem generis is . . . resorted to merely as an aid in construction. If, upon consideration of the whole law upon the subject, and the purposes sought to be effected, it is apparent that the legislature intended the general words to go beyond the class specifically designated, the rule does not apply. If the particular words exhaust the class, then the general words must have a meaning beyond the class or be discarded altogether."

Now we submit that the part of special words here used did not exhaust the class intended, and therefore the general words did not have a meaning beyond the class, and cannot be discarded. In other words, there might be a question of doubt as to whether an engraving or a statue or a waxed figure would come within the special words used in this statute; but the legislature, in order to embrace everything within the class, used the words "or other fixed representation." Numerous authorities could be cited upon either side of this proposition, for it is entirely a matter of legislative intent, to be determined from a construction of the statute. The way we view it, however, and applying what to us is a fair and a reasonable construction of the statute in question, we must hold that the words "or other fixed representation" must be limited to the class intended by the use of the particular words "writing, printing, picture, or effigy," as contained in the first part of the statute.

We cannot say that placing a white patient in that part of the institution set apart for colored patients comes within the application of the statute so as to make the same libelous. However, if it were libelous, we exceedingly doubt, under the provision of our statute, whether the plaintiff would have a cause of action therefor.

As to the second cause of action, it is contended that the communication complained of is a privileged communication; the same being a letter from the superintendent of the asylum to the father of Lee Collins, a patient at that institution, in reference to her, and being written in reply to a letter addressed to the institution by the plaintiff here. In the brief of the plaintiff in error it is said: "In this letter in the instant case the subject-matter of the letter was the mental condition of Lee Collins. As to that the letter was qualifiedly privileged, but the letter of inquiry did not seek information as to the race of Lee Collins. That fact had no reference to her mental condition and had no bearing upon it. When the information was volunteered that Lee Collins was colored, it was information neither asked for by the letter of inquiry, nor pertinent to the letter of reply. It was entirely foreign, untrue, derogatory matter, for which the defendants cannot claim the cloak of qualifiedly privileged."

Courts, in construing publication alone to be libelous, must adopt the same meaning, and give to the words used the same understanding, as others would ordinarily give to them. If the words as used would ordinarily convey to the public a meaning which would subject one to obloquy, etc., and are otherwise libelous, the court should give to them that meaning and understanding. If an abbreviated word is used, the court should give to the abbreviation the same meaning and understanding that is commonly given and understood by the use of such an abbreviated word. Here the abbreviated word for "colored," or "Col.," is used in said letter, and is complained of as libelous. "Col." is an abbreviation for "colored," and the word "colored" is synonymous with the word "negro," and inasmuch as "Col." is an abbreviation for "colored," and the word "colored," as applied to the person, is synonymous with the word "negro," it is libelous per se to write of a white person that he is colored.

We agree with the defendant in error that the entire contents of this letter complained of is privileged. It was written by the superintendent of an institution having in charge the patients of the state, helpless and unfortunate as they are, to the father of one of the patients, no doubt grievously interested in that patient's welfare. The law as well as the dictates of common humanity imposed upon the superintendent of that institution the duty of answering inquiries of such character, and likewise the duty of answering fully, fairly, and freely as to the condition of the patient inquired about. As we view it, the subject-matter of the letter was Lee Collins, and it was the duty of the superintendent, to write to her father, not alone as to her mental condition and her physical welfare, but any other fact or circumstance which he should know in order that he might be the better enabled to aid and assist in her comfort and welfare. If she was regarded at the institution as colored, it was his duty to inform the father of that fact, so that, if an injury was being done to her, it could be remedied; and if the letter, which is the publication complained of, is protected by the rule of being qualifiedly privileged in all other things save and except the use of the abbreviated word "Col.," then the entire subject-matter of the letter was likewise within the rule.

Viewing this matter as we do, we must hold that the allegations contained in the first cause of action of the petition do not set forth facts sufficient to constitute libel within the purview of our statute, and that the libelous matter complained of in the second cause of action is privileged, and the judgment of the trial court in sustaining a demurrer thereto must be affirmed.

Per Curiam:

Adopted in whole.

A petition for rehearing having been granted, the following Per Curiam response was handed down October 28, 1919:

The petition for rehearing in this case was heretofore granted, and the cause has been reheard on oral argument and briefs submitted. After further consideration of the questions urged for reversal of the judgment of the trial court, we are of the opinion that the former decision is correct, and the opinion of the Commission, filed on July 25, 1916, is adopted as the opinion of the court in this case.

ANNOTATION.

Libel and slander: entries in records as a publication.

It will be seen that it is held in the reported case (COLLINS v. OKLAHOMA STATE HOSPITAL, ante, 895) that to write in the records of an insane asylum, opposite the name of a white person, that such person is colored, is not in itself a publication, there being no allegations that anyone saw the records or examined the books in which the records were kept. No other case has been found where the question of publication has been limited to the mere entry in records.

In Landis v. Campbell (1883) 79 Mo. 433, 49 Am. Rep. 239, the defendants, the pastor and two of the ruling elders of a Presbyterian church, with the other members of its session, adopted a preamble and resolution suspending the plaintiff from the communion of the church. The plaintiff in one count relied as publication of the alleged libel upon adoption of the same by the session, recording it upon its minute book, the oral announcement of the expulsion of the plaintiff by the pastor to the congregation, a written copy of the proceedings, furnished to the plaintiff by one of the defendants as clerk of the session, and the exhibition of the proceedings to McDonald and Hulett, members of the session, who were not parties to the action, in order to procure their signatures to the same; in another count plaintiff relied, as a publication of the alleged libel, upon a reading of the same from a copy by the pastor to the congregation, the entering the same on the session minutes, and exhibiting them to the members of the session, by its clerk, to get their signatures to them. The court said: "The reading the preamble and resolutions of suspension was a publication within the meaning of that term, as employed in relation to libels; but when a member has been excommunicated, it may be promulgated by the pastor by reading the resolution of expulsion in the presence of the congregation, according to the practice of the church, and that act will, of itself, furnish no foundation for an action against him.

. . . The court properly instructed the jury that neither the entry upon the book kept by the sessions for that purpose, of the resolution of suspension and excommunication, nor the announcement of the latter to the congregation by Campbell [the pastor], was a publication of either of the alleged libels, but should also have included in the instruction the preamble to the resolution of suspension. It also correctly declared that the writing and sending of the letter in evidence by defendant Sanders to plaintiff was no publication of the libel, but erred in declaring that his exhibition of the paper to Hulett and McDonald, members of the session, for their signatures, was a publication. There was no evidence that Sanders, or anyone else, exhibited the resolution to anyone except McDonald and Hulett, members of the session, and the testimony was that it was shown to them only to procure their signatures to the paper, as members of the session."

In Beardsley v. Tappan (1851) Fed. Cas. No. 1,188a, new trial denied in (1867) 5 Blatchf. 497, Fed. Cas. No. 1189, reversed on another ground in (1871) 10 Wall. (U. S.) 427, 19 L. ed. 974, a suit against a proprietor of a mercantile agency on account of an entry in the agency's books, the court instructed the jury, inter alia, as follows: "Plaintiffs have shown, after proving the words were prima facie actionable, that they were published. It does not signify that they were in general circulation; but in law they are published if intentionally passed from the composer to any other person not entitled to them. The plaintiffs must show publication. One of the witnesses took it down verbatim, as it was read to him. They show that this writing was not in possession exclusively of the defendant; that it was not copied by him; that there were others in the office who had access to the book; that these either saw the report or heard it read. This is sufficient publication in law. If Mr. Douglas alone saw it, there is publication."

In Patmont v. International Christian Missionary Asso. (1909) — Minn. —, 171 N. W. 302, where the defendant had circulated copies of its corporate record, it was held that "a religious corporation maintaining a church and a Bible college is, upon hearing reports derogatory of the character of the dean of its college, qualifiedly privileged in directing an investigation, and in entering its action reciting the nature of the reports on its corporate records, and in calling the attention thereto of its officers directly interested, and it cannot be charged with libel for so doing, except upon proof of actual malice." The court observed that "the plaintiff does not claim that there has been an excessive publication resulting in a loss of privilege." The matter of privilege is, however, beyond the scope of the note.

It may be noted that in Harris v. Nashville Trust Co. (1913) 128 Tenn. 573, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 897, 162 S. W. 584, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 885, the court said: "No more effective means of publishing and perpetuating a libel can be conceived than to secure the inscription of such matter on court records, as by probate of a will."

For a somewhat analogous point, reference is made to the case of Prins v. Holland-North America Mortg. Co. 5 A.L.R. 451, and to the annotation following that case on page 455, on "Communications between different officers of corporation." B. B. B.

(— W. Va. —, 100 S. E. 296.)

Mines — wrongful taking of oil and gas — credit for expenses.

1. One who enters upon a tract of land under an oil and gas lease, with full knowledge of the facts which render the same invalid, and produces the oil therefrom, is not entitled, when sued for the value of the oil so produced and sold from the lands by the party having the superior right, to any deduction from such value because of expenditures made by him in producing and marketing such oil.

Trespass — entry with knowledge of facts — good faith.

2. One who, with full knowledge of the facts which make his claim of title to land invalid, enters thereon and commits acts of trespass, is a wilful trespasser within the meaning of the law, even though he may honestly believe that under such known facts the law confers upon him good title.

[See 18 R. C. L. 1255.]

Messrs. Charles A. Goodwin and Glasscock & Glasscock for appellees.

Ritz, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs are the successors in title to the lessee in two oil and gas leases, executed by the owners of separate tracts of land lying in Monongalia county. These leases are indefinite in their term, and are what are commonly called "no-term leases." They provide for the drilling of a well within a certain time, or for the payment of a certain sum of money quarterly in lieu of drilling. For a number of years the plaintiffs and their predecessors paid the commutation money in lieu of drilling, and kept the leases alive in that way. At the end of one of the quarterly periods for which this commutation money had been paid, the landowners notified the holders of the leases that the same were canceled, and refused to receive the rental moneys for the next quarter. This contention of the landowners was disputed by the holders of the leases. Shortly thereafter the owners of the land made other leases to the defendants, or their predecessors, covering the same tracts of land, and both plaintiffs and defendants thereupon made locations upon each of the tracts of land with a view to drilling for oil or gas thereon. In the one instance the landowner, and in the other the defendant Pentress Gas Company, filed their bills in the circuit court of Monongalia county, setting up the facts as aforesaid, and asking that the plaintiffs here be enjoined from drilling upon said land under the old leases, contending that the same were canceled, and also be enjoined from interfering with the holders of the junior leases in their operations upon said lands. This injunction was granted, and while it was in force the defendants, claiming under the junior leases, drilled a well on each of the tracts of land, and produced oil therefrom. Upon a final hearing the circuit court perpetuated the injunctions and canceled the senior leases. An appeal was prosecuted from those decrees, and this court reversed the same, holding the senior leases valid and binding, and the junior lessors without right, and dismissed the bills. Johnson v. Armstrong, 81 W. Va. 399; 94 S. E. 753.

Thereafter the plaintiffs brought these suits and invoked the jurisdiction of equity to enjoin the defendants, the holders of the junior leases, from further operations upon said lands, and to have an accounting and recovery of the money received by said defendants for the oil taken from the premises. The cases were submitted upon a statement of agreed facts, from which it appears that the defendants expended in the drilling of each of the wells more than the sum of $5,000, and that they also expended in what is termed caring for, storing, and transporting the oil from the wells on the premises the sum of more than $1,500 in each case, which sums so expended by them in drilling the wells and in marketing the oil it is asked may be set off against the amounts received for the oil produced. The court below declined to allow defendants credit for the cost of drilling the wells, but did allow them credit for the other expenses in connection with said oil, and in the one case this was sufficient to entirely offset the amount received for oil, and in the other to reduce such amount to an inconsiderable sum. The plaintiffs contend that the defendants in their operations upon these lands were wilful trespassers, and are not entitled to any credit for money expended by them in producing or marketing the oil which they sold from the lands; while, on the other hand, it is contended by the defendants that they were acting in good faith, believing their rights superior to the rights of plaintiffs, for which reason they are entitled to credit for the expenses incurred in the production of the oil, and further that, even if this is not the case, under decisions of this court cited by counsel, which will be hereafter referred to, they are entitled to be credited in an accounting with such cost of production.

The first question which naturally presents itself is: What was the status of the defendants in relation to these lands at the time they drilled the wells thereon? That they were trespassers there is no doubt, but, as will be hereafter seen, a wilful trespasser is upon a different footing from one who can be said to be acting in good faith. The defendants contend that they were not wilful trespassers, because they honestly believed that their title was superior to that of the plaintiffs. They were cognizant of every fact affecting their rights or interests in the lands, as well as the rights and interests of the plaintiffs, and their contention of good faith rests upon the sole ground that they honestly misjudged the law. They believed that under the law the existing facts, of which they were fully informed, gave them the superior right. The plaintiffs did not acquiesce in this view, but, on the contrary, vigorously contested it, and contended from the very beginning that they alone had right to drill for oil and gas on these lands. Can the fact that one acts under a misconception of the law characterize his acts as innocent? The presumption is that every man knows the law, and when he is fully informed as to the facts, and makes a wrong application of the law thereto, ordinarily he will be bound by his acts to the same extent as if he had no misconception in regard to the law which controls. He is presumed to be as fully informed as to the law controlling under a given state of facts at one time as at another, and if he acts upon his own interpretation of the law he does so at his peril. In this case, as before observed, the defendants were fully informed as to the facts, and committed the acts which resulted in the extraction of the oil with this full knowledge, and with the further knowledge that their interpretation of the law was vigorously contested by the plaintiffs. It may be said that the defendants had such confidence in their judgment as to be willing to take the risk of an unfavorable decision. Entire good faith, it occurs to us, would have dictated to them that the proper course would be to wait until the controversy had been finally determined before expending large sums of money in drilling upon the land.

This doctrine is fully discussed in the case of Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Deepwater R. Co. 57 W. Va. 641-695, 50 S. E. 890. In that case the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company entered upon the lands under an order of the circuit court, and spent large sums of money in constructing a tunnel. It was afterwards determined that the Deepwater Railway Company had the better right to the right of way in dispute, and, notwithstanding the tunnel constructed by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company was beneficial to the Deepwater Railway Company in its operations, this court denied any right to compensation for the money expended and the improvements made. It was there held that the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company could not be a bona fide occupant of the land, although it had entered thereon under an order of the court, believing its title to be good, because it had notice of all of the facts, being ignorant only of matter of law. The same doctrine was announced in Snider v. Snider, 3 W. Va. 200. And in Dawson v. Grow, 29 W. Va. 333, 1 S. E. 564, it was held that, to entitle an evicted claimant to compensation for improvements put upon lands, he must have acted bona fide, and that one having knowledge of all the facts in regard to the title to the land, or means of knowledge, is not such bona fide claimant. In that case it was held that the rec- ordation of the deed gave notice of the adverse claim, and that the one making improvements was charged with knowledge of such deed from the fact of its recordation alone. And in the case of Hall v. Hall, 30 W. Va. 779, 5 S. E. 260, it was likewise held that one evicted from land, claiming for improvements placed thereon, will not be entitled thereto unless he was a bona fide occupant, and that to be such bona fide occupant it must appear that he not only believed he had good title, and made the improvements in good faith under that belief, but it must be further shown that he at the time had reasonable grounds to believe his title good. If the title under which he claimed appeared upon its face to be defective upon a proper application of legal principles thereto, he could not be held to be acting in good faith.

This doctrine is announced in other cases decided by this court, and is well sustained both upon reason and authority. Why should one be treated as acting in good faith when dealing with property as his own, when he knows all of the facts which constitute his claim, as well as the claim of his adversary, which facts, when properly construed, give him no title to the land? Such a holding would make every man a judge of the law in his own case, instead of being bound by the law as interpreted by those charged with that duty. We must therefore conclude that the defendants, when they drilled the wells on these lands, were wilful trespassers, just as much so as though there had been no question but that the plaintiffs had the superior right. They could not decide the disputed question in their own favor, and then proceed with the hope that their acts would be characterized by this court as in good faith, even though their judgment upon the law of the case should not be approved.

Having reached this conclusion, what, then, are the plaintiffs entitled to recover in these cases? In case of a trespass to real property by removing timber or mineral therefrom, it seems that the injured party may sue for damages done to the estate, or he may bring his suit in the nature of trover and conversion for the thing severed from the estate, and recover it, or its value. In case he sues for the injury to the estate, the measure of his damages is the depreciation in the value thereof by reason of the trespass; but in case he elects to waive any consequential injury by reason of the trespass, and sue only for the material severed, or its value, then the measure of his damages is arrived at in another way. By severing a part of the freehold and converting it into personalty, the trespasser does not thereby become vested with title. The title still remains in him to whom the real estate belonged at the time the trespass was committed, and he can follow the article so long as he can find it, and recover it for his own benefit without any deduction for the cost of making the severance. Gaskins v. Davis, 115 N. C. 85, 20 S. E. 188, 25 L.R.A. 813, 44 Am. St. Rep. 439, and note.

In this case the plaintiffs do not seek to recover damages for the injury inflicted upon their estate. They seek to recover the value of the oil taken from the property by the defendants as a result of the trespass committed upon their rights. They do not attempt to recover the oil itself, for the very good reason that it has gone beyond the control of either of the parties. It might seem that, if the owner of real estate is entitled to recover the property severed therefrom by a trespasser, without deduction for the cost of such severance where the same increases the value of the property, whether the trespass is wilful or otherwise, he would be entitled to recover the value of the article after its severance, where the trespasser has put it beyond his control to recover the article itself; and indeed many of the cases so hold. It seems to us, however, that the better rule is that laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in E. E. Bolles Wooden-ware Co. v. United States, 106 U. S. 482, 27 L. ed. 230, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 398, and that is that, where the trespass is wilful, the measure of damages is the value of the property at the time and place of demand without deduction for labor and expense; but where such trespass is not wilful, but is the result of a mistake of fact, the measure of plaintiff's damages is the value of the article after its severance, less the proper expense of such severance. Sutherland, Damages, § 1020; J. F. Ball & Bro. Lumber Co. v. Simms Lumber Co. 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 244, and note (121 La. 627, 46 So. 674); Bailey v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 19 L.R.A. 658, and note (8 S. D. 531, 54 N. W. 596); Gaskins v. Davis, 115 N. C. 85, 25 L.R.A. 813, 44 Am. St. Rep. 439, 20 S. E. 188; Winchester v. Craig, 33 Mich. 205.

Many more authorities to the same effect might be cited, but they are thoroughly considered in the cases above noted. In the case of Guffey v. Smith, 237 U. S. 101, 59 L. ed. 856, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 526, the United States Supreme Court considered a question similar to the one we have here. That was a controversy between junior and senior lessees, in which the one not entitled to the property had produced oil therefrom, and that court held that the proper measure of recovery was the value of the oil sold from the land by the trespasser, without any credit for such sums as he had expended in producing the same after he became a wilful trespasser, but with credit for such sums as had been expended by him while he was in ignorance of one of the facts making his lease invalid.

Counsel for the defendants here attempt to distinguish that case upon the ground that in Illinois one holding an oil and gas lease is held to have an interest in the land, while in this jurisdiction the holder of such a lease before production thereunder is held not to have an interest in the land as such, but only an exclusive right to drill the land for the purpose of producing these minerals, and to produce the same after they are discovered. This can make no difference in the application of the principle, for the reason that the trespass committed here was to the plaintiffs' rights, regardless of what they were. Admittedly plaintiffs had the exclusive right to drill this land for oil and gas, and the defendants wrongfully took this right from them. Plaintiffs likewise had the right, upon discovery of the oil and gas, to produce and sell the same, and of this right they were deprived by the defendants; so that it makes no difference as to the extent of the plaintiffs' interests, the result is that they have been deprived of them, and that by the defendants' unwarranted acts. This would lead to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were entitled to decrees at least for the amounts received by the defendants for the oil produced from these premises, without deduction for the amount spent in the production thereof.

But the defendants claim that these cases are controlled by the decisions of this court in the cases of Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 38 L.R.A. 694, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891, 27 S. E. 411, 19 Mor. Min. Rep. 19; McNeely v. South Penn Oil Co. 58 W. Va. 438, 52 S. E. 480, and South Penn Oil Co. v. Haught, 71 W. Va. 720, 78 S. E. 759, in each of which cases it was held that a joint tenant, who had committed waste upon the common property, by producing and selling the oil therefrom, should be given credit in an accounting for the amount expended by him in such production. In all of those cases the party committing the waste did so with knowledge or means of knowledge of the facts affecting his title. In the Williamson-Jones Case, Jones claimed to be the owner of the whole of the land, and believed himself to be such owner, having bought the same at a judicial sale; but the court held that he was chargeable with the knowledge that an inspection of the record would disclose. To this extent this decision is stronger against the trespasser than that of Guffey v. Smith, above cited, for in that case the Supreme Court held that, even though the senior lease was recorded, the junior lessee would not be charged with notice of it from that fact alone. Believing himself to be the owner of the whole tract of land, he developed the same for oil and gas, and thereafter the owners of the other seven tenths sued him for an accounting. Judge Brannon in that case says that by dry law Jones would not be entitled to any credit for the money expended by him in doing the drilling, but because of the equities existing he was allowed such credit.

How did these equities arise? In the case of joint tenants, each is to an extent the agent of the other in the matter of caring for the joint property, and a joint tenant who commits waste because of this relationship is, to some extent at least, in the same situation as an agent who acts in excess of his authority. If one of the joint owners is in possession of the real estate, he has the right to use it, but not to commit waste thereon, subject to an accounting with his cotenant for the rents and profits derivable from such estate. If he exceeds his authority and commits waste, there is an equitable relation between him and his cotenant similar to that existing between a principal and an agent who exceeds his authority. It is well settled that if an agent exceeds his authority in making a contract for his principal, and the principal subsequently accepts the benefits of the contract, he must likewise submit to its obligations. There is a similar relation, perhaps not, however, so well defined, or existing in the same degree, between joint tenants, where one exceeds his authority by committing waste upon the joint estate, and this is the relation because of which the equities spoken of by Judge Brannon arose.

The same may be said of the decision in the other two cases referred to. The matters decided involved waste committed by joint tenants. In the McNeely Case Judge Poffenbarger, speaking for this court, says that the court seems to have gone to the utmost limit of equity jurisdiction to relieve from the rigors of the common and statutory law in allowing the expense incurred by the drilling in that case, and we quite agree with this conclusion. We are not willing to extend those limits, so as to include a trespass committed by one who is a stranger to the title. In the Haught Case, above referred to, it is intimated in the opinion that the decision would have been different, were it not for the fact that the notice given by the joint tenant out of possession, to his cotenant, was more of an invitation to go on with the drilling than it was a prohibition thereof. It cannot be doubted that there is a relation between joint tenants, from which equities may arise in favor of the one or the other, which does not exist between strangers, and for this reason equity may relieve against the harshness of the rule of law otherwise applicable.

The plaintiffs claim that they are entitled, not only to the oil received by the defendants and sold by them, but also to the one eighth thereof delivered to the owners of the land. They argue that, while it is true the landowners are entitled to receive one eighth of the oil produced, yet this delivery of the one eighth to the landowners by the defendants did not fulfil their contract with the landowners. This may be quite true; but it must be borne in mind that the plaintiffs are only under obligation to deliver to the landowners one eighth of the oil produced by them. They are under no obligation to deliver one eighth of the oil produced by a trespasser, especially when such trespasser is put upon the land by the landowners themselves. We do not think, therefore, that the plaintiffs' contention in this regard has merit.

Plaintiffs also contend that they are entitled to receive, not only the price at which the oil was sold, but to have interest thereon as a part of the damages, from the time the defendants received the money until it is paid to them; and they further contend that they are entitled to receive the highest market price of the oil between the time that it was produced and the institution of these suits. Both of these contentions cannot stand. Their bills in these cases pray that they be decreed the amount received by the defendants for the oil produced and sold from the premises. This is inconsistent with the demand for the highest market price of such oil between the date of its production and the bringing of the suits. Plaintiffs were, however, entitled to have this money at the time the oil was converted into money. The oil was theirs, and they elected by their suits to take what defendants actually received for it, but contend that as part of their damages interest should be added to this amount until the same is paid. In this contention we think they are correct. While ordinarily interest is not recoverable as a part of unliquidated damages, still, in ascertaining the amount of damages to which one is entitled, where it appears that such damages are determined by a fixed sum, to which the plaintiff was entitled at a particular time, interest may be added to it as one of the elements constituting the amount to which the plaintiff is entitled at the time of the recovery. 8 R. C. L. 537. This was our holding in Cresap v. Brown, 82 W. Va. 467, 96 S. E. 66.

In these cases we are of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to decrees in their favor for the amounts actually received by the defendants for the oil sold by them from the premises, with interest on each of these amounts from the time the same was so received until the entry of such decrees, without any deduction therefrom for money expended by the defendants for producing and marketing such oil.

The decrees appealed from will be reversed, and the cases remanded for the entry of such decree.

I. Innocent trespass.

a. Generally.

It is the prevailing rule that a trespasser who encroaches on the land of another, mining and removing minerals, if the taking is inadvertent or under a claim of right or a bona fide belief of title, is liable in damages only for the minerals removed, based on their value as they lay in the mine before being disturbed, or, as is often expressed, their value in situ. And if evidence is not obtainable of the value of the minerals in situ, or if the circumstances of the case make it impracticable to fix their value in this manner, the same result is generally arrived at by proving their value at the mouth of the pit, and deducting therefrom the expense of mining and transporting them to that place.

Ore.

If a trespasser takes and converts ore from the property of another through inadvertence or mistake, or in the honest belief that he is acting within his legal rights, the measure of damages is the value of the ore as it was in the ground before it was disturbed by the trespasser; that is, the amount recovered and realized by defendant in its mill, less the actual cost of mining, transporting, and treating the ore. Liberty Bell Gold Min. Co. v. Smuggler-Union Min. Co. (1913) 122 C. C. A. 113, 203 Fed. 795. See to the same effect, United States v. Homestake Min. Co. (1902) 54 C. C. A. 303, 117 Fed. 481, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 365, (dictum).

The measure of damages for wrongfully taking ore from the land of another through inadvertence or mistake, or in the honest belief that one is acting within his legal rights, is the value of the ore in the mine. Resurrection Gold Min. Co. v. Fortune Gold Min. Co. (1904) 64 C. C. A. 180, 129 Fed. 668.

In Hendricks v. Spring Valley Min. & Irrig. Co. (1881) 53 Cal. 190, 41 Am. Rep. 257, it appeared that the plaintiff and the defendant were the owners of adjoining mining claims. The defendant, in working its own claim by hydraulic process, washed away gravel so that large portions of the surface of the plaintiff's claim caved and fell upon the adjoining ground of defendant and were washed away, and the gold was extracted by the defendant. The plaintiff thereupon brought action to recover damages for the trespass. It was held that the defendant would have been liable for the amount of gold taken from the gravel that fell from the plaintiff's claim, but for the fact that its value was less than the necessary cost of extracting it.

In Maye v. Yappen (1863) 23 Cal. 306, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 101, it appeared that the plaintiffs and the defendants were owners of adjoining mining claims, and that the defendants unintentionally mined over the dividing line, extracting gold and gold-bearing earth from the plaintiffs' claim. Action was brought by the plaintiffs to recover the value of the gold converted. There was no dispute as to the trespass, but the plaintiffs contended that the trial court should not have allowed evidence showing that defendants were ignorant of the location of the boundary line. The appellate court held that the admission of this testimony was error, as the right of plaintiffs to recover the damages they had actually sustained was not affected by the fact that the trespass was not wilful, and, as the plaintiffs had the means of ascertaining their boundary line, they were guilty of negligence in not learning its exact location. After reviewing authorities, the court then said: "The proper rule for damages, in a case like the present, is the value of the gold-bearing earth at the time it was separated from the surrounding soil and became a chattel. This seems to be a just and proper rule, and one established by the decisions upon this question. In estimating these damages, the expense of extracting the gold and separating it from the earth, after it is first removed from its original location, is to be deducted from the value of the gold taken out of the mining ground of the plaintiffs." It will be observed that the court laid down two apparently conflicting rules for the measure of damages.

In Goller v. Pett (1866) 30 Cal. 432, 11 Mor. Min. Rep. 171, Maye v. Yappen (Cal.) supra, was followed in holding that it was error to exclude evidence of "the expense of digging the gold-bearing earth."

In Lamb v. Kincaid (1903) 33 Can. S. C. 516, 8 Ann. Cas. 36, an action to recover damages for the invasion of the plaintiffs' placer mining claim by the defendants, and the value of a quantity of gold which the defendants had removed therefrom and converted to their own use, Duff, J., speaking for the court, said: "It has for some years been the settled law applicable to cases of coal-mining trespass, where the trespass is not wilful, that in estimating when that forms an element in the damages to which the plaintiff is entitled—the value of the coal abstracted, the coal is to be treated as in situ, and from its value at the mouth of the pit is to be deducted the cost of severing it from its natural bed and of bringing it to bank."

In Kirkpatrick v. McNamee (1905) 25 Can. L. T. Occ. N. 125, 36 Can. S. C. 152, the plaintiff sued to recover damages sustained through trespass committed by the defendants on a placer mining claim, the trespasses consisting of the removal of pay dirt and gold-bearing gravel from a portion of the claim, and the washing up by the defendants and converting to their own use of the gold therein. It was held that, as the evidence showed that the defendants' intentions were honest, and did not disclose wilful carelessness, the mild rule for the measure of damages should apply, and the defendants should be allowed the full cost of getting out the gold as well as the cost of washing after the earth was dug out.

Where one has innocently and unintentionally committed a trespass; by working over his own line into his neighbor's adjacent mine, the measure of damages is, besides any actual injury to the land, the value of the ore in place, or, at the farthest, when first severed. Coleman's Appeal (1869) 62 Pa. 252, 14 Mor. Min. Rep. 221.

In Durant Min. Co. v. Percy Consol. Min. Co. (1899) 35 C. C. A. 252, 93 Fed. 166, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 27, it appeared that the plaintiff and the defendant were adjoining mine operators, and that the defendant extended its workings into the mine of plaintiff, and extracted ores therefrom. Sanborn, J., speaking for the circuit court of appeals, said: "One, who unintentionally, and in the honest belief that he is lawfully exercising a right which he has, enters upon the property of another and removes his ore, his timber, or any other valuable appurtenant to his real estate, is liable in damages for the value of the ore, timber, or other thing in its original place, and for no more." He then ruled that the defendant could limit the recovery of the owner by deducting from the value of the ore at the mouth of the shaft the cost of mining and transporting it to that point.

Aurora Hill Consol. Min. Co. v. 85 Min. Co. (1888) 12 Sawy. 359, 34 Fed. 515, was an action of ejectment, brought to recover possession of a mining claim, together with damages for ore alleged to have been removed therefrom and converted by defendants to their own use. It appeared that the grantors of defendants, together with some of the defendants in person, relocated this mine, recording their notice of relocation, and entered thereon, extracting and removing several tons of ore. They attempted to justify the relocation by reason of the fact that the plaintiff had failed to do the annual work thereon, as required by statute. The court held that, after the entry and payment of the purchase money for the mine, the plaintiff was not required to expend any further sum of money thereon, pending the final decision on his application and the issue of a patent; and the defendant was, therefore, a trespasser. In fixing the measure of damages, the court said: "There is evidence in the case which might bring the measure of damages within the severer rule laid down in Wooden-Ware Co. v. United States (1882) 106 U. S. 432, 27 L. ed. 230, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 398. It is in evidence, undisputed, that plaintiff, by its well-known agent, remonstrated with defendants and denied their right to locate the mine or work upon the same, or remove ore therefrom, and constantly asserted plaintiff's rights. And finally, plaintiff was compelled to bring this action to dispossess defendants. I have, however, adopted the measure above indicated, allowing the defendants the cost of extraction and reduction, non constat, however, but that plaintiff could have extracted and reduced this ore at less expense than it was done by defendants."

In Colorado Cent. Consol. Min. Co. v. Turck (1895) 17 C. C. A. 128, 36 U. S. App. 208, 70 Fed. 294, it appeared that plaintiff and defendant were owners of adjoining mining claims, and that a vein having its apex within the side lines of plaintiff's claim, in its descent into the earth, passed outside of the side lines of his claim. The defendant, finding the vein within its own side lines, took possession of it as its own property, extracting ore therefrom, and converting it to its own use. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action in ejectment and recovered judgment, and thereafter brought the present suit to recover damages for the wrongful conversion of the ore. The jury having found that the defendant was not a wilful trespasser, the court held the measure of damages to be the value of the ore taken, less the cost and expense of breaking it and bringing it to the mouth of the mine.

If a trespasser invades the mine of another, extracting mineral therefrom, and such invasion is the result of honest mistake and inadvertence, the measure of damages is the value of the mineral extracted, less the cost of mining and milling. Lightner Min. Co. v. Lane (1911) 161 Cal. 689, 120 Pac. 777, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1098.

In Empire Gold Min. Co. v. Bonanza Gold Min. Co. (1885) 67 Cal. 406, 7 Pac. 810, it appeared that the plaintiff and defendant were owners of adjoining mining claims, and that defendant had worked beyond its line and upon the claim of plaintiff. The court, while not questioning the doctrine of damages in the case of unintentional trespass as enunciated in the earlier cases held that the rule could not be extended so as to entitle a defendant who had committed a trespass to justify his act and obtain a verdict by showing the value of the property taken to be less than the expense of its severance from the realty since for every trespass upon real property the law presumes nominal damages. This rule, it will be observed, is apparently in conflict with the rule in Hendricks v. Spring Valley Min. & Irrig. Co. (1881) 58 Cal. 190, 41 Am. Rep. 257, infra, and, although the latter case was not mentioned in the opinion in this case, the holding in the Hendricks

Case, in so far as it conflicts with the doctrine herein enunciated, must be assumed to be overruled.

In Chamberlain v. Collinson (1877) 45 Iowa, 429, 9 Mor. Min. Rep. 86, the question arose as to the measure of damages for trespass to a mining claim. It was held that, as the trespasser was not guilty of a wilful wrong or gross neglect, the measure of damages should be the value of the mineral unmined, or the value of it mined, less the reasonable cost of mining it.

In Fitzgerald v. Clark (1895) 17 Mont. 100, 80 L.R.A. 808, 52 Am. St. Rep. 665, 42 Pac. 273, action was brought to recover the value of ore taken by defendants from a portion of a vein lying within defendants' claim, but having its apex within plaintiff's claim. An instruction that the measure of damages was the market value of the ores on the dump, after deducting the cost of mining and hoisting, including the cost of smelting and reducing the ore, was held to be correct.

Waters v. Stevensen (1878) 13 Nev. 157, 29 Am. Rep. 293, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 240, was an action brought against defendant for extracting and removing a quantity of ore from plaintiff's mine. The verdict of the jury established the fact that the trespass was committed unintentionally, and was the result of inadvertence and mistake, the defendant believing that he was mining within the boundaries of his own adjoining mine. The lower court held the measure of damages to be the gross yield of the ore, less the necessary expense of assorting, transporting, hoisting, handling, and milling, and all other necessary expense after the ore was picked down in the mine. It was held, on appeal, that the necessary cost of mining the ores should also be deducted.

Ege v. Kille (1877) 84 Pa. 383, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 212, was an action for mesne profits arising from ore lands, it appearing that defendants were bona fide purchasers for value under color of title. It was held that the defendants, having acted in good faith in the working of the mines and removal of the ore, were liable only for the value of the ore in place, such value to be ascertained by deducting from the market value of the ore when delivered in the market the cost of mining, cleansing, and delivery.

Stockbridge Iron Co. v. Cone Iron Works (1869) 102 Mass. 80, 6 Mor. Min. Rep. 817, was a proceeding in equity for an injunction to restrain defendants from removing ore from the land of plaintiff, and for damages for the trespass committed in mining and removing the ore. It was held that the measure of damages was the value of the ore as it lay in the bed, and not as it was after defendants had increased its value by removing it.

In Hartford Iron Min. Co. v. Cambria Min. Co. (1892) 93 Mich. 90, 32 Am. St. Rep. 488, 53 N. W. 4, 17 Mor. Min. Rep. 515, an action of trover was brought to recover the value of iron ore wrongfully mined by defendant from the land of which the plaintiff was lessee under a mining lease. The plaintiff was allowed to recover the value of the ore mined, less the actual cost of producing it, and less the royalty which was paid by defendant to the owner. On appeal, the rule of damages adopted was held to be sufficiently favorable to the defendant.

Coal.

Stewart v. Colfax Consol. Coal Co. (1910) 147 Iowa, 548, 126 N. W. 449, was an action to recover damages occasioned to plaintiff by the wrongful act of defendant in mining and appropriating from plaintiff's land the coal under  $\frac{1}{4}$  of an acre, which had been reserved in a deed from plaintiff to defendant's grantor, of the coal lying under the tract of land therein described. No evidence having been adduced showing wilfulness or negligence, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the coal for mining purposes immediately before the taking and removal took place.

In Bennett Jellico Coal Co. v. East Jellico Coal Co. (1913) 152 Ky. 888, 154 S. W. 922, wherein it appeared that the defendant mined coal on the land of plaintiff, owing to a confusion in the boundary lines, it was held that the measure of damages was the usual and customary royalty paid in that locality for mining coal of the same quality, and in veins of the same approximate thickness.

In Burke Hollow Coal Co. v. Lawson (1912) 151 Ky. 305, 151 S. W. 657, it appeared that the defendant coal company had inadvertently mined over the boundary line which separated its land from the land of plaintiff, removing a quantity of coal from plaintiff's land. It was held that the defendant was entitled to recover only the value of the coal as it lay in the mine, or the usual reasonable royalty paid for the right of mining.

In Sandy River Cannel Coal Co. v. Whitehouse Cannel Coal Co. (1907) 125 Ky. 278, 101 S. W. 319, 102 S. W. 320, it appeared that the plaintiff and defendant owned adjoining coal lands, and a dispute arose between them as to the location of the dividing line. The plaintiff, claiming that defendant was extracting coal from its land, brought suit for an injunction and to establish the boundary line. Pending the determination of this suit, defendant, being about to abandon its mine, entered into an agreement with plaintiff whereby the defendant was allowed to remove coal from under plaintiff's land, giving a bond to account for all coal mined and removed beyond the boundary line, as claimed by the plaintiff, in case the court should determine the issue of the boundary line in favor of plaintiff. The defendant mined and removed coal under these conditions, and subsequently the boundary line was determined in accordance with plaintiff's contention. It was held that the trespass committed by defendant was under a bona fide claim of right, and the plaintiff could recover only the value of the coal as it lay in the mine before it was disturbed, or a reasonable royalty on the amount of coal removed.

In Lyons v. Central Coal & Coke Co. (1911) 239 Mo. 626, 144 S. W. 503, suit was brought against the defendant, who trespassed on the land of plaintiff, removing coal therefrom and converting it to its own use. It appeared that the trespass was inadvertent and innocent of intentional wrong. The court held that the proper measure of damages was the value of the coal as it lay in its bed, which, if both the plaintiff and the defendant were engaged in mining operations, should be ascertained by deducting from the value of the coal in the market the cost of putting it there; but if the plaintiff was not engaged in mining operations, and had no facilities for mining the coal, the value of the coal should be determined on the basis of the usual royalty paid to a landowner.

Austin v. Huntsville Coal & Min. Co. (1886) 72 Mo. 535, 27 Am. Rep. 446, was an action of trespass to recover damages for mining and taking coal from under plaintiff's land. It was held that where there is no element of wilfulness or wrong, or such gross negligence or disregard of others' rights as leads necessarily to the inference of wilfulness or wrong, the true measure of damages for the coal taken is its value at the mouth of the shaft, less the cost of mining it and delivering it to that point.

In Keys v. Pittsburg & W. Coal Co. (1898) 58 Ohio St. 246, 41 L.R.A. 681, 65 Am. St. Rep. 754, 50 N. E. 911, it was held that where a purchaser acting in good faith under a belief that the title to property in which he is mining coal will be perfected by proceedings instituted in the probate court for that purpose, or by the infant grantors when they arrive at age, continues to mine coal and converts it to his own use, the measure of damages in an action brought against him is the value of the coal in place at the time it was mined. It was further held that there was no substantial difference between the rule fixing the measure of damages at the value of the coal in place, and the rule that the value of the coal when severed, less the cost of severance, would be the measure of damages.

In Matthews v. Rush (1919) 262 Pa. 524, 105 Atl. 817, it appeared that the plaintiffs were the owners of a tract of land adjoining another tract from which defendants were mining coal; that in the course of their operations the defendants removed, and converted to their own use, coal from under plaintiffs' land. Action was brought under a statute giving the right to treble damages where the taking was with knowledge of the rights of the owner. The court took occasion to lay down the rule for the measure of damages where the trespass was not tortious, and held, in such cases, the measure of damages ordinarily to be the value of the coal in place, and not its value at the tipple less the expense of mining and conveying it there.

In Kingston v. Lehigh Valley Coal Co. (1913) 241 Pa. 469, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 557, 88 Atl. 763, the owner of coal lands leased the surface of the lands to a tenant for years, whose assignee mined and removed coal therefrom. The reversioner thereupon brought an injunction proceeding, restraining the commission of further waste, and an action for trespass against the assignee of the tenant for the value of the coal mined. It was held that the measure of damages should be the value of the coal in place, if there was evidence of such value, and if there was no evidence of the actual value of the coal in place the damages should be determined by finding the value at the mouth of the pit, and deducting from this estimate what it would cost to mine and transport it there. As to the proper method of determining the value of the coal in place, the court said: "Ordinarily, the value of coal in place is understood to mean its value in a state of nature; in other words, its acreage value in the solid body. As to virgin, undeveloped coal, this is a primary rule for ascertaining the value of coal in place. This primary rule should likewise prevail except in those cases in which, by reason of the location of the coal, its proximity to mining operations, or its accessibility to transportation facilities, it has a present market value on the royalty basis. If the injured party owns a tract of coal land which has a present market value for operation as a going mine, and it has a market value for operating purposes at a price per ton,—that is, what is known as a royalty,—he should not be deprived of the advantage which the situation of his property gives him, and in such a case it is proper to allow a recovery on the basis of royalty value." See to the same effect, Kingston v. Lehigh Valley Coal Co. (1913) 241 Pa. 481, 88 Atl. 768.

Stark v. Pennsylvania Coal Co. (1913) 241 Pa. 597, 88 Atl. 770, was an action of trespass to recover damages from the defendant for the mining of coal on a small tract of land to which the plaintiffs claimed title. It appeared that the defendant had acted under an honest mistake as to its rights, being ignorant of the exact location of the boundary line separating its tract from the tract of plaintiffs. In discussing the question of the measure of damages it was said: "Both parties agreed here that the proper measure of damages is the fair value of the coal in place at the time of taking. If, as is admitted, the defendant acted fairly and honestly and in the full belief that it had a right to the coal, then the damages are to be fairly measured by giving to the plaintiffs the fair purchase price of the coal. The best evidence of this value is the amount of royalty which such coal would command, for that is presumptively all that the owners of the coal could have obtained for it, had the coal been sold."

In Little v. Greek (1912) 283 Pa. 584, 82 Atl. 955, an action for damages against a person who wrongfully removed coal from lands excepted in a lease of coal lands, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the coal in place. Two methods of ascertaining this value were recognized by the court, which held that it was proper to admit evidence of the value of the coal at the mouth of the pit, from which should be deducted the cost of mining and transporting it to that point, and also evidence of the royalty value of the coal in place.

In Oak Ridge Coal Co. v. Rogers (1884) 108 Pa. 147, the following instruction to the jury was approved on appeal. "The measure of damages is the fair value of the coal at the place there. If there is a market price in place, in the pit or mine, that would be the value you would put upon it, and if there is evidence from which you can find what it was worth before it was touched, it is your duty to do so. If there is no evidence to fix the value in place, what it would be worth at the pit mouth, then you may find what it was worth at a distant market, deducting what it was worth to take it there, even if you had to go to Europe to sell it."

Forsyth v. Wells (1861) 41 Pa. 291, 80 Am. Dec. 617, 14 Mor. Min. Rep. 493, was an action of trover for coal mined by the defendant on land of the plaintiff, and converted to his own use. The parties were owners of adjoining tracts of coal lands, and the defendant had opened a mine upon his own land, near the line, and worked it for years. The dividing line was not exactly known, and the plaintiff claimed that the defendant had dug coal over the line and out of her land, which was denied. The plaintiff claimed that the measure of damage was the value of the coal when dug in the bank, or what was called "knocked down," while the defendant contended that the measure of damages would be the value of the coal in the ground before he had expended any labor in preparing it for market, in support of which he offered evidence which was rejected; and the jury was charged that the value of the coal when "knocked down" in the bank was the proper measure of damages. It was held that, while trespass is the more obvious and proper remedy in cases of this character, the plaintiff, however, could waive the taking and sue in trover. The court said: "Where there is no wrongful purpose or wrongful negligence in the defendant, compensation for the real injury done is the purpose of all remedies; and so long as we bear this in mind, we shall have but little difficulty in managing the forms of actions so as to secure a fair result. If the defendant in this case was guilty of no intentional wrong, he ought not to have been charged with the value of the coal after he had been at the expense of mining it; but only with its value in place, and with such other damage to the land as his mining may have caused. Such would manifestly be the measure in trespass for mesne profits."

In Coal Creek Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Moses (1885) 15 Lea (Tenn.) 300, 54 Am. Rep. 415, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 544, it appeared that the defendant, in working a coal mine on his own land which adjoined the land of complainant, unintentionally and inadvertently encroached on the complainant's land, removing coal therefrom and converting it to its own use. A bill in equity was filed to charge the defendant with the value of coal mined by it on the land of complainant. Upon the trial of the action the chancellor charged the defendant with the value of the coal thus mined at the mouth of the mine, deducting only the expense of removing it there from the place where it was dug. It was held on appeal that the measure of damages was the value of the coal in situ before the trespass.

In Ross v. Scott (1885) 15 Lea (Tenn.) 479, it appeared that the defendant in good faith, under an honest belief of title, mined coal on the land of complainant. As to the measure of damages, the court said: "The weight of authority, both of English and American, now is that where there is an honest dispute as to title, or where the trespass has been from ignorance, and not wilful, the damages will be confined to the value of the property before the trespass was committed, or, to use the language of the English courts, 'at the same rate as if the property taken had been purchased in situ by the defendant at the fair market value of the district.'"

In Brown v. Dibbs (1877) 37 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 171, 25 Week. Rep. 776, the plaintiff, who was the vendee of a coal mine, brought action against the vendor who, pending a suit for specific performance, worked the mine for his own benefit. The measure of damages was held to be the market value of the coal in situ, or its value at the place where it was to be sold, less the cost of severing it and removing it to that place.

In Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Co. (1880) L. R. 5 App. Cas. (Eng.) 25, 42 L. T. N. S. 334, 28 Week. Rep. 357, 44 J. P. 392, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 291, it appeared that the defendant mined coal from under land of which the coal rights belonged to the plaintiff. The trespass was admitted, neither the plaintiff nor the defendant knowing of the plaintiff's rights until after a quantity of coal had been mined and removed. The only question arising was the measure of damages in a case of unintentional trespass. The defendants were held to be charged with the value of the ore at the same rate as if the mine was purchased by them while the minerals were yet part of the soil, at the fair market value of the district, and the best evidence of this value in this case was held to be the amount of royalty paid on coal in the surrounding field.

In Trotter v. Maclean (1879) L. R. 13 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 574, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 256, 42 L. T. N. S. 118, 28 Week. Rep. 244, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 268, it appeared that the owner of a coal mine worked from his own mine into an adjoining mine, in the bona fide belief that he was to obtain a contract authorizing him to work, and gave to the trustee in charge of the adjoining land notice that he was about to commence working the mine. Subsequently it developed that the trustee had no power to make the contract. In an action for trespass it was held that the taking of coal by the plaintiff before he was notified that the contract would not be let should be treated in the light of an inadvertent trespass, and the defendant should be allowed the cost of severing the coal and bringing it to the bank.

In Hilton v. Woods (1867) L. R. 4 Eq. (Eng.) 432, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 110, the value of the coal in place was made the measure of damages against a defendant who had mined it under a belief that he was its owner. He had bought of one who had no title, and after he had mined a part of the coal, an action was brought against him by its owner to restrain further mining and for an account of the coal already mined. Sir R. Malins, V. C., after reviewing authorities, announced his intention of following the rule adopted in Wood v. Morewood (Eng.) infra, and, in ordering an accounting for the coal taken from the plaintiff, said: "I propose to declare that, in estimating the amount to be paid by the defendant for the coal gotten by him, he is to be paid the fair value of such coal, as if the coal field had been purchased from the plaintiff by the defendant at the fair market value of the district."

Wood v. Morewood (1878) 3 Q. B. 440, 114 Eng. Reprint, 575, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 77, an action of trover for coals converted, seems to be regarded as a leading case on the measure of damages where the taking has been inadvertent. The rule laid down in Hilton v. Wood (Eng.) supra, was applied by Parke, B., who told the jury that, if they found for the plaintiff, but thought that the defendant was not guilty of fraud or negligence, and acted fairly and honestly in the full belief that he had a right to do as he did, they might give the fair value of the coals as if the coal field had been purchased by the plaintiff. This estimate was adopted by the jury.

In Ashton v. Stock (1877) L. R. 6 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 719, 25 Week. Rep. 862, the defendant had for several years worked a coal mine, under a bona fide belief of title. In an action to recover damages for the value of the coal converted, it was held that, in view of the circumstances appearing in the case, the defendant was entitled to an allowance of his expenses of severing the coal as well as bringing it to bank. See to the same effect, Elias v. Griffith (1878) L. R. 8 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 521, 38 L. T. N. S. 871, 26 Week. Rep. 869; Joicey v. Dickinson (1881) 45 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 643.

The rule for the measure of damages in cases of trespass in taking the coal of another depends upon the circumstances under which the coal was taken. If the coal was converted through inadvertence or mistake, or in the honest belief that the trespasser was acting within his legal rights, the measure of damages is the value of the coal as it was in the ground before it was disturbed by the trespasser.

In Re United Merthyr Collieries Co. (1872) L. R. 15 Eq. (Eng.) 46, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 153, it appeared that coal had been wrongfully taken by working into the mine of an adjoining owner, it appearing from the evidence that the trespasser was ignorant of the location of the boundary line. It was held that, since there was no suggestion of fraud, the more lenient rule should be applied, and accordingly the defendant was ordered to pay the value of the coal at the pit's mouth, deducting the cost of severance and the cost of carrying it to the pit's mouth, so as to place the owner in the same position as if he had himself severed and raised the coal. In this connection, Sir James Bacon, V. C., said: "Here there is no suggestion of fraud that I can attend to. There has been no evidence relating to it, and it may have been a mere mistake. But what also weighs with me greatly is this: The claimants are themselves owners of mines. They seek their profit by severing the coal in the mine and bringing it to the surface and then selling it. If they had been undisturbed in the possession of which they now complain, they must have incurred an expense in securing the coal before they could have made a profit. The mere disbursement, then, which has been made by the United Merthyr Company in severing the coal, is doing no wrong that I can see to the claimant."

In Jegon v. Vivian (1871) L. R. 6 Ch. (Eng.) 742, 40 L. J. Ch. N. S. 389, 17 Eng. Rul. Cas. 843, 8 Mor. Min. Rep. 628, it appeared that a tenant for life, with certain powers of leasing, demised the seams and veins of coal under a parcel of land for twenty-one years, with the understanding that the lease was to continue for a period of sixty years if the tenant for life had power so to lease, and the lessee was given power under the lease to dig and sell the coal under the surface of the land. The lessee entered upon the lease and proceeded to work the coal, and, after the expiration of twenty-one years, continued the mining operations, claiming to be entitled to do so for sixty years. After much litigation this claim was decided to be invalid as against the reversioner. Action was brought for an accounting of the value of the coal taken from the mine after the expiration of the twenty-one year period. It was held that the defendants should pay for the coal at its fair market value, as if they were purchasers, all expenses of hewing and raising to be allowed.

Martin v. Porter (1839) 5 Mees. & W. 351, 151 Eng. Reprint, 149, 2 Horn & H. 70, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 75, 17 Eng. Rul. Cas. 841, was an action of trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close, and mining and carrying away coal. The defendant was owner of the adjoining estate and had worked the coal under the plaintiff's land. At the trial the question was on what principle the damages were to be assessed. It was held that, the action being trespass, the plaintiff was entitled to the value of the coal as a chattel at the time when the defendant began to take it away, that is, as soon as it existed as a chattel, which value would be its price at the pit's mouth, after deducting the expense of carrying the coals from the place in the mine where they were got, to the pit's mouth. It will be seen that this decision, like all that follow it, was based upon a principle not accepted by the majority of jurisdictions, viz., that, if the owner cannot obtain his property in species, he is entitled in all cases to the increased value.

In Wild v. Holt (1842) 9 Mees. & W. 672, 152 Eng. Reprint, 284, 12 Mor. Min. Rep. 182, it appeared that the defendant, in working his own mining claim, inadvertently trespassed on the land of plaintiff, removing mineral therefrom and converting it to his own use. In laying down a rule for the measure of damages, Parke, B., said: "Then, as to the damages, the jury are at liberty to give the full value of the coals, calculated at the time when they first exist as chattels, without deducting the expense of getting them, according to the rule laid down in the case of Martin v. Porter (Eng.) supra, which is a very salutary one, because the parties must know—at least, they may know by proper dealing—that they are trespassing on their neighbor's property."

Morgan v. Powell (1842) 3 Q. B. 281, 114 Eng. Reprint, 514, appears to have been similar to Martin v. Porter (Eng.) supra, Coleridge, J., stated that he felt bound by the rule laid down in Martin v. Porter, although he expressed a doubt as to its correctness, and in a note to the case is found the following: "By a shorthand writer's notes, his Lordship appears to have said: 'But for that case I should have thought that the ordinary principle would have prevailed, and that Sir Charles Morgan would be entitled to recover compensation only for the damage he had actually sustained, and that all he would have a right to ask at your hands would have been to put him in the same position as he would have been if the coal had never been stirred.'" See also Rowell v. Aiken (1858) 4 Kay & J. 848, 70 Eng. Reprint, 144.

In Fleming v. McNeill (1908) 7 Terr. L. Rep. (Can.) 192, an action was brought for an injunction to restrain defendants from digging and removing coal from plaintiff's land, and for damage for coal removed. It was held that as the evidence adduced on the trial of the case did not show any deliberate and intentional trespass by defendants, with knowledge that they had no right whatever to do the act, but, on the contrary, showed that they had a reasonable color of title, they were not wilful wrongdoers in the sense that they had no right to do what they did do. In fixing the amount of damages, Wetmore, J., said: "Under the circumstances of this case, and under the authorities, the measure of damages should be the value of the coal at the mouth of the mine, less the cost of digging it and transporting it there as a merchantable article; and by digging it I mean hewing it, as it is expressed in some of the cases."

Where a trespass on coal-bearing land is the result of an honest mistake, the damages may be reduced by the value of the labor expended in mining. Sunnyside Coal & Coke Co.

OIL.

In United States v. Midway Northern Oil Co. (1916) 232 Fed. 619, the government sought to obtain decrees that the several tracts of land described in the bills were the property of the United States, and for an injunction restraining the defendants from trespassing on the lands or extracting the oil therefrom, and an accounting for oil previously extracted and disposed of. It appeared that the defendants had built derricks, drilled wells, and extracted oil from public lands, under advice of counsel that they could acquire rights under the Mineral Laws. The measure of damages was held to be the market value of the oil, taken at the time it was used or disposed of by the defendants, less the cost of extracting and marketing the oil, excluding from such cost the work of sinking wells, development, or improvement, or in discovering or reaching the oil, and including the value of any permanent and useful improvements to the property made by defendants. See to the same effect, United States v. M'Cutchen (1916) 238 Fed. 575.

In Guffey v. Smith (1914) 237 U. S. 101, 59 L. ed. 856, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 526, a controversy arose between junior and senior lessees of oil lands. It appeared that the defendant, who was not entitled to the property, had produced oil therefrom, and the plaintiff brought an action for an accounting. It was held that the proper measure of damage was the value of the oil sold from the lands by the defendant, without any credit for such sums as he had expended in producing the same after he became a wilful trespasser, but with credit for such sums as had been expended by him while he was in ignorance of one of the facts making his lease invalid.

In Kahle v. Crown Oil Co. (1913) 180 Ind. 181, 100 N. E. 681, it appeared that the plaintiffs had obtained oil and gas leases on certain lands, and, after they had complied with the terms and conditions provided for in the leases, the lessors refused to abide by the terms of the leases, declared them terminated, and brought an action to declare them void and to quiet title to their lands. Judgment was rendered in favor of the lessors, and thereafter the defendants, with full knowledge of these leases and of the litigation concerning them, accepted oil and gas leases on the same land. After the defendants had taken actual possession of the real estate and had drilled wells thereon for oil and gas, the plaintiffs, within the time allowed by law, appealed from the judgment declaring their leases void, and the appellate court reversed the lower court and remanded the case for a new trial. A large quantity of oil was obtained from the land by the defendants during the pending of this appeal. It did not appear that the defendants had notice of the fact that the plaintiffs intended to appeal from the judgment. The court held that under these conditions the defendants were not wilful trespassers, and in ruling on the measure of damages said: "The general rule is that if the wrongful act is committed unintentionally, or by mistake, or in the honest belief that the party is acting within his legal rights, in estimating the damages the recovery must be limited to the value of the product taken, less what it costs to produce it."

In Dyke v. National Transit Co. (1897) 22 App. Div. 360, 49 N. Y. Supp. 180, it appeared that the defendants, being in possession of, and claiming in good faith to be the owners of, premises which were actually owned by the plaintiff, entered into a contract with a third party for the sinking of oil wells upon the premises. The third party having abandoned the contract, one of the defendants resumed operations thereunder, and the oil was delivered to the defendant, the National Transit Company, for transportation. Upon the trial of the action which was brought to recover the value of the petroleum so taken from the plaintiff's land, the court held that the defendants were not entitled to offset the expense of procuring the oil from the value of the oil after it was taken from the wells. On appeal, however, the true measure of damages was held to be the value of the oil as it lay in the earth. The court said: "The distinction is between a wilful trespasser and a mistaken one. The one knows he is wrong, and the other believes he is right. When the latter is shown to be wrong, if he makes full indemnity, justice can exact no more." See to the same effect, Turner v. Seep (1909) 167 Fed. 646, modified in other respects in (1910) 102 C. C. A. 368, 179 Fed. 74.

In Crawford v. Forest Oil Co. (1904) 208 Pa. 5, 57 Atl. 47, the defendant, a tenant under an oil lease executed by one having an estate for life, continued to take oil from the land after the death of the life tenant. In an action for trespass brought by the remainderman against the defendant, the measure of damages was held to be the value in the pipe lines, of the oil taken, less the expense of putting it there, including the labor and necessary improvements and repairs to the fixtures and appliances used in the conduction of the oil.

In Duffield v. Rosenzweig (1891) 144 Pa. 520, 23 Atl. 4, an action for trespass to land and damages for the removal of oil therefrom, Clark, J., said: "But, assuming that an action of trespass is a proper remedy, and that the defendant invaded the territory of the plaintiff's protection to put down wells, and took out oil to the amount of 8,253 barrels, as the testimony appears to show, what should be the measure of the plaintiff's recovery? He should not be permitted to recover the price of all this oil, for the defendant was, in any event, entitled to a royalty out of it; and it does not appear, nor can it in any satisfactory way be made to appear, that the plaintiff would have been able, by any means within his power, to produce the whole, or any definite or certain portion, of the oil, at the sites to which he was restricted."

Kier v. Peterson (1861) 41 Pa. 357, 8 Mor. Min. Rep. 499, was an action of trover for 50,000 gallons of petroleum, which were the unexpected product of certain salt wells which had been sunk by defendant on land leased to him by plaintiff for the purpose of manufacturing salt. The court held that the plaintiff had misconceived his action, the proper remedy being by a bill in equity for an accounting, and hence did not consider the question of value, in relation to which there was no contest. However, Woodward, J., concurring in the judgment on the sole ground that the plaintiff had misconceived his action, remarked that he thought the judge below correctly comprehended the measure of damages; that "the plaintiff was not entitled to the labor of defendant, but only to the value of the oil at the instant of separation from the freehold."

One who bores a well upon the land of another, extracting oil from the land, under the belief in good faith, and on reasonable grounds therefor, that he had a right to do so, is liable in damages for the value of the oil in the tanks, less the reasonable cost of extracting it. Gladys City Oil, Gas & Mfg. Co. v. Right of Way Oil Co. (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 137 S. W. 171, affirmed in (1913) 106 Tex. 94, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 268, 157 S. W. 737; Bender v. Brooks (1913) 103 Tex. 329, 127 S. W. 168, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 559.

Where one trespasses on the land of another, removing oil and converting it to his own use, if he commits the trespass unintentionally, or by mistake, or in the honest belief that he is acting within his legal rights, the measure of liability is the value of the property taken, less what it costs to produce it. Bryson v. Crown Oil Co. (1916) 185 Ind. 156, 112 N. E. 1.

In Campbell v. Smith (1913) 180 Ind. 159, 101 N. E. 89, it appeared that the plaintiff held oil and gas leases in certain lands, and the owner of the land, after giving the plaintiff notice that he intended to terminate the lease, brought suit to cancel the lease, and thereafter made leases covering the same land to other parties, who, without any objection by the plaintiff, removed oil from the land. The plaintiff thereupon brought suit against the landowner and the subsequent lessees. On appeal by the landowner, it was held that she was not a wilful trespasser, and therefore the cost of producing the oil should be deducted from its value at the surface, and, where the value of the oil was exceeded by such costs, the plaintiff could not recover.

Marble.

In Dougherty v. Chesnutt (1887) 86 Tenn. 1, 5 S. W. 444, it appeared that the defendant, under a mistaken claim of title, invaded the marble quarry of plaintiff, and removed therefrom stone which he sold. It was held that the plaintiff should recover the value of the marble taken and sold, as it lay at the quarry cut, dressed, and prepared for market, less the actual expense of thus cutting, dressing, and preparing it for market; but the actual expense should in no event exceed the usual and reasonable expense.

Coprolites.

In Atty. Gen. v. Tomline (1877) 46 L. J. Ch. N. S. (Eng.) 654, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 750, 36 L. T. N. S. 684, 25 Week. Rep. 802, it appeared that the lord of a manor entered without permission on the land of a copyhold tenant, which was in the occupation of a tenant, mining and removing from the land a quantity of coprolites. The copyhold tenant thereupon instituted a proceeding to obtain an injunction to restrain the defendant from continuing the trespass, and to obtain damages for the mineral removed. It was held that, although the property in the coprolites was in the lord, in the absence of custom he could not dig for them without permission of the tenant; and the proper measure of damages was held to be the gross amount produced by the sale of the coprolites, less the expense of working, and such a sum by way of profit as would have induced a stranger to undertake the working.

Phosphate.

In an action by the state against one who had unlawfully removed phosphates from the bed of a stream, acting under an honest but mistaken belief in his right to the phosphates, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the phosphates less the amount the defendant had added to their value by their removal and prep-

The wrongful taking of ore from the land of another, in the absence of all other evidence, raises a presumption of fact that the trespasser took it intentionally and wilfully. This presumption, however, is a disputable one, and the trespasser may overcome it, and may limit the recovery against him to the lower measure of damages, by proof presented on behalf of the owner or on his own behalf, that he took the ore unintentionally, in good faith, in the honest belief that he was lawfully exercising a right which he possessed. Resurrection Gold Min. Co. v. Fortune Gold Min. Co. (1904) 64 C. C. A. 180, 129 Fed. 668. See to the same effect, Central Coal & Coke Co. v. Penny (1909) 97 C. C. A. 600, 178 Fed. 340; United States v. Homestake Min. Co. (1902) 54 C. C. A. 303, 117 Fed. 481, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 365.

The mere taking and converting to one's own use of the property of another constitutes a trespass and raises a legal presumption that the taker intended to do what he did do, and is thereby an intentional trespasser. In that event, and in the absence of any further evidence, the owner of the property taken is entitled to a verdict fixed in amount by the higher measure of damages, based upon this legal presumption. The law, therefore, places the trespasser under the burden of overthrowing, by proof, this presumption. Liberty Bell Gold Min. Co. v. Smuggler-Union Min. Co. (1913) 122 C. C. A. 113, 203 Fed. 795, writ of certiorari denied in (1913) 231 U. S. 747, 58 L. ed. 464, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 320.

"One who acts in good faith, on the erroneous advice of reputable counsel on questions of legal right concerning which a layman could hardly have actual notice, is not chargeable with bad faith, or with a wilful intent to commit a wrongful act, because his counsel was mistaken in his view of the law." United States v. Homestake Min. Co. (Fed.) supra.

The foregoing passage is quoted with approval in United States v. Midway Northern Oil Co. (1916) 232 Fed. 619, in which it is also said that there is a marked difference between those who recklessly, or with actual intent to rob others, trespass upon their property, and those who, acting on the advice of counsel, trespass by mistake, with no evil purpose, but with an honest belief that they have a right to do so.

In a court of equity, at least, the imputation of being wilful trespassers will not be indulged in as against those who are shown to have acted in good faith in reliance on the advice of reputable counsel. United States v. M'Cutchen (1916) 288 Fed. 575.

The test to determine whether one is a wilful or an innocent trespasser is not his violation of the law in the light of the maxim that every man knows the law, but his honest belief and his actual intention at the time he committed the trespass; and neither a justification of the acts nor any other complete defense to them is essential to the proof that he who committed them was not a wilful trespasser. United States v. Homestake Min. Co. (Fed.) supra. See to the same effect Durant Min. Co. v. Percy Consol. Min. Co. (1899) 35 C. C. A. 252, 98 Fed. 166, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 27.

a. Rule in United States.

The American jurisdictions which have had occasion to pass on the question of the measure of damages against a trespasser who removes oil or other mineral from the land of another are virtually unanimous in holding that if the taking is reckless, wilful, or intentional, or without claim of right or title, the trespasser is liable for the enhanced value of the product when and where it is finally converted to the use of the trespasser, without any deduction for expenses incurred, or for any value he may have added to the mineral by his labor.

The measure of damages for the reckless, wilful, or intentional taking of ore from the land of another, without right, is the enhanced value of the ore when it is finally converted to the use of the trespasser, without allowance to him for the labor bestowed or expense incurred in removing it and preparing it for market. Silver King Coalition Mines Co. v. Silver King

Consol. Min. Co. (1913) 122 C. C. A. 402, 204 Fed. 166, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 571. See to the same effect, United States v. Homestake Min. Co. (1902) 54 C. C. A. 303, 117 Fed. 481; Resurrection Gold Min. Co. v. Fortune Gold Min. Co. (1904) 64 C. C. A. 180, 129 Fed. 668; Kahle v. Crown Oil Co. (Ind.) supra.

In Liberty Bell Min. Co. v. Smuggler-Union Min. Co. (1913) 122 C. C. A. 113, 203 Fed. 795, an instruction that if the ore was either recklessly, wilfully, or intentionally taken by the defendant company, then the measure of the plaintiff's damages would be the enhanced value of the ore when and where it was finally converted to the use of defendant, was held, on appeal, to be correct.

In Central Coal & Coke Co. v. Penny (1909) 97 C. C. A. 600, 173 Fed. 340, it appeared that the defendants purchased land claimed by plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs had been, for more than twenty years, in the notorious, uninterrupted, exclusive adverse possession of this land, on which they had maintained a church and cemetery. It further appeared that in the deed under which defendants claimed, there was an exception of the land on which plaintiffs' church was standing. The defendants, on being advised by counsel that the exception was void, and that plaintiffs had no right or title to the land except permission to use the surface for their church and burying ground, mined and removed coal from under this land. The court held that, in view of the notorious possession of the land by the plaintiffs, of the church and graveyard thereon in plain view from the defendants' shaft, of the warning exception in the deeds, and of the fact that defendants refrained from inquiring of plaintiffs what their claims to the land and the coal in question were, there was substantial evidence that the defendants took and converted the coal with a reckless disregard of the rights of plaintiffs, and, if the jury so found, the measure of damages should be the enhanced value of the coal at the mouth of the shaft, or where it was finally converted to the use of the defendant.

In Sweeney v. Hanley (1903) 61 C. C. A. 153, 126 Fed. 97, a cotenant who had first fraudulently obtained from his fellow tenant conveyance of his share of the common property, and thereafter had extracted the mineral from it, was denied an allowance for his labor and expense. The court held that the complainant was entitled to the enhanced value of his share of the mineral extracted and sold by the defendant while the complainant was fraudulently dispossessed by him, without any deduction or allowance for the labor and expense of mining and marketing.

In Durant Min. Co. v. Percy Consol. Min. Co. (1899) 35 C. C. A. 252, 93 Fed. 166, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 27, it appeared that the plaintiff and defendant were the owners of adjoining mining claims. The defendant, in working its mine, removed some ore from a stope many hundred feet beneath the surface of the earth, which proved to be on the line between the two claims, so that about 43 per cent of the ore taken from it was on the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff thereupon brought suit for damages for the conversion of the ore. It was held that, as there was evidence tending to show that the trespass was wilful as well as evidence which tended to show that it was unintentional, an instruction that if defendant had been negligent in failing to discover the location of his property he was estopped to say that the taking was not wilful or intentional was erroneous. It was further held that if the jury should find that the trespass was wilful and intentional the measure of damages would be the full value of the property taken, at the time of the conversion, without any deduction for the labor bestowed or expense incurred in removing and preparing it for the market.

Benson Min. & Smelting Co. v. Alta Min. & Smelting Co. (1892) 145 U. S. 428, 36 L. ed. 762, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877, 17 Mor. Min. Rep. 488, the defendant contended that it should be credited with the cost of mining the ores. The court, however, affirmed the holding of the supreme court of Arizona, and held that the defendant was not entitled to this credit, since it received and converted the ores with knowledge that they belonged to the plaintiff.

In Cheney v. Nebraska & C. Stone Co. (1890) 41 Fed. 740, it appeared that plaintiff and defendant were the owners of adjoining lands. A stone quarry was opened by defendant immediately east of the boundary line, and on ground which afterwards proved to be the plaintiff's. Doubts having arisen as to whether the quarry was on plaintiff's or defendant's land, a survey was made with the knowledge and assent of both parties, and it was then ascertained that the greater part of the quarry was on plaintiff's land. Action was then brought to recover the value of the stone taken from the quarry by defendant after the true line between the tracts owned by the parties had been surveyed. It was held that, as the trespass was wilful, an instruction that the defendant was liable in damage for the value of the stone after it was detached from the land, and had become personalty, was correct.

In Alta Min. & Smelting Co. v. Benson Min. & Smelting Co. (1888) 2 Ariz. 362, 16 Pac. 565, action for conversion was brought against the defendant, who had purchased ore obtained from the plaintiff's mine by trespassers. The lower court found that the trespasses were with knowledge of plaintiff's ownership of the mine, and that the defendant, at the time it received said ore, had knowledge that it came from plaintiff's mine and that it was the property of plaintiff. It was held that the measure of damages was the value of the ore when broken down at the mine, allowing nothing for the labor expended in mining.

In Lightner Min. Co. v. Lane (1911) 161 Cal. 689, 120 Pac. 777, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1093, it was held that a mine owner who, through the underground openings in his mine, secretly, knowingly, and wilfully removed ore from the vein of an adjoining proprietor, was guilty of fraud, and was chargeable with the value of the mineral after reduction, without any allowance for expenses of mining and milling.

One who wilfully and intentionally takes oil from the land of another must respond in damages for the full value of the oil taken, at the time of conversion, without any deduction for the labor bestowed or expense incurred in removing and preparing it for the market. Bryson v. Crown Oil Co. (1916) 185 Ind. 156, 112 N. E. 1.

In American Sand & Gravel Co. v. Spencer (1913) 55 Ind. App. 523, 103 N. E. 426, the plaintiff brought an action in the nature of trespass de bonis asportatis against the defendant, who, it was alleged, entered on the land of plaintiff without his consent, with knowledge at the time that the land belonged to plaintiff, and removed therefrom sand and appropriated it to its own use. The defendant knew that it was taking the same from the plaintiff's land, but claimed that it believed that it had a right to do so. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding of wilful and intentional trespass, and defendant should be held accountable for the value of the sand secured or removed at the time and place of conversion, or the highest market price of such substance at any time between the severance and conversion, deducting nothing on account of labor and expense.

Sunnyside Coal & Coke Co. v. Reitz (1895) 14 Ind. App. 478, 39 N. E. 541, 43 N. E. 46, was an action for trespass in mining and removing coal from land of the plaintiff, the plaintiff seeking to recover the value of the coal. It was held that, as the evidence showed that the trespass was committed knowingly and intentionally, the measure of damages should be the value of the coal converted at the place where it lay after it had been mined, allowing nothing to the defendant for severing the coal or removing it.

Chesnutt (1887) 86 Tenn. 1, 5 S. W. 444.

In Patchen v. Keeley (1887) 19 Nev. 404, 14 Pac. 347, an action of trespass against defendants for mining and removing ore from plaintiff's mine, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover nominal damages in any event, and whether the defendants could demand a deduction of reasonable marketing expenses would depend upon the facts that should have been left to and decided by the jury. If the jury found that defendants were wilful trespassers, no deductions were allowable for working expenses, but in that case the plaintiff was entitled to the enhanced value of the property taken.

In Baker v. Hart (1889) 52 Hun, 363, 5 N. Y. Supp. 345, it appeared that the plaintiffs were lessees of certain lands, under a lease which gave them the exclusive right to the devised premises, and the sole and exclusive right to quarry and remove stone therefrom during a term of years. The defendants were lessees of an adjoining lot from the same lessor, and they entered upon the quarry of the plaintiffs and took out a quantity of stone, cutting it and taking it to New York. This action was brought for the value of the stone so taken. The defendants insisted that the plaintiffs could only recover the value of the stone in the quarry, but it was held that the plaintiffs could recover the value of the stone after it was cut by defendants and transported to the place of destination.

In Kelvin Lumber & Supply Co. v. Copper State Min. Co. (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 203 S. W. 68, it appeared that two of the defendants entered on the mining claim of the plaintiff, extracting and removing ore therefrom, which was sold to the defendant lumber company, the trespass having been committed in an attempt to relocate a mining claim. Although it did not appear whether the defendants were wilful trespassers, it was held that they were not entitled to recover expenses incurred in taking out the ore.

It is the prevailing rule in England and Canada that where a trespasser mines and removes minerals from the land of another, and the trespass is wilful, or fraudulent, or discloses a sinister intention on the part of the defendant, the cost of severance is not allowed, but the defendant may obtain an allowance for expenses incurred in bringing the mineral to bank. Yukon Gold Co. v. Boyle Concessions (1914) — Yukon, —, 19 D. L. R. 386; Lamb v. Kincaid (1907) 38 Can. S. C. 516, 8 Ann. Cas. 36; Trotter v. Maclean (1879) L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 574, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 256, 42 L. T. N. S. 118, 28 Week. Rep. 244, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 263; Phillips v. Homfray (1871) L. R. 6 Ch. 770, 14 Mor. Min. Rep. 677; Llynvi Coal & I. Co. v. Brogden (1870) L. R. 11 Eq. 188, 40 L. J. Ch. N. S. 46, 23 L. T. N. S. 518, 19 Week. Rep. 196; Ecclesiastical Comrs. v. North Eastern R. Co. (1877) L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 845, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 20, 36 L. T. N. S. 174, 12 Mor. Min. Rep. 609; Joicey v. Dickinson (1882) 45 L. T. N. S. 643.

In Lamb v. Kincaid (1907) 38 Can. S. C. 516, 8 Ann. Cas. 36, the plaintiff and defendants were owners of adjoining mining claims. A dispute arose as to the boundary line, and the matter was referred to the gold commissioner, who gave a judgment favorable to the defendants in this action. While an appeal from this judgment was pending, the defendants, with the knowledge of the plaintiffs, entered upon the location and removed a quantity of gold-bearing earth from the disputed and undisputed portions of the location, intermixing the products without keeping any account of the quantity taken, and appropriated the gold recovered. It was held that as the evidence disclosed a sinister intention on the part of defendants, and a deliberate blending of the materials by them, the trespass should be considered wilful, and in consequence they were liable in damage for the total value of so much of the intermixed products as was not strictly proved to have come from the undisputed portion of the location, with no allowance for the necessary cost of working and mining the gold.

In Yukon Gold Co. v. Boyle Concessions, supra, the court followed the rule of law laid down in Lamb v. Kincaid, supra, and held that the defendant, who wilfully trespassed on a mining claim, removing minerals therefrom, could obtain no allowance for the working cost of dredging.

Where a mine owner worked an adjoining mine, believing he was to obtain a contract entitling him to do so, and during his working of the mine was notified that no contract would be made, his working of the mine after this notification should be treated as fraudulent, and in an action for damages for the trespass he should be allowed only the cost of bringing the minerals to the bank. Trotter v. Maclean (1879) L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 574, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 256, 42 L. T. N. S. 118, 28 Week. Rep. 244, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 677.

In Phillips v. Homfray (1871) L. R. 6 Ch. 770, 14 Mor. Min. Rep. 677, the owners of a colliery entered into a contract with an adjoining landowner for the purchase of his land, without disclosing the fact, of which he was ignorant, that they had, without authority, gotten a quantity of coal from under it. Action was brought by the owners of the colliery to enforce the contract, and the landowner also brought suit to recover for the value of the ore converted. It was held that the landowner was entitled to the value of the coal mined on his land, with an allowance for raising, but none for mining, the coal.

In Llynvi Coal & I. Co. v. Brogden (1870) L. R. 11 Eq. 188, 40 L. J. Ch. N. S. 46, 23 L. T. N. S. 518, 19 Week. Rep. 196, a bill in equity was filed stating that the defendants were owners of a mine adjoining a mine of the plaintiffs, and that the defendants, in working that portion of the seam which lay beneath their mine, had extended their workings so as to pass the boundary line of their property, and encroached upon the plaintiffs' portion of the seam, mining and raising coal belonging to the plaintiffs. The bill prayed for an account of all coal worked by the defendants from under the plaintiffs' mine, and of the value of such coal. It was held that the defendants were liable to account for the value of the coal at the pit's mouth, with just allowance for the cost of raising, but not of getting or severing the coal. This rule was applied on the theory that the defendant had acted in a manner wholly unauthorized and unlawful. See to the same effect, Ecclesiastical Comrs. v. North Eastern R. Co. (1877) L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 845, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 20, 36 L. T. N. S. 174, 12 Mor. Min. Rep. 609.

In a few cases in England and Canada a wilful or fraudulent trespasser who mines and removes minerals from the land of another has been held not entitled to a deduction for the expense either of severing the mineral or of bringing it to bank. Olsen v. Desjarlais (1910) 15 West. L. Rep. 72; Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Co. (1880) L. R. 5 App. Cas. 25, 42 L. T. N. S. 334, 28 Week. Rep. 367, 44 J. P. 392, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 291; Bulli Coal Min. Co. v. Osborne [1899] A. C. 351, 68 L. J. P. C. N. S. 49, 47 Week. Rep. 545, 80 L. T. N. S. 430, 15 Times L. R. 257.

In Olsen v. Desjarlais, supra, the plaintiff, defendant, and a third person, who were the owners of adjoining placer mining claims, entered into a partnership agreement for the purpose of doing the necessary representation work on the three claims. It was provided in the agreement that the work to be performed on any of the claims should be limited to the representation work required by the Placer Mining Act. Under this agreement the defendant performed sufficient work on his own location to comply with the mining regulations for the renewal of all three claims. Thereafter, the defendant, believing that his location was worked out, commenced operations on the plaintiff's claim, taking out a quantity of pay dirt. It was held that, although the defendant had a right to enter on the plaintiff's claim, he became a trespasser the moment he continued the working of the claim after a sufficient amount of work had been done for the necessary representation of the true claimant; and, as it was disclosed by the evidence that he did so continue, he became a wilful trespasser, and was liable in damages for the full value of the gold recovered, without any deduction for the expenses incurred in recovering it.

In Bulli Coal Min. Co. v. Osborne, supra, the defendant had for a number of years taken coal from the plaintiff's land by means of secret underground passages, and under circumstances which made the trespass fraudulent. It was held that the defendant was liable for the market value of the coal at the mouth of the pit, without any allowance for the cost of working and raising.

In Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Co. (1880) L. R. 5 App. Cas. 25, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 291, the court, by Lord Hatcherley, in ruling on the measure of damages in a case of wilful trespass to mining land, said: "There is no doubt that if a man furtively and in bad faith robs his neighbor of property, and, because it is underground, is probably not for some time detected, the court of equity in this country will struggle, or I would rather say, will assert its authority, to punish fraud by fixing the person with the value of the whole of the property which he has so furtively taken, and making him no allowance in respect of what he has done."

III. Rule in Alabama and Colorado.

In Alabama and Colorado, the common-law distinguishing characteristics of the actions of trespass, trover, and detinue are fully maintained, and the principles governing the rules for measuring damages appropriate to the particular form of action pursued, are strictly applied in these states. It has been held that where a trespasser mines and removes mineral from the land of another, and is sued in an action of trover, the measure of damages is the value of the ore when it becomes a chattel, allowing no credit for the value of defendant's labor in effecting the severance; and it seems that the character of entry, as wilful or unintentional, is not taken into consideration. Ivy Coal & Coke Co. v. Alabama Coal & Coke Co. (1902) 135 Ala. 579, 98 Am. St. Rep. 46, 33 So. 547; Warrior Coal & Coke Co. v. Mabel Min. Co. (1896) 112 Ala. 624, 20 So. 918; Omaha & G. Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Tabor (1889) 13 Colo. 41, 5 L.R.A. 236, 16 Am. St. Rep. 185, 21 Pac. 925, 16 Mor. Min. Rep. 184.

If the action is one in trover or detinue or trespass de bonis asportatis, for the conversion, detention, or taking of ore, the ore should be treated as a chattel and valued accordingly. Dictum in Warrior Coal & Coke Co. v. Mabel Min. Co. (1896) 112 Ala. 624, 20 So. 918.

In Ivy Coal & Coke Co. v. Alabama Coal & Coke Co. supra, an action of trover was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for the mining and conversion by the latter of coal on or out of the land of the plaintiff. It appeared that the acts of the defendant were neither wilful nor intentional, but were done inadvertently, under the mistaken belief that the land trespassed on belonged to it. The measure of damages was held to be the value of the coal as it lay in the mine when and after it had been severed from the realty, allowing no credit for the value of defendant's labor in effecting the severance; and not the value of the coal in and as a part of the realty.

In Omaha & G. Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Tabor, supra, the defendant, who purchased ore from one who obtained the ore by trespassing on the plaintiff's mine, was sued in trover. The court held the defendant liable, and held the measure of damages to be the value of the ore sold, less the reasonable and proper cost of raising it from the mine after it was broken, and hauling from the mine to the defendant's place of business. The character of entry, it was held, whether wilful and malicious, or in good faith, through inadvertence, or mistake, could not be considered.

Where the action is in trespass, the measure of damages for an innocent trespass is the same as that obtaining in the majority of jurisdictions and set forth infra, in subdivision I. a.

Warrior Coal & Coke Co. v. Mabel Min. Co. (1896) 112 Ala. 624, 20 So. 918; St. Clair v. Cash Gold Min. & Mill Co. (1897) 9 Colo. App. 235, 47 Pac. 466, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 523; Little Pittsburgh Consol. Min. Co. v. Little Chief Consol. Min. Co. (1888) 11 Colo. 223, 7 Am. St. Rep. 226, 17 Pac. 760, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 655; Montrozona Gold Min. Co. v. Thatcher (1904) 19 Colo. App. 371, 75 Pac. 595; United Coal Co. v. Canon City Coal Co. (1897) 24 Colo. 116, 48 Pac. 1045, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 639; Liberty Bell Min. Co. v. Moorhead Min. & Mill. Co. (1914) 58 Colo. 308, 145 Pac. 686.

Warrior Coal & Coke Co. v. Mabel Min. Co. supra, was an action for trespass to coal lands. It appeared that the defendant, in working its own mine, inadvertently encroached upon the coal embedded in the adjoining land of the plaintiff, and severed and carried away therefrom a large quantity of plaintiff's coal. It was held that the measure of damages was the value of the coal as a part of the realty, and not as a chattel after its removal.

In a case of innocent trespass by mining and milling metalliferous ores, where the trespasser sells the finished product and applies the proceeds to his own use, the owner should be reimbursed for his actual loss, and his damages are compensatory only. The measure of damages is the gross value of the ore in place before it was disturbed, not the net product or gross proceeds. The damages may be ascertained by deducting from the enhanced value or gross proceeds the cost of making the product at the time of conversion. Liberty Bell Min. Co. v. Moorhead Min. & Mill. Co. (1914) supra.

In Montrozona Gold Min. Co. v. Thatcher (1904) 19 Colo. App. 371, 75 Pac. 595, the defendant leased a mine from the plaintiff, obligating himself to sink a shaft a certain depth on or before a certain date, under penalty of forfeiture of the lease. The defendant failed to complete the shaft within the time specified, but continued to mine the property, claiming that, as he had substantially complied with the contract by completing the shaft a few days after the expiration of the time limit, the lease was not forfeited. The court held, however, that the lease was forfeited, but that the lessee was not a wilful trespasser, and, in ruling on the measure of damages, said: "Under the facts as disclosed by this record, appellants cannot be considered wilful trespassers within the ordinary legal acceptance of that term, and therefore should be allowed, upon an accounting, the cost of mining, tramping, and hoisting the ore to the surface."

Where the defendants trespassed on the mine of the plaintiffs, mining and removing coal therefrom, if the trespass was innocent in character, the rule of damages is, in an action of trespass, the value of the ore at the time of conversion, less the amount which the defendants by their labor had added to that value. United Coal Co. v. Canon City Coal Co. (1897) 24 Colo. 116, 48 Pac. 1045, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 639.

The measure of damages for an innocent trespass by taking ore from another's mining claim is the value of the ore as it was in the mine, and the defendants can limit the recovery, first, by the value of what is taken; second, by the cost of mining and extracting, tramping and hoisting to the surface, or delivering it at the pit's mouth. This is the value of the ore to the plaintiff, who would be compelled to stand these expenses if he had mined the ore himself. The cost of reduction also is usually a legitimate item of deduction. St. Clair v. Cash Gold Min. & Mill. Co. (1897) 9 Colo. App. 285, 47 Pac. 466, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 523. See to the same effect, Little Pittsburg Consol. Min. Co. v. Little Chief Consol. Min. Co. (1888) 11 Colo. 223, 7 Am. St. Rep. 226, 17 Pac. 760, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 655.

Likewise several Colorado cases have laid down, in actions for trespass, the same rule as to wilful trespass as prevails in the majority of American jurisdictions. St. Clair v. Cash Gold Min. & Mill. Co. (1897) 9 Colo. App. 235, 47 Pac. 466, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 523; Little Pittsburg Con- sol. Min. Co. v. Little Chief Consol. Min. Co. (1888) 11 Colo. 223, 7 Am. St. Rep. 226, 17 Pac. 760, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 655; United Coal Co. v. Canon City Coal Co. (1897) 24 Colo. 116, 48 Pac. 1045, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 639; Liberty Bell Min. & Mill. Co. v. Moorhead Min. & Mill. Co. (1914) 58 Colo. 308, 145 Pac. 686.

In Liberty Bell Min. & Mill. Co. v. Moorhead Min. & Mill. Co. supra, action for trespass was brought against the defendant, who, in working its own mine, drove beneath the surface of plaintiff's mining location underground workings into plaintiff's territory, mining and removing ore therefrom. The question arose as to the measure of damages in instances of wilful trespass, the court holding that "in case of wilful trespass upon metalliferous veins, where the trespasser has mined, milled, and sold a finished product, the conversion takes place when he applies the proceeds to his own use, and the measure of damages is the enhanced value or gross proceeds realized from the ore, without deductions on account of any value the trespasser may have bestowed upon the ore by his labor."

In United Coal Co. v. Canon City Coal Co. (1897) 24 Colo. 116, 48 Pac. 1045, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 639, action was brought against the defendants for wrongfully trespassing upon the plaintiff's land, mining and removing coal therefrom. The lower court found that the trespass committed by defendants was committed in a wilful and grossly and culpably negligent manner. It was held on appeal that the court was amply justified in finding that the trespass was wilful, and, in ruling on the measure of damages, the court said: "The defendants being wilful trespassers, it was proper to allow the full value of the coal mined, without deduction for their labor and expense in mining the same, the rule of damages being the value of the ore at the time and place it is severed from the realty."

Where the defendants trespassed on the mine of plaintiff, taking out ore, not as the result of an honest mistake or an honest intention, but under circumstances which showed that they had knowledge of the situation, or where the circumstances were such as to legally charge them with this knowledge, they are entitled to no deduction, and they may not reduce the amount of recovery by proving the cost of mining. Having been guilty of a wilful trespass, they can reap no benefit from their own wrong, and must pay the value of the ore, without credit for the labor incident to its extraction. St. Clair v. Cash Gold Min. & Mill. Co. (1897) 9 Colo. App. 235, 47 Pac. 466, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 523. See to the same effect Little Pittsburg Consol. Min. Co. v. Little Chief Consol. Min. Co. (1888) 11 Colo. 223, 7 Am. St. Rep. 226, 17 Pac. 760, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 655.

IV. Rule in Illinois.

In Illinois, the measure of damages in the case of a trespasser who wrongfully mines and removes mineral from the lands of another is held to be the value of the article converted at the time it becomes a chattel, or, if removed to the mouth of the pit, its value at such place less the cost of conveying it there. In no instance is the trespasser allowed credit for the expenses incurred and labor bestowed in mining or producing the product. This rule applies although the trespass may have been inadvertent, and the rule is the same in both trespass and trover, the only variation being when circumstances of aggravation are relied on in trespass, in which case punitive damages may be recovered. Thomas Pressed Brick Co. v. Hexter (1895) 60 Ill. App. 58; Smoot v. Consolidated Coal Co. (1904) 114 Ill. App. 512; Perrine v. Chicago & H. Coal Co. (1912) 173 Ill. App. 287; Donovan v. Consolidated Coal Co. (1900) 187 Ill. 28, 79 Am. St. Rep. 206, 58 N. E. 290, 21 Mor. Min. Rep. 91, affirming (1900) 88 Ill. App. 589; McGuire v. Boyd Coal & Coke Co. (1908) 236 Ill. 69, 86 N. E. 174; Robertson v. Jones (1874) 71 Ill. 405, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 190; McLean County Coal Co. v. Long (1876) 81 Ill. 359, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 198; Illinois & St. L. R. Co. v. Ogle (1876) 82 Ill. 627, 25 Am. Rep.

842, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 198; McLean County Coal Co. v. Lennon (1879) 91 Ill. 561, 33 Am. Rep. 64, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 277; Illinois & St. L. R. Co. v. Ogle (1879) 92 Ill. 358, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 282.

Perrine v. Chicago & H. Coal Co. (1912) 173 Ill. App. 287, was an action in trespass wherein it appeared that the defendant, in working its coal mine, inadvertently dug and removed coal from the land of plaintiff, due to a mistaken view of the boundary line. The measure of damages was held to be the value of the coal immediately after it was severed from the land, allowing no deduction for the cost of severance.

In McGuire v. Boyd Coal & Coke Co. (1908) 236 Ill. 69, 86 N. E. 174, a proceeding was instituted to enjoin defendants from removing coal from land in which the complainant held the mineral rights, and to recover damages for coal previously removed. One defendant, it appeared, owned the coal under the land adjoining that in which the complainant owned the mineral rights, which he leased to his co-defendant, the Boyd Coal & Coke Company. The company, under his express direction, knowingly and intentionally went over the line and mined and removed complainant's coal. The measure of damages was held to be the value of the coal at the mouth of the pit, less the cost of conveying it there from the place where mined. The defendant was held not to be entitled to anything for the general expense of mining. The only deduction allowed from the value of the coal at the mouth of the pit was the expenses for loading and hauling the coal to the foot of the shaft, and of hoisting and dumping it into the car at the top.

In Smoot v. Consolidated Coal Co. (1904) 114 Ill. App. 512, it appeared that the plaintiff in 1898 conveyed to the defendant the coal rights in a certain parcel of land. The veins of coal carried in considerable quantities a mineral known as "sulphur rocks" or "iron pyrites," which in the usual course of mining for coal was severed from the soil, and, being of no value, was treated as waste. However, about the year 1901, an invention having opened a market for this hitherto waste material in the manufacture of acids, the defendant, in the operation of the mine on plaintiff's land, saved and sold a large quantity of this mineral. It was held that the defendant was guilty of conversion, and the measure of damages was held to be the value of the iron pyrites at the mouth of the pit, less the cost of digging it and the cost of separating it from the merchantable coal. The court, in fixing the measure of damages, reviewed the holdings in Donovan v. Consolidated Coal Co. (1900) 187 Ill. 28, 79 Am. St. Rep. 206, 58 N. E. 290, 21 Mor. Min. Rep. 91, affirming (1900) 88 Ill. App. 589, supra, and McLean County Coal Co. v. Long (1876) 81 Ill. 359, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 193, supra, and, while adhering to the rule laid down in those cases, distinguished the case in hand, Bonne, J., saying: "The removal by appellee of the iron pyrites in question, from its place of deposit in the coal vein, is not attributable to negligence or inadvertence, but to a right, incident to its right by grant under the deed, to remove the coal. It is undisputed that appellee must, of necessity, remove the iron pyrites in availing itself of its right under the deed to remove the coal."

In Donovan v. Consolidated Coal Co. supra, it appeared that the defendant owned a tract of land in which was a coal mine, and also owned the surface of an adjoining tract, in which tract the plaintiff owned the coal rights. The defendant entered into a contract with a mining company by which he leased to them for a term of years his mine, and also granted to them the right to mine and remove the coal underlying the first tract, as well as the coal of plaintiff to which he did not have or claim any title, the mining company agreeing to pay the defendant a certain price per ton for all the coal so mined. The mining company, through its agent, removed coal from the tract in which the plaintiff had the coal rights, and paid the defendant therefor the price per ton specified in his contract. The court held that, as the defendant authorized and directed the trespass, he was liable to the plaintiff, and held the measure of damages to be the full value of the coal at the mouth of the pit, less the cost of transporting it thither and, if it was loaded on railroad cars, the expense incident thereto, but no allowance should be made for digging.

In Thomas Pressed Brick Co. v. Herter, supra, it appeared that the plaintiff and defendant owned adjoining tracts of coal-bearing lands, and that the defendant company operated a mine on its land and in its operations extended the mine into, and removed coal from, the land of plaintiff. Action for trespass was brought by plaintiff to recover damages for the coal taken. In fixing the amount of damages recoverable, the court said: "The measure of appellee's right of recovery or damages is the value of the coal at the mouth of the pit or mine, less the cost of conveying it there from the place where dug or mined, allowing nothing for digging or the labor of separating stone, sulphur, slate, earth, or other substances from it. Nothing is to be allowed the appellant company for the mining, or any other acts necessary to the production of the coal as an article of commerce."

In McLean County Coal Co. v. Long (1876) 81 Ill. 359, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 193, action in trover was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant coal company to recover damages for the conversion of a quantity of coal taken from the land of plaintiff. There was no controversy about the fact of taking and converting the coal, the only question being as to the measure of damages. It was held that the same rule prevailed in trespass for breaking and entering a coal mine and carrying away coal, and trover for the coal, except when circumstances of aggravation are relied on in trespass. This rule is the value of the coal at the moment it was severed by the defendant and thrown into the run. The defendant cannot be reimbursed for the expense and trouble of mining it, but he can be allowed the expense necessary to carry it to the mouth of the pit, as any person purchasing the coal in the pit would have deducted from the price the cost of bringing it to the pit's mouth. See to the same effect, McLean County Coal Co. v. Lennon (1879) 91 Ill. 561, 33 Am. Rep. 64, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 277.

Robertson v. Jones (1874) 71 Ill. 405, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 190, was an action for trespass, brought by plaintiff against defendant to recover damages for coal taken from the mine of plaintiff. It was held that the plaintiff could recover the value of the coal after it was dug in the bank, or he could recover its value at the mouth of the pit, less the cost of conveying it after it was dug to the mouth of the pit, and was not limited to the value of the coal taken as it lay in the ground, and the defendant should be allowed nothing for digging. See to the same effect, Illinois & St. L. R. Co. v. Ogle (1876) 82 Ill. 627, 25 Am. Rep. 342, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 198; Illinois & St. L. R. Co. v. Ogle (1879) 92 Ill. 353, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 282.

V. Rule in Maryland.

In Maryland, prior to 1894, the cases uniformly held the measure of damages in cases where one trespassed on land and mined and removed mineral therefrom, to be the value of the mineral after it was severed from its native land without allowance for expenses incurred in severing; and the measure of the value was generally deemed to be the price of the coal after it arrived at the mouth of the pit, allowing a deduction for the cost of conveying it there. This rule was applied irrespective of whether the trespass was inadvertent or under a bona fide claim of title, or was committed negligently, the only variation of the rule being when circumstances of aggravation were relied on, in which case punitive damages could be recovered. Atlantic & G. C. Consol. Coal Co. v. Maryland Coal Co. (1884) 62 Md. 135; Blaen Avon Coal Co. v. McCulloch (1882) 59 Md. 403, 43 Am. Rep. 560; Franklin Coal Co. v. McMillan (1878) 49 Md. 549, 33 Am. Rep. 280, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 224; Barton Coal Co. v. Cox (1873) 39 Md. 1, 17 Am. Rep. 525, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 157.

However, by a statute since enacted (Pub. Civ. Laws, § 92, art. 75), it is provided that "in the absence of fraud, negligence, or wilful trespass the measure of damages for the wrongful working and abstracting of another's minerals is the value of the minerals in their native state, before severance, to the person from whose property they were taken at the time of the taking." And the same statute further provides that "if one furtively or in bad faith works and abstracts minerals from the land of another, the party so offending may be charged with the whole value of the minerals taken, and allowed no deduction in respect of his labor and expenses in getting them." Under that act the rule as enunciated in the latest reported case dealing with the question, is in accord with the general rule as heretofore stated. Mt. Savage George's Creek Coal Co. v. Monahan (1918) 132 Md. 654, 104 Atl. 480.

In that case a bill in equity was filed to restrain the defendant from trespassing on the plaintiff's land and mining and carrying away coal, and for damages for coal removed. The court, after quoting sections of the statute referred to above, recognized the fact that the rule, as laid down in former cases where the trespass was inadvertent, or under a claim of right or title, had been changed by this statute so as to make the trespasser in such cases liable only for the value of the coal as it lay in the bed before being mined, but held, however, that there was ample evidence to show negligence of a very decided character, and the measure of damages, therefore, should be the value of the coal after severance, allowing the defendant nothing for expenses in effecting the severance.

VI. Rule in South Dakota.

By a statute in South Dakota it is provided that the detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest from that date, or, where the action has been prosecuted with reasonable diligence, the highest market value of the property at any time between the conversion and the verdict, without interest, at the option of the injured party.

In Golden Reward Min. Co. v. Buxton Min. Co. (1899) 38 C. C. A. 228, 97 Fed. 413, the plaintiff brought an action in trespass against the defendant to recover damages for a wrongful entry upon its mine, situated in South Dakota, and for the removal therefrom and conversion to its own use of a large amount of gold and silver bearing ore. It was held that since the wrong complained of, for which compensation was demanded, was the unlawful conversion of the mineral-bearing ores after they had been broken down and converted into personalty, the action, therefore, was in its essence a suit for the wrongful conversion of personal property, notwithstanding the fact that the complaint also charged a trespass on real property; and the statute was held to be applicable, since the action had been prosecuted with reasonable diligence. In this connection the court said: "We can conceive no sufficient reason why the form of the action should deprive a plaintiff of the benefit of the rule, when, as in the present instance, it transpires that the action is essentially one for the wrongful conversion of personal property, and when no other kind of damage is recovered."

v.

CITIZENS' NATIONAL BANK of Ft. Scott, Kansas.

Kansas Supreme Court — November 8, 1919.

(105 Kan. 434, 185 Pac. 1.)

Limitation of actions — bar against trustee — effect on beneficiaries.

A testatrix devised and bequeathed property to a trustee for the benefit of her grandchildren. The beneficiaries were minors, and were not to receive the trust estate until they reached the age of twenty-five years. Until that time the trustee was vested with title and with full power and discretion respecting management and disposition of the trust property. A portion of the property consisted of bank stock, which the trustee disposed of to the defendant, under such circumstances as to constitute a breach of trust, in which the defendant knowingly participated. Afterwards the trustee resigned, and another trustee was appointed, who became vested with the same title and authority as her predecessor. She suffered her right of action to recover the bank stock, or its proceeds or value, from the defendant, to become barred by the Statute of Limitations. Held, subsequent action by the beneficiaries, after they became of age, against the bank for the same relief, was barred.

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was one for relief by beneficiaries of a trust, regarding bank stock belonging to the trust estate which the trustee disposed of to the defendant. The plaintiffs were defeated, and appeal.

The will of Nellie D. Stadden devised and bequeathed one third of her estate to her son, Leo I. Stadden, one third to her daughter, Lillian M. Prager, and one third to Leo I. Stadden as trustee for the testatrix's grandchildren, the plaintiffs, who were children of a deceased daughter, Nellie Stadden Hart. The beneficiaries were minors, and were not to receive the trust estate until they arrived at the age of twenty-five years. Until that time, the trustee was vested with title, and with power and discretion over management and disposition of the estate, as complete and absolute as language could express. The following clause of the will related specifically to property of the kind in controversy. "My said trustee is also empowered to continue to hold any and all stocks coming into his power as trustee and receive the dividends therefrom, or to sell the same and loan or invest the proceeds from such sale as to him may seem best and proper."

The trustee duly qualified, and entered upon administration of the trust.

The husband of the testatrix was a wholesale grocer. After his death the business was incorporated as the I. Stadden Grocery Company, the entire capital stock of which was subscribed by the testatrix and her children, Leo Stadden and Lillian Prager. The testatrix used the grocery company very much as other people use a bank, for the purpose of depositing and withdrawing funds. A part of the assets of the trust estate consisted of a share of a large credit which she had on the books of the grocery company at the time of her death,—and it may be said that the grocery company was considered to be as sound financially as the defendant bank itself. A part of the personal property disposed of by the will consisted of shares of stock of the grocery company and shares of the capital stock of the defendant bank. By virtue of a division of property between the legatees named in the will, shares of grocery company stock and shares of bank stock were set off to the trust estate, and, on application of the trustee, the defendant issued a certificate for twenty shares of its capital stock to "Leo I. Stadden, trustee."

The grocery company was indebted to the bank. The president of the bank desired the indebtedness reduced, and in order to do so, in February or March, 1902, Leo I. Stadden, trustee, indorsed in blank and delivered to the bank the certificate which had been issued to him, at its par value of $100 per share. The bank gave the grocery company credit on its indebtedness, and the trustee's account with the grocery company was given proper credit. The bank continued to own the stock until July or August, 1904, when it was disposed of to purchasers for value, and, assuming the present action to be well grounded, it was not possible for the plaintiffs to recover the identical shares. Some of the facts just stated are disputed; but, for the purpose of the decision, the plaintiffs' version of what occurred is accepted. It is also assumed, as the plaintiffs contend, that the bank knew the fiduciary capacity and relation in which Leo I. Stadden held the certificate.

Leo I. Stadden resigned as trustee in May, 1902, and his sister, Lillian M. Prager, was duly appointed in his stead. She qualified as trustee, and became vested with full title to the trust estate, and vested with all power and discretion over it conferred by the will. Because the bank stock had been disposed of by her predecessor, it did not come into her possession; but there did come into her possession as part of the trust estate a large credit to the account of the trustee on the books of the grocery company, composed in part of the proceeds of the sale of the bank stock. Evidence for the plaintiffs indicated that Lillian M. Prager knew the bank stock had been applied on the grocery company's indebtedness to the bank about the time the transaction occurred. Her husband, William Prager, was then secretary and treasurer of the grocery company. He transacted all, or substantially all, of his wife's business as trustee. Immediately after her appointment, Lee Hart, father of the plaintiffs, who was then living, told William Prager that Leo had disposed of the bank stock, and it would not be among the things turned over. William Prager was informed that the bank stock went to the credit of the children on the books of the grocery company, and if Lillian M. Prager did not, as she testified, personally know the fact at the time, she was charged with knowledge directly after she became trustee.

On May 26, 1902, the grocery company sold its merchandise, went out of business, and proceeded to wind up its affairs. The trustee did not attempt to recover the stock from the bank, or attempt to recover its value from either Leo I. Stadden or the bank, and the value of the stock was not realized from the credit on the books of the grocery company. In April, 1916, the beneficiaries commenced this action on their own account.

The district court did not make findings of fact, and the basis of its judgment can only be surmised. Under the well-understood rule, the judgment includes a finding of all facts supported by evidence and inferences from evidence favorable to the defendant, which will sustain the decision on any legally tenable theory.

About the time this suit was commenced, Lillian M. Prager asked to be relieved as trustee. The beneficiaries intervened in the proceeding, and charged her with various derelictions of duty, whereby the trust estate had been greatly depleted, to their detriment. The matter was tried, and the court made extensive findings of fact, covering administration of the trust from the time it was created, including the bank-stock transaction. The trial followed the trial of the present action. The two cases were taken under advisement, and were decided on the same day. With reference to the bank-stock transaction, the court, in the matter of the trusteeship of Lillian M. Prager, made the following finding: "In thus using the capital stock held by him as trustee in reducing the indebtedness of the grocery company to the bank, and in increasing the indebtedness of the grocery company to himself as trustee, Leo I. Stadden acted in good faith, without any intent to injure or endanger the trust estate, and in the honest belief that the change of investment of this portion of the trust fund was the best thing to do under the circumstances, and would not result in any loss to the trust estate; and I find that in so doing he was guilty of no act which would render him responsible for loss, if any occurred, and that he was exercising fairly and honestly his judgment and discretion in the handling of the trust estate, in accordance with the power conferred upon him by the trust instrument."

It is likely the decision in the suit against the bank was rested on a similar finding, not formally stated. However this may be, substantially at the close of the evidence in the bank's case, leave was asked and granted to amend the answer to raise the bar of the Statute of Limitations. The application was resisted, and the ruling permitting the answer to be amended is assigned as error. The subject was clearly one within the discretion of the court. All the facts had been fully developed. Nothing additional was offered, or indicated as available, which would affect the starting or the running of the Statute of Limitations, and the plaintiff suffered no legal prejudice from the amendment.

Assuming that in disposing of the stock to the bank the trustee was guilty of a breach of trust, and that the bank, having knowledge of the breach, and participating in it, became itself trustee ex maleficio of the stock, the present action by the beneficiaries was barred. After the spoliation occurred, a new trustee was appointed. As soon as Lillian M. Prager qualified as trustee, she took title to the trust estate, and became vested with all rights of action pertaining to the trust and trust property. The beneficiaries had no title to the trust property, no control over it, and no right of action growing out of its management and disposition. The new trustee had a complete, matured cause of action against both her unfaithful predecessor and the bank for devastavit, and a variety of remedies were available to her. She alone could pursue them, and she neglected to do so. After the lapse of three, or five years,—it is not material which,—she became barred, and when she became barred the beneficiaries were barred, although they were then minors. "The general rule is that whenever the right of action in a trustee who is vested with the legal estate and is competent to sue is barred by limitation, the right of the cestui que trust is also barred; and this rule applies whether the cestui que trust be sui juris, or under disability during the period of limitation." 25 Cyc. 1010. The plaintiffs cite the following text relating to persons between whom the Statute of Limitations is operative: "The general rule is that for a trust to be exempt from the statute, not only must it be an express trust cognizable solely in equity, but the contest or suit involving it must arise between the trustee and the cestui que trust. But this rule is not always strictly adhered to, and is subject to numerous qualifications. Thus it has been held that a third person who knowingly participates in a trustee's breach of trust is no more entitled to avail himself of the statute than is the trustee. Where property having been held under an express trust comes into the hands of a third person having notice of the trust, it is held in some cases that the third person occupies the position of an express trustee and is not protected by the statute; although in other cases it is held that he is merely a constructive trustee and that the statute applies in his favor, especially where the trust funds may be recovered in an action at law." 25 Cyc. 1165.

All the decisions cited as qualifying the general rule of the text have been examined. It would unduly extend this opinion to review them. In this state there is but one form of civil action, whether the right to relief be legal or equitable in its nature, and all actions, whether such as were formerly denominated actions at law or suits in equity, must be commenced within the periods prescribed by the Statute of Limitations. The declarations that a third person, who knowingly participates in a trustee's breach of trust, is no more entitled to avail himself of the statute than the trustee, is altogether too broad, and its indiscriminate application would lead to abrogation of the Statute of Limitations in many cases to which it was designed to apply. In this state express trusts and constructive trusts arising by operation of law are wholly distinct in origin and nature, and to identify them for any adventitious purpose would lead to confusion. Probably as clear a statement of the principle involved as the court's own investigation has revealed appears in a case cited in connection with the text quoted, in one of the volumes of annual annotations to Cyc.: "One who knowingly takes title to property which is subject to a trust, himself becomes a trustee ex maleficio, and will have to account to the beneficiaries or cestuis que trust for such property. The Statute of Limitations does not run against the beneficiaries under legal disabilities simply because it has fully run against their trustee who has conveyed the legal title to the parties sued by them, and who took with full knowledge of the trust impressed upon the property. So that where certificates of stock were issued to a mother as trustee for her children, and defendants bought the stock from her, with full knowledge of such trust, a suit ten years afterwards by the children, who because of legal disabilities are not otherwise barred, is not barred as to them. The principle that when the trustee is barred all the beneficiaries, whether under legal disabilities or not, are barred, has no application to such a case. That principle applies only where the trustee could sue, but fails to do so." Elliott v. Landis Mach. Co. 236 Mo. 546, Syl. 3, 139 S. W. 356.

In the present instance, after the locus pœnitentiæ had been passed, Leo I. Stadden as trustee could not sue the bank, because he was estopped to dispute the vesting of title which he had transferred. The bank, however, having knowledge of the trust and its breach, was prevented from taking title stripped of the trust. The relation of the property to the trust estate was preserved by making the bank a constructive trustee by operation of law consequent upon its own wrong. If nothing else had happened, when the time came for the beneficiaries to call for an accounting, and for delivery to them of the trust property, or its proceeds or value, they might have recovered from the bank, notwithstanding lapse of time. But something else did happen. Another trustee came into office, clothed with the right and charged with the duty to call upon Leo I. Stadden and the bank for an accounting, and for delivery of the trust property, or its proceeds or value. Her authority in those respects was precisely that of adult beneficiaries at termination of the trust; and nobody would contend that, after termination of the trust, adult beneficiaries could delay assertion of their right beyond the period fixed by the Statute of Limitations. The new trustee neglected to bring action against the bank, her right of action became barred, and in that respect the plaintiffs stand in her shoes. Their remedy lies in calling the second trustee to account,—but that is another story.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Appointment of new trustee as affecting running of Statute of Limitations in favor of third person who has received trust property through breach of trust by former trustee.

In the reported case (HART v. CITIZENS' NAT. BANK, ante, 938), wherein action is brought by the beneficiaries of an express trust to recover trust property received by a third person through a breach of trust by the former trustee, the court holds that although the third person became a constructive trustee, against whom the action would not have been barred by the lapse of time, still the failure of a trustee thereafter appointed, to bring an action within the period prescribed by statute, precludes an assertion of the rights of the beneficiaries beyond the prescribed period of limitation. No case other than the reported case appears to have passed on the precise question therein considered.

SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

(— Cal. —, 184 Pac. 684.)

1. A power which is declared irrevocable, by which the interest of the constituent in a legacy is assigned to the attorney, the intention being declared that the power is coupled with an interest, but which also provides that the balance, after deducting expenses, outlays, and compensation, shall be remitted to the constituent, is not coupled with an interest, but may be revoked at the pleasure of the constituent.

Mandamus — for substitution of attorney — facts to be considered.

2. Letters, affidavits, and consent of petitioners, attached to a motion for substitution of attorney because the acting attorney was without authority, are part of the facts which the court, in a mandamus proceeding to compel the substitution, may consider in determining whether or not petitioners have been denied a legal right.

Attorney and client — right to change attorney.

3. A litigant may change his attorney at any time except where the attorney has an interest in the subject-matter of the suit.

[See 2 R. C. L. 957.]

Power — right to revoke.

4. Even though a power of attorney is made in terms irrevocable, that fact will not prevent revocation by the constituent, where the power is not at the same time coupled with an interest, or given as security for the payment of money or the performance of any act deemed of value.

[See 21 R. C. L. 886, 889.]

— what makes power irrevocable.

5. To constitute an irrevocable power of attorney there must coexist with the power a beneficial interest in the subject thereof which is enforceable in the name of the attorney and will survive the constituent, or the power must be given as security for the payment of a sum of money other than that which arises as compensation in the exercise of the power, or as security for the performance of some act of value.

[See 21 R. C. L. 839.]

— construction — repugnant clauses.

6. The repugnancy in a power of attorney must be reconciled so as to give effect to the repugnant clauses in keeping with the general intent or predominant purpose of the instrument.

[See 21 R. C. L. 881.]

— what interest in attorney necessary to prevent revocation.

7. The interest which an attorney in fact must have in the subject of the power in order to render the power irrevocable is such a beneficial interest in the power itself, apart from the proceeds, that, if the power were revoked, he would be deprived of a substantial right.

[See 21 R. C. L. 889.]

APPLICATION by petitioners for a writ of mandamus to compel respondents to substitute attorneys in proceedings in the Matter of the Estate of Christine Sharbach, deceased. Writ granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. T. E. K. Cormac and W. J. Tuska for petitioners.

Messrs. Shelton & Levy, for respondents:

Plaintiffs are entitled to a writ only if they can show that it was mandatory upon the probate court to grant the motion for substitution.

Rundberg v. Belcher, 118 Cal. 589, 50 Pac. 670.

The power of attorney is coupled with an interest.

Norton v. Whitehead, 84 Cal. 268, 18 Am. St. Rep. 172, 24 Pac. 154; Flanagan v. Brown, 70 Cal. 259, 11 Pac. 706; Hartley's Appeal, 53 Pa. 212, 91 Am. Dec. 207; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Miller, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 609, 53 S. W.

709; Merrill v. Bradley, 52 Tex. Civ. App. 527, 121 S. W. 561; Cage v. Atwater, 136 Cal. 170, 68 Pac. 581.

Thus, the fact that the attorney is not permanently to retain all that is assigned to him does not detract from the force of the assignment, nor convert it into a mere promise to pay on the part of the principal.

Barr v. Schroeder, 32 Cal. 609.

Considering the effect of the letter of attorney to be an assignment of the interest as security for the payment of "services rendered and to be rendered," and of "expenses and outlays," the power coupled with such an interest is irrevocable.

Lawlor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Application for a writ of mandate. On April 28, 1919, the petitioners herein filed an application for a writ of mandate to be directed against the respondents, the court having refused to grant a motion made by the petitioners for the substitution of attorneys in the matter of the estate of Christine Sharbach, deceased. On May 1, 1919, an alternative writ of mandate was issued by this court, and on June 2, 1919, the respondents interposed a demurrer to the petition on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for a writ of mandate. At the same time the respondents filed an answer to the petition. The matter was thereupon orally heard and submitted for decision.

Petitioners, Sophia Todd and Louise Weber, residents of England, were named as legatees in the will of Christine Sharbach, who died in San Francisco on November 21, 1917. On January 3, 1918, each of the petitioners executed a separate power of attorney to L. O. Thieme of Chicago, Illinois; the powers being identical except as to the name of the constituent. That of Louise Weber reads as follows:

Power of attorney.

Know all men by these presents: That, I, Louise Weber, of 46 Carlton street, West Hartlepool in the county of Durham, England, spinster, being of lawful age, do hereby make, constitute, and appoint L. O. Thieme of Chicago, Illinois, to be my true and lawful attorney in fact with full power and authority to collect, receipt for, and sue for my distributive share, legacy, or claim of any kind, nature, or description, which I may have against or may now or at any future date be entitled to from the estate of Christine Sharbach, deceased, and to take possession of any personal property disbursed in kind by the personal representative of said estate; also to collect any policies of insurance, or death benefits in which I may be named as beneficiary; to take charge of and manage any real estate in which I may have an interest, to collect rents, pay taxes, and to institute and conduct any proceedings for the partition or sale of any such real estate, and to institute, conduct, or defend all suits at law or in equity which may concern the subject-matter of this instrument, to retain and discharge counsel, to execute refunding bonds, statutory bonds, or bonds of any kind, nature, or description, to enter my appearance and waive notice in the matter of any final accounting, to indorse checks and other papers of whatsoever kind, to compromise claims, to execute releases and to execute all other suitable instruments in writing, to carry into effect the various powers herein granted, and to do and perform all other acts as fully and effectually as I might do or perform if personally present, with full power to appoint and discharge substitutes, hereby revoking all powers of attorney heretofore executed by me.

And for and in consideration of the sum of $1 to me in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and in further consideration of services rendered and to be rendered and moneys to be advanced for court cost and other necessary expenses in this behalf by my said attorney in fact, I do hereby assign, transfer, and set over unto my said attorney in fact all of the subject-matter of this power of attorney, that is to say, of all property, real or personal, to which I may be entitled out of the estate of

Christine Sharbach, deceased, or which arise out of the death of said deceased in any manner whatsoever, it being my intention that this power of attorney shall be construed as a power of attorney, coupled with an interest in the subject-matter thereof.

After deducting the interest herein assigned, and his expenses and outlays in and about performing his duties, said attorney in fact shall remit the balance of the funds on hand to me through his corresponding bank.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 8d day of January A. D. 1918.

On January 22, 1918, L. O. Thieme executed a power of substitution in favor of Eugene W. Levy, an attorney at law of San Francisco, as follows: "Know all men by these presents: That I, the undersigned, L. O. Thieme, of the city of Chicago, state of Illinois, by virtue of the power and authority to me given in and by the letters of attorney dated January 3, 1918, of Sophia Todd, and January 3, 1918, of Louise Weber, do hereby substitute and appoint Eugene W. Levy, attorney at law of the city of San Francisco, in the county of San Francisco, and state of California, as the true and lawful attorney and substitute of myself and the said constituents named in the said letters of attorney, to do, execute, and perform all and every act and thing requisite and necessary to be done, as fully to all intents and purposes as the said constituents or I myself could do if personally present, hereby ratifying and confirming all that the said attorney and substitute hereby made, shall do in the premises by virtue hereof and of the said letters of attorney."

Pursuant to the foregoing substitution, Mr. Levy, on January 30, 1918, filed a notice of appearance in the proceedings in the estate of Christine Sharbach, deceased, as attorney for the petitioners herein; the will of the deceased having been admitted to probate on December 21, 1917. The estate consists entirely of stocks and bonds, and there is no litigation in connection with these legacies; the administration of the estate being purely formal. On November 11, 1918, notice was served upon Mr. Levy that petitioners would, on November 18th, following, apply to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco for an order substituting T. E. K. Cormac, Esq., "as attorney for the said Sophia Todd and Louise Weber, respectively, in all proceedings in the matter of the estate of Christine Sharbach, deceased, in the place of the said Eugene W. Levy, Esq." The motion, which was heard and denied on April 21, 1919, after a number of continuances granted at the request of Mr. Levy, was "made on the ground that the appearance of the said Eugene W. Levy as attorney for the said Sophia Todd was unauthorized by the said Sophia Todd; and that the same is in furtherance of justice, and will be heard upon letters, affidavits, and consent of the said Sophia Todd, copies of which papers are hereto annexed, and other oral and documentary evidence." The notice of Louise Weber was in identical terms.

The letters and affidavits here referred to show that the petitioners on April 5, 1918, three months after executing the power of attorney to L. O. Thieme, and two months after Mr. Levy had filed an appearance, executed a power of attorney in favor of T. E. K. Cormac, Esq., of San Francisco, "by which he is empowered to represent us in California, and elsewhere in America, for all purposes connected with estates of said decedent, and by which we expressly canceled, withdrew, and revoked the power of attorney we had formerly given to L. O. Thieme & Company . . . and under which they or any substitutes or agents of theirs might be claiming to represent us in California or elsewhere." (Italics ours.)

Petitioners contend that under § 284 of the Code of Civil Procedure they "have the absolute right to change their attorney at any stage of the proceedings," and that the motion for substitution of attorneys made to the court below, supported by the letters and affidavits showing that the power of attorney held by Mr. Levy had been revoked by petitioners, should have been granted. Section 284 reads:

"The attorney in an action or special proceeding may be changed at any time before or after judgment or final determination, as follows:

"(1) Upon consent of both client and attorney, filed with the clerk, or entered upon the minutes.

"(2) Upon the order of the court, upon the application of either client or attorney, after notice from one to the other."

It is evident that the motion herein was made under subdivision 2.

It is urged on behalf of respondents that, since the motion for substitution specified particularly that petitioners' present attorney was not authorized to represent them, they are confined to that ground here, and that if it be found that the allegation was not well taken, the order denying the motion must be upheld and the writ denied. In other words, respondents argue that if it be found that Mr. Levy was at any time authorized to represent the petitioners the writ must be denied without going into the question whether that authority has been revoked. In support of this contention respondents cite Rundberg v. Belcher, 118 Cal. 589, 50 Pac. 670. In that case application was made for a writ of mandate for the substitution of attorneys, which was denied on the ground that the petition did not state facts authorizing the granting of the writ; namely, it did not appear from the record that notice, as required by subdivision 2, § 284, Code of Civil Procedure, and § 1005, id., had been given to the attorney there sought to be substituted out of the case. The court said: "While mandate will lie to compel judicial action, and in some instances even specific action (Wood

v. Strother, 76 Cal. 545, 9 Am. St. Rep. 249, 18 Pac. 766), and is an appropriate remedy in a proper case to obtain the relief here sought (People ex rel. Downer v. Norton, 16 Cal. 436), it may not be invoked to require a judicial officer to act in a particular way, except it appear by necessary legal deduction from the facts stated that the aggrieved party has been denied a right which it was the plain legal duty of the officer to grant, and without his proper discretion to refuse."

While it is true, as we have pointed out, that the motion herein was made on the ground "that the appearance of the said Eugene W. Levy as the attorney" for the petitioners "was unauthorized" by them, it is also true that the motion was made "upon letters, affidavits, and consent" of the petitioners, which documents were attached to and made a part of the motion. These, therefore, became a part of the facts which, under the plain terms of the decision in Rundberg v. Belcher, supra, are to be considered by this court in making the "legal deduction" as to whether "the aggrieved party has been denied a right which it was the plain legal duty of the officer to grant, and without his proper discretion to refuse." As we have seen, the import of these documents is that the present attorney was not authorized by the petitioners to represent them in the probate proceedings, and, further, that the power of attorney under which he claimed authority to act had been revoked by them.

Respondents contend that the power of attorney which Mr. Levy holds as the substitute of Mr. Thieme is irrevocable; that it is made so by the language: "I do hereby assign, transfer, and set over unto my said attorney in fact all of the said subject-matter of this power of attorney, that is to say, of all property, real or personal, to which I may be entitled out of the estate of Christine Sharbach, deceased, or which arise out of the death of said deceased in any manner whatsoever, it being my intention that this power of attorney shall be construed as a power of attorney coupled with an interest in the subject-matter thereof."

It is well settled that a client has a right to change his attorney at any time, except where the attorney has an interest in the subject-matter of the suit. In 6 C. J. at page 677, it is said: "This right of discharge exists even though a contingent fee has been agreed upon, or an irrevocable power of attorney has been given (Carver v. United States, 7 Ct. Cl. 499; People ex rel. Downer v. Norton, 16 Cal. 436; Crosby v. Hatch, 155 Iowa, 312, 316, 135 N. W. 1079), or the attorney has rendered valuable services under his employment (Gage v. Atwater, 136 Cal. 170, 68 Pac. 581), or the client is indebted to him therefor, or for moneys advanced in the prosecution or defense of the action (ibid). There is an exception, however, where the attorney has acquired an interest in the property. Louque v. Dejan, 129 La. 519, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 389, 56 So. 427; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Miller, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 609, 58 S. W. 709; Wylie v. Coxe, 15 How. 415, 14 L. ed. 753."

It is said in 2 R. C. L. 957: "The right of a client to change his attorney at will is based on necessity in view both of the delicate and confidential nature of the relation between them, and of the evil engendered by friction or distrust. According to some decisions, an exception to the general rule as to the power of the client to discharge his attorney at will seems to exist where the power of the attorney is coupled with an interest in the cause of action. Louque v. Dejan, supra."

It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider what constitutes a power coupled with an interest, and whether the interest here given is such as to render the power irrevocable. What constitutes a power of attorney coupled with an interest has been considered in numerous decisions. The leading case on the subject, however, is the decision rendered by Chief Justice Marshall in Hunt v. Rousmanier, 8 Wheat. 174, 5 L. ed. 589. In that case the owner of an interest in a certain vessel, then at sea, to secure a loan of money, executed to the lender contemporaneously with the loan a power of attorney authorizing him to sell the borrower's interest in the vessel, which power, by its terms, was to become void on payment of the loan. The borrower died before payment, and the question was presented whether his death operated to revoke the power. It was decided that the power was revoked by the death of the grantor. The general doctrine that a power must be exercised in the name of the principal, and does not survive his death, was held to be applicable. But the court, in the decision of the question, proceeded to consider the exception to the rule in cases where the power was coupled with an interest, and to define the meaning of that phrase. In a luminous statement the chief justice confined the scope of the exception to cases where, together with the power, there was vested in the donee an estate, right, or interest in the subject of the power, as distinguished from an interest in the proceeds of the power when exercised. In the former case he declared that the power would not be extinguished by the death of the creator of the power, because it attached to the estate of the donee in the subject thereof, and was capable of execution in his own name after the death of the principal, unlike cases where the power was unconnected with any interest in the thing itself, and the only interest was in the execution of the power. The learned chief justice said: "It becomes necessary to inquire, what is meant by the expression 'a power coupled with an interest'? Is it an interest in the subject on which the power is to be exercised? Or is it an interest in that which is produced by the exercise of the power? We hold it to be clear that the interest which can protect a power after the death of a person who creates it must be an interest in the thing itself. In other words, the power must be ingrafted on an estate in the thing. The words themselves seem to import this meaning. 'A power coupled with an interest' is a power which accompanies or is connected with an interest. The power and the interest are united in the same person. But if we are to understand by the word 'interest' an interest in that which is to be produced by the exercise of the power, then they are never united. The power, to produce the interest, must be exercised, and by its exercise, is extinguished. The power ceases when the interest commences, and therefore cannot, in accurate law language, be said to be 'coupled' with it."

The doctrine thus enunciated has been adhered to in the following well-reasoned cases: Barr v. Schroeder, 32 Cal. 617; Frink v. Roe, 70 Cal. 296, 11 Pac. 820; Hammond v. Allen, 2 Sumn. 387, Fed. Cas. No. 6,000; Nicks v. Rector, 4 Ark. 251, 280; Schauber v. Jackson, 2 Wend. 13, 54; Terwilliger v. Ontario, C. & S. R. Co. 149 N. Y. 86, 92, 43 N. E. 434; Frederick's Appeal, 52 Pa. 338, 342, 91 Am. Dec. 162; Flagstaff Silver Min. Co. v. Patrick, 2 Utah, 313, 4 Mor. Min. Rep. 19; Alworth v. Seymour, 42 Minn. 526, 44 N. W. 1030; Louque v. Dejan, 129 La. 519, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 389, 56 So. 427; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Miller, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 609, 53 S. W. 709; Wylie v. Coxe, 15 How. 415, 14 L. ed. 753; Mansfield v. Mansfield, 6 Conn. 559, 16 Am. Dec. 76; Hartley's Appeal, 53 Pa. 212, 91 Am. Dec. 207.

In Hartley's Appeal a situation quite similar to the one in the present case was presented, the chief difference being that there the constituent did not assign her legacy to the attorneys in fact. In that case Hannah Gallion made to Hartley and Minor a power of attorney to collect and receive all money and property coming to her as heir of John Douglass, deceased, with power to convey her interest in the real estate of the decedent, "the said Hartley and Minor to receive as compensation for their services herein one half of the net proceeds of my interest in said estate which may be collected or received by them as my attorneys, after paying all costs and expenses, they to receive no further compensation for any services they may render or expenses they may incur or pay as my attorneys." Subsequently she gave another power of attorney to one Howland for the same purpose, and in it revoked that to Hartley and Minor. The latter, as attorneys of Hannah Gallion, petitioned the court for a citation to the administrator of Douglass's estate to settle his account. This was objected to because of the power of attorney to Howland. On this ground the court refused to grant the citation, and dismissed the petition. Hartley and Minor appealed from this decree. The appellate court said: "There was no error committed by the court below in holding the power of attorney of Hannah Gallion to the appellants to be revocable. It was an ordinary agency, constituted by letter of attorney, to act for her to enforce a settlement of his accounts by the administrator of her father's estate, in which she was interested, and to collect any moneys or property that might belong, or be coming, to her. For these services the attorneys were to have one half of the net proceeds of what they might receive or recover for her. The plaintiffs in error suppose that this clause rendered the power irrevocable by their principal, under the idea that it was a power coupled with an interest. This was a mistake, as all the authorities show. To impart an irrevocable quality to a power of attorney in the absence of any express stipulation, and as the result of legal principles alone, there must coexist with the power an interest in the thing or estate to be disposed of or managed under the power. An instance of frequent occurrence in practice may be given of the assignment of vessels at sea, with a power to sell for the benefit of the holder of the power, or of anybody else who may have advanced money and who it was agreed should be secured in that way.

"In the case in hand the power and the interest could not coexist. The interest the appellants would have would be in the net proceeds collected under the power, and the exercise of the power to collect the proceeds would ipso facto extinguish it entirely, or so far as exercised. Hence the appellants' interest would properly begin when the power ended." (Italics ours.)

But there are powers which the constituent cannot revoke, although they do not come within Chief Justice Marshall's definition of a power coupled with an interest. This is clearly recognized by him in Hunt v. Rousmanier, supra. After stating the general rule that a power may at any time be revoked by the party conferring it, he says: "But this general rule, which results from the nature of the act, has sustained some modification. Where a letter of attorney forms part of a contract, and is a security for money, or for the performance of any act which is deemed valuable, it is generally made irrevocable in terms, or, if not so, is deemed irrevocable in law."

An instance of a letter of attorney given as security for money is presented in Norton v. Whitehead, 84 Cal. 264, 18 Am. St. Rep. 172, 24 Pac. 154. In that case a contractor borrowed from the plaintiff, his foreman on the work, various sums of money to enable him to carry on the contract. Afterwards he executed to the plaintiff an assignment of all moneys due or to become due "for any work I may perform, the assignment to remain good and in full force until all notes due, or which are to become due . . . from me are paid." Later he gave plaintiff a power of attorney reciting that "whereas I am now desirous that all moneys that have become or may become due to me by reason of my performance of said contract shall be paid" to plaintiff, and giving him power to collect such moneys. These instruments were deposited with the other parties to the contract. The contractor died and the work was completed by his administrator. It was held that the plaintiff had such an interest in the moneys due on the contract as to prevent a revocation of the power on the contractor's death, and that the plaintiff was entitled to collect it as against the administrator.

But it has been held that, even though the power of attorney is made in terms irrevocable, that fact will not prevent revocation by the constituent, where the power is not at the same time coupled with an interest or given as security for the payment of money, or for the performance of an act deemed of value. Blackstone v. Buttermore, 58 Pa. 266; Bonney v. Smith, 17 Ill. 531; Kilpatrick v. Wiley, 197 Mo. 123, 95 S. W. 213; Martin v. Lamkin, 188 Ill. App. 481, 487; McKellop v. Dewitz, 42 Okla. 220, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 255, 140 Pac. 1161; 6 C. J. 677. In Blackstone v. Buttermore, supra, it was said: "A mere power, like a will, is in its very nature revocable when it concerns the interest of the principal alone, and in such case even an express declaration of irrevocability will not prevent revocation. An interest in the proceeds to arise as mere compensation for the service of executing the power will not make the power irrevocable."

It is well settled, therefore, that in order to constitute an irrevocable power of attorney there must coexist with the power a beneficial interest in the subject thereof which is enforceable in the name of the attorney in fact, and will survive the constituent; or the power must be given as security for the payment of a sum of money other than that which arises as compensation through the exercise of the power; or as security for the performance of some act of value.

It now remains for us to examine in the light of the foregoing authorities the power of attorney in the instant case, and to determine whether or not it is coupled with such an interest, or given as security, either for the payment of money or the performance of an act, so as to make it irrevocable. As we have seen, the power of attorney in this case forms a part of a contract which in express terms purports to assign to the attorney in fact all of the petitioner's interest in the estate, and at the same time expressly stating that it is the intention of the constituents that it shall be a power of attorney coupled with an interest. The letter then goes on to say: "After deducting the interest herein assigned, and his expenses and outlays in and about performing his duties, said attorney in fact shall remit the balance of the funds on hand to me through his corresponding bank."

Respondents in their answer on this point have this to say:

"There is an inconsistency between this clause and the preceding assignment of the entire interest of the legatee, because if such assigned interest were deducted, there would be nothing left to remit. If the two clauses were deemed irreconcilable, the instrument would be interpreted most strongly against the petitioner, the promisor. Civ. Code, § 1654. Consequently the assignment would be upheld. The inconsistency cannot be permitted to defeat the plain terms of assignment and the paramount provision of the instrument.

"But the inconsistency is apparent and not real. When aided by the settled rule of construction that repugnancy must be reconciled so as to give effect to the repugnant clauses, subordinate to the general intent and purpose (Civ. Code, § 1653), the meaning of the power of attorney becomes plain. The predominant purpose to create a power coupled with an interest, and thus an irrevocable agency, is expressly declared. To insure this result the entire interest is transferred. But the assignment is not intended to be absolute so as to divest the petitioner of all further claim to her legacy. The transfer is really one in trust pursuant to which the attorney in fact takes the legal title with a corresponding duty to account. He himself has a beneficial interest sufficient at least to pay for his services and outlays."

That there is an inconsistency between the two clauses is clear. Nor do we question respondents' statement of the rule of construction that under such circumstances the repugnant clauses must be reconciled so as to give effect to the repugnant clauses in keeping with the general intent or predominant purpose of the instrument. But we cannot agree with respondents in their statement of what is the "predominant purpose" or "paramount provision" of the instrument. It is clear to us that the chief purpose of the constituents here was not, as respondents contend, "to create a power coupled with an interest and thus an irrevocable agency," but rather to make an assignment in trust to the attorney in fact in order to facilitate the collection of the legacies, and to insure the reimbursement of the attorney in fact for his outlays, and for compensation for his services. Now, since the reimbursements and compensations were to be taken from the legacies, it may be conceded that they are to that extent an interest in the subject of the power, and that the interest arose when the assignment was made; that is to say, the power and the interest concurred. The assignment, in other words, created a present interest in the legacies, but only in the sense we have indicated,—to the extent of reimbursements and compensation. But this does not render the power

irrevocable. The mere expression, "a power coupled with an interest," does not necessarily render the power irrevocable. It is plain from the foregoing authorities that the interest which the attorney in fact must have in the subject of the power in order to render the power irrevocable is such a beneficial interest in the thing itself, apart from the proceeds, that if the power were revoked he would be deprived of a substantial right. In other words, the relation of the attorney in fact to the subject-matter must be such that a revocation of the power would be inequitable. Such is not the case here. The interest in the proceeds of what may be collected is not, strictly speaking, a beneficial interest in the legacies. The interest is nothing more than an assurance that the attorney in fact will be reimbursed and compensated out of the legacies when collected. A revocation of the power would in no way deprive the attorney in fact of any right, for the reason that he is entitled to be reimbursed for any sums expended by him and to be compensated out of the legacies for any services rendered under the power up to the time of revocation. Nor can the creation of a trust, which has placed the bare legal title in the attorney in fact, with a corresponding duty to account, be considered upon any theory as conferring upon the attorney in fact such a beneficial interest as to render the power irrevocable. Fairly considered, the contract herein creates a trust with a corresponding duty to account. It has no meaning other than this. The case would be quite different if, in addition to providing for reimbursements and compensation, the contract vested in the attorney in fact a definite share in the ownership of the legacies. In such an event, the power would be "ingrafted upon an estate in the thing," and under such a contract to permit the revocation of the power and substitute the attorney in fact out of the case would be to prevent him from exercising the right of property.

Petitioners urge that the power of attorney is unconscionable and should not, therefore, be recognized in equity, since it professes to assign all of petitioners' legacy without consideration. It is likewise contended that the power of attorney was secured through fraud and misrepresentation. It is sufficient to say that such questions have no proper place in the determination of this proceeding. The order of substitution should have been made.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue.

ANNOTATION.

Revocability of power or agency to collect interest in estate.

To the general rule of law that a principal may revoke the power of his agent or attorney at his mere pleasure or caprice, there is a well-defined exception to the effect that where an authority or power is coupled with an interest, or where it is given for a valuable consideration, or where it is part of a security, unless there is an express stipulation that it shall be revocable, it is, from its very nature and character, in contemplation of the law, irrevocable, whether it is expressed to be so on the face of the instrument conferring the power or not. See 21 R. C. L. 887.

The question with which the present annotation is concerned is whether this exception to the rule is applicable to a power or agency to collect an interest in an estate. The determination of that question with respect to a given case seems to depend entirely on the facts of that case, and therefore no general doctrine can be evolved from the authorities dealing with the particular kind of agency under consideration.

In each of the following cases it was held, as in the reported case (TODD v. SUPERIOR CT. ante, 938), that the agency or power of attorney involved was not one coupled with an interest, and therefore was revocable: Mansfield v. Mansfield (1827) 6 Conn. 559, 16 Am. Dec. 76; Weaver v. Richards (1906) 144 Mich. 395, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 855, 108 N. W. 382; Healy v. Healy (1912) 76 N. H. 504, 85 Atl. 156; Hartley's Appeal (1866) 53 Pa. 212, 91 Am. Dec. 207; Connor v. Parsons (1895) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 30 S. W. 83.

In Hartley's Appeal (1866) 53 Pa. 212, 91 Am. Dec. 207, supra, the power of attorney under consideration provided that the attorneys were to receive as compensation for their services, "one half of the net proceeds of my interest in said estate which may be collected or received by them as my attorneys, after paying all costs and expenses, they to receive no further compensation for any service they may render or expenses they may incur or pay as my attorneys." It was held that the stipulation created merely an ordinary agency and was revocable. The court said: "It was an ordinary agency, constituted by letter of attorney, to act for her to enforce a settlement of his accounts by the administrator of her father's estate, in which she was interested, and to collect any moneys or property that might belong or be coming to her. For these services the attorneys were to have one half of the net proceeds of what they might receive or recover for her. The plaintiffs in error suppose that this clause rendered the power irrevocable by their principal, under the plea that it was a power coupled with an interest. This was a mistake, as all the authorities show. To impart an irrevocable quality to a power of attorney in the absence of any express stipulation, and as the result of legal principles alone, there must coexist with the power an interest in the thing or estate to be disposed of or managed under the power. . . . In the case in hand the power and the interest could not coexist. The interest the appellants would have would be in the net proceeds collected under the power, and the exercise of the power to collect the proceeds would ipso facto extinguish it entirely, or so far as exercised. Hence the appellants' interest would properly begin when the power ended."

In Mansfield v. Mansfield (1827) 6 Conn. 559, 16 Am. Dec. 76, it was held that a power of attorney "to obtain, sue for, and prosecute, and settle and discharge, and finally adjust, all such claim or claims" as the grantor of the power might have against the estate of her late husband, and to retain all expenses and fees incurred in connection with its execution, and to account for what remained, created a mere naked power, revocable at the will of the grantor.

In Healy v. Healy (1912) 76 N. H. 504, 85 Atl. 156, it appeared that the defendants, as heirs of an estate, joined in a power of attorney, authorizing a cousin to administer the estate and distribute their respective shares, on the erroneous assumption that the plaintiffs, as uncles, aunts, and cousins of the deceased were entitled to participate in the distribution of the estate. Discovering their error, the defendants revoked the power. It was contended that the power was irrevocable, it being, in effect, an agreement for the distribution of the estate, and that the defendants were estopped to deny that the plaintiffs were also heirs. It was held that the power was revocable.

In Connor v. Parsons (1895) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 30 S. W. 83, the power of attorney involved authorized the attorney "to bring suit for, settle up, compromise, release, obtain, or recover interest" in the estate inherited from the parents of the principal. It appeared that the principal also entered into another written agreement of even date, authorizing the attorney to reimburse himself for all expenditures made in connection with the execution of the power, and to retain, as his compensation, one half of the proceeds. A conveyance was made under the power subsequent to the death of the principal. In an action to set aside this conveyance it was held that the power was not coupled with an interest, and hence the authority created by it was revoked by the principal's death.

In Weaver v. Richards (1906) 144 Mich. 395, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 855, 108 N. W. 382, a power given by several heirs to "ask, demand, recover, and receive," etc., all interest in an estate, was held to have been revoked by the death of one of the heirs, even though the power was expressly made irrevocable, and the salary and expenses of the agent were to be paid out of the proceeds. To the same effect, see the reported case (TODD v. SUPERIOR CT. ante, 938).

However, where the subject-matter of a power or agency to collect an interest in an estate was conveyed by way of security, it was held that the power was irrevocable. Babrowsky v. United States Grand Lodge, O. B. A. (1908) 129 App. Div. 695, 113 N. Y. Supp. 1080. In that case it appeared that a husband, during his lifetime, was a member of a fraternal benefit organization. At his death, his widow became entitled to $500, to be collected by assessment from the members. To secure certain sums of money paid out for her benefit, the widow executed a power of attorney to her creditor, empowering him to collect the aforesaid benefit. After the widow's death, the lodge paid the benefit to the attorney. It was claimed by the heirs that the power of attorney was revoked by her death, and that the lodge had no right to pay the benefit to the attorney. The court, however, treated the power as being, in effect, an assignment of the fund, and held that it was a power coupled with an interest which survived the death of the creator.

It seems that a principal may become estopped to assert the revocation of a power of attorney to collect an interest in an estate, which otherwise would be revocable. Butcher v. Quinn (1903) 86 App. Div. 391, 83 N. Y. Supp. 700. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff executed a power of attorney "expressly retaining and employing the attorney to ask, demand, and sue for all moneys belonging to the estate, due to them or any of them." In accordance with the power the attorney instituted suit, and subsequently the plaintiff revoked the power of attorney, but, by advice of new counsel, permitted the suit to proceed to trial and judgment without notifying the defendants. An adverse judgment was rendered, and the plaintiff claimed that the proceedings were unauthorized, and asked to have the judgment set aside. The court said: "Having intentionally permitted the suit to proceed to judgment, and the mandate of the judgment to be carried out without any intimation to the other parties of her objections or her dissatisfaction, the plaintiff has lost the right to now obtain redress at their expense."

It has also been held that a court of equity would set aside an otherwise irrevocable power or agency to collect an interest in an estate where it appeared that its procurement had been fraudulent, and a purchaser under the power was charged with notice of the defect in the agent's title, an express revocation having been recorded. Merrill v. Bradley (1908) 52 Tex. Civ. App. 527, 121 S. W. 561. A. S. M.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County (Finlayson, J.) in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the amounts alleged to be due upon defendants' liability as stockholders for the unpaid portion of their subscription to the stock of a corporation against which plaintiff held two judgments. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Stutsman & Stutsman and Maurice F. Enderle, for appellant:

Plaintiff as the owner of the two judgments in question had the right to apply the compromise payments made to him by certain defendants equally upon each judgment.

Richards, Judge pro tem, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment in the defendants' favor, in an action brought by plaintiff as the holder of two judgments against a corporation known as the Oleum Development Company, to recover from said defendants the several amounts claimed to be due upon their stockholders' liability for the unpaid portion of their subscription to the stock of the said corporation. The facts of the case, as embodied in the findings of the court, may be summarized as follows:

The Oleum Development Company was originally incorporated under the name of the Clark Copper Company and under the laws of the state of Arizona, but for the purpose of doing business in the state of California, with a capital stock of $1,250,000, divided into that number of shares with a par value of $1 per share. Shortly after its organization the corporation purchased six undeveloped mining claims in the county of Inyo, California, and as the purchase price thereof issued in one certificate the entire amount of its said capital stock as fully paid-up stock, delivering the same to one H. L. Percy, as one of the owners and as trustee for the other owners of said mining claims. The court finds that the actual value of the mining claims was never in excess of $29,333, and that the directors of the corporation knew this fact at the time of their acquisition, but believed in good faith that they could be developed in a value equal to the capitalization of the corporation. Upon their attempted development this did not prove to be the case, as a result of which said Percy returned the certificate of stock which he had received as the purchase price of said mining claims, to the treasury of the corporation, and they thereafter issued to said Percy and his associates 775,000 shares of said stock to be used as promotion stock. A little later Percy and his associates returned to the treasury 695,000 shares of this issue in order to set at rest some dissatisfaction, and there was presently issued to Percy and his associates 295,000 of these shares, for which they paid into the treasury of the corporation the sum of $40,000. Not long thereafter the corporation sold 165,000 shares of its capital stock then in its treasury to other persons, receiving therefor the sum of 10 cents per share. Out of this somewhat confused series of transactions the court finds that the corporation emerged with an issued capital stock of 460,000 shares. For 295,000 shares it had received in property and money from said Percy and his associates an amount not exceeding 37.05 cents per share, and for the remaining 165,000 shares of stock it had received the sum of 10 cents per share. All of this stock was issued as fully paid-up stock by the corporation, and the defendants in this action became the owners thereof, either directly by purchase from the corporation or from Percy and his associates, or mediately through purchase in the open market. In the meantime the name of the corporation was changed to the Oleum Development Company, and under this latter name the corporation, after the above transactions had been consummated, executed and delivered two promissory notes for value received, each approximately for the sum of $10,000, one of said notes being made and delivered to a corporation known as Fairbanks, Morse, & Company, and the other being made and delivered to a corporation known as the Fielding J. Stilson Company. Fielding J. Stilson himself was, it appears, the vice president and general manager of the Oleum Development Company. Subsequent to the making and issue of the said last-named note, he caused the said Fielding J. Stilson Company to transfer it to the Fairbanks-Morse Company as collateral security for the first-named note. Neither of these notes was paid, in consequence of which the Fairbanks-Morse Company assigned them to the plaintiff in this action for collection. The plaintiff thereupon brought separate actions upon each of these notes against their maker, and recovered two separate judgments thereon. Judgment upon the note given to the Fairbanks-Morse Company being for the sum of $10,269.17 and judgment upon the note given to the Fielding J. Stilson Company being for the sum of $9,785.70. Executions upon each of these judgments being returned unsatisfied, the plaintiff commenced this action against the stockholders of the Oleum Development Company to recover the amounts alleged to be due from each upon the amount of his unpaid subscription to the capital stock of the said corporation. After the commencement of this action, and before the trial thereof, the plaintiff collected from a considerable number of the stockholders joined as defendants herein, other than the respondents herein, various sums of money upon their liability as stockholders, under § 322 of the Civil Code. Said sums of money so collected aggregated the sum of $6,970.83. The plaintiff, also during the pendency of this suit, collected from various other stockholders other than respondents herein sums aggregating $11,676.95 upon their alleged liability for the balance of their unpaid subscriptions. In making these payments to the plaintiff these stockholders did not make any direction as to how the money so paid by them should be applied upon the two judgments held by plaintiff against this corporation, nor did the corporation itself make any direction as to the application of these payments by its stockholders on account of its obligations, nor did the Fielding J. Stilson Company make any direction or request that the moneys collected on account of the judgment which was based upon the note which it had assigned to the Fairbanks-Morse Company as collateral security for the note, made directly to the corporation, be applied to the payment and satisfaction of the Fairbanks-Morse Company judgment. Accordingly the plaintiff, as these several amounts were collected from the stockholders with whom he settled, applied the same equally on account of the two judgments held by him. The foregoing facts were all found by the court upon the trial of this action, and were based upon sufficient proofs. In addition thereto, evidence was offered on behalf of the defendants, from which the court made a further finding to the effect that at the time the Fielding J. Stilson Company extended the credit to the Oleum Development Company for which the note to it was given, it was fully aware of the transactions regarding the original issue of the capital stock of the Clark Copper Company, as above set forth, and knew that the stock issued by it in the course of said transaction was issued as fully paid-up stock, and knew that at the time of its issuance in payment for said unpatented mining claims they were not worth in excess of $29,333, and "that said Fielding J. Stilson Company did not give credit to the Oleum Development Company upon the assumption that its stock issued as fully paid-up stock had been paid for in property equal in cash value to the par value of the stock issued therefor, or upon the assumption that said Oleum Development Company had received for the whole issue of its capital stock aught other than six undeveloped unpatented mining claims of a value not exceeding $29,333; that said Fielding J.

Stilson Company knew that the defendants bought said Oleum Development Company stock as fully paid-up stock." As a conclusion of law from the foregoing findings of fact the court found:

"That plaintiff herein is not entitled to recover from the defendants any sum or sums upon their liability as such stockholders to the said Oleum Development Company, under his said judgment recovered in cause No. 92,740, for the reason that the said Fielding J. Stilson Company, a corporation, did not extend credit to the said Oleum Development Company, a corporation, in reliance upon the assumption that full par value had been received by the said last-named corporation for the stock it had issued as fully paid.

"That plaintiff herein, as judgment creditor under causes Nos. 92,740 and 92,741, did not have the right to apply any portion of said sum of $11,676.95, collected as above stated, upon the amount due under the judgment obtained in cause No. 92,740, and that said plaintiff did not have the right to direct his said attorneys to make application of any portion of said sum so collected in satisfaction of the judgment obtained in said cause No. 92,740, for the reason, firstly, that he was not entitled to recover against the stockholders under said judgment; and, secondly, that the relation of debtor and creditor does not exist between defendant stockholders of a corporation and a judgment creditor thereof in an action to enforce the payment by such creditor of the unpaid balance due upon the par value of the capital stock from such stockholders to such corporation, the right to make application by a creditor existing only where such relation exists. And the court further concludes that because the amount so collected as above exceeds the amount due to plaintiff under his judgment in cause No. 92,741, plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything in this action from said defendants, and judgment is accordingly ordered to be entered herein in favor of said defendants and against plaintiff for their costs."

Upon the basis of these findings and conclusions of law the court rendered judgment in favor of the defendants.

The appellant makes two points upon appeal from this judgment, neither of which, we think, can be sustained. The first of these is that as to the so-called Stilson note and judgment the fact that the Fielding J. Stilson Company, at the time it extended credit to and took the note of the Oleum Development Company, was fully aware of the transactions through which the corporation had caused to be issued the large portion of its capital stock as fully paid-up stock for a consideration in property and value amounting to less than one third in value of the par value of its stock heretofore issued, was insufficient to justify a conclusion of law that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, on the Stilson note and judgment, anything from these defendants upon their stockholders' liability for the unpaid portion of their subscription.

It may not be questioned that as a general rule the law is well settled in this state that when, at the inception of its enterprise, a corporation issues its stock for a consideration in money or property of admitted value less than the par value of such stock, the subscribers to such stock giving such consideration are liable to the corporation and to its creditors for the unpaid portion of the subscription. Vermont Marble Co. v. Declez Granite Co. 135 Cal. 579, 56 L.R.A. 728, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143, 67 Pac. 1057; R. H. Herron Co. v. Shaw, 165 Cal. 668, 133 Pac. 488, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1265; J. F. Lucey Co. v. McMullen, — Cal. —, 173 Pac. 1000. The basis of this doctrine, as is well stated in the case of R. H. Herron Co. v. Shaw, supra, is that credit is given in reliance on the presumption that full par value has been received by the corporation for the stock it has issued as fully paid.

Where, however, it appears, as it does in this case, from the pleadings, the uncontradicted proofs, and the clear and positive findings of the court, that the particular creditor —stock issued for property at discount—effect of knowledge of creditors.

at the time the credit was given extended the credit with full knowledge of the difference between the par value of the stock and the value of the property received for it, an exception to the rule exists. This exception and the reason for it are well stated in 4 Thompson on Corporations, 2d ed. § 3983, as follows: "On principle and authority, a creditor who deals with the corporation with full knowledge of the manner in which its shares have been paid for is not defrauded by the taking of overvalued property as payment for stock, and hence is estopped to raise that question."

And in Morawetz on Private Corporations, vol. 2, § 829, the rule is stated as follows: "So if the capital of a corporation was declared to be fully paid up in consideration of specific property of less value than the amount of the capital, a person who should voluntarily deal with the company knowing the character and value of the property so transferred to the company would have no claim upon the shareholders for any further contribution of capital. By voluntarily dealing with the company under the circumstances he must be deemed to have assented to the existing arrangement; the company and its shareholders having offered to contract only on these terms."

In 10 Cyc. 478, title Corporations, the author, in discussing this matter, says: "On whatever theory the conclusion is placed the rule seems to be that those who extend credit to the corporation with full knowledge as to the manner in which its shares have been paid for, if at all, cannot charge its shareholders with any supposed difference between real value and fictitious value in case of payment in property."

See also Finletter v. Appleton, 195 Pa. 349, 45 Atl. 1063; First Nat. Bank v. Gustin Minerva Consol. Min. Co. 42 Minn. 327, 6 L.R.A. 676, 18 Am. St. Rep. 510, 44 N. W. 198; Easton Nat. Bank v. American Brick & Tile Co. 70 N. J. Eq. 782, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 271, 64 Atl. 917, 10 Ann. Cas. 84; Adamant Mfg. Co. v. Wallace, 16 Wash. 614, 48 Pac. 415; Lea v. Iron Belt Mercantile Co. 119 Ala. 271, 24 So. 28. It would thus seem that the foregoing exception to the general rule regarding the liability of stockholders for their unpaid subscriptions must be given full application to the case at bar. It follows that the Fielding J. Stilson Company had no right of recourse upon the stockholders of the Oleum Development Company; therefore, that the plaintiff, as the transferee of their note after maturity, had no such right of recovery.

This brings us to the second point made by appellant, wherein it is contended that the trial court erred in refusing to approve the plaintiff's effort to apply the moneys received by him from those stockholders who settled with him on account of their alleged liability for unpaid subscriptions, equally to both of the judgments upon which this action was predicated. The total amount so received by plaintiff on account of his claim against said stockholders for their unpaid subscriptions was the sum of $11,676.95, which would have more than sufficed, had it all been applied to the Fairbanks-Morse judgment, to have fully satisfied the same; that it should have been so applied seems incontrovertible in view of our above conclusion that the holders of the Stilson note and of the judgment based thereon had no right of recovery against any of the stockholders of the Oleum Development Company on account of their unpaid subscriptions. Having no such right of action, the plaintiff could have had no right of direction of any sums paid by such stockholders to the payment of an obligation for which they were not liable, but was bound to apply the whole of such sums so received to the settlement of the obligation and judgment upon which they were liable, namely, upon the Fairbanks-Morse judgment. The court, therefore, rightly directed that such application of all of the sums so received by the plaintiff should be made; and since the effect of such application would be to fully pay the amount of said last-named judgment, and since, as we have already seen, the respondents herein were not liable upon the indebtedness of the corporation evidenced by the Stilson judgment, it follows that the conclusion of the trial court that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover upon either judgment was correct. Judgment affirmed.

Shaw and Sloss, JJ., concur.

NOTE.

The decision in the reported case (SHERMAN v. HARLEY, ante, 950), that one who extends credit to a corporation with full knowledge that its stock was issued for property worth less than par value of stock cannot hold the stockholders liable, is in accord with the weight of authority, as shown in the annotation following DU PONT v. BALL, post, 972, on creditor's knowledge that stock is unpaid as affecting stockholders' liability.

It is not necessary that the person to be charged as shareholder should have subscribed for the stock, much less that the stock should have been issued or tendered to him. It is sufficient that the relation of the shareholder is established between him and the company.

After an accounting, ascertaining the corporate debt and assessing the proportion of unpaid stock required to satisfy it, there is no error in authorizing the receivers to call upon the sole stockholder resident in the jurisdiction (whose unpaid balance exceeds the entire debt) to satisfy such debt in the first instance, since stockholders stand, among themselves, in the relation of cosureties, and the stockholder so paying has full right of subrogation.

Pennewill, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The statement of the case contained in the opinion of the chancellor, from whose decree this appeal was taken, is so clear and comprehensive that it is deemed unnecessary to restate in this opinion the facts, the pertinent constitutional and statutory provisions, the proceeding in the lower court, and the many questions argued by counsel. We shall discuss only those questions that appear to be important, and upon which the appellants seemed to mainly rely.

Upon the much-debated question of jurisdiction the court have reached the opinion, after a very careful examination of the case, that the conclusion of the chancellor is sound. But our opinion is based upon reasoning somewhat different from that of the chancellor.

The court are not much concerned about the history of the law respecting the stockholder's liability for the debts of the corporation before the enactment of our General Corporation Act (22 Del. Laws, chap. 394). The learned and elaborate discussion of this subject, including the trust theory and the holding-out theory, in the briefs of counsel, is interesting but not very helpful. Whatever may have been the law before, and whether the statute of this state is simply declaratory of pre-existing law or not, the important fact is that the statute clearly and expressly states the stockholder's liability to creditors to the extent of the par value of stock not paid for. The only troublesome question is: What proceeding may be employed to enforce the liability?

Are the two remedies mentioned in § 49 of the Delaware act exclusive of a pre-existing remedy that would be equally, if not more, convenient and effective in carrying out its purpose; and if they are, does the statute mean that the remedy "by bill in chancery" shall be initiated by what is known as a creditor's bill? Or does it mean any proceeding in that court that is adapted to the accomplishment of the purpose sought? It so happens that New Jersey has an incorporation law very similar to ours, and most of the questions raised in this case have been raised there and settled by decisions of the highest court of that state.

A good deal of ingenuity and refinement has been used by counsel for the appellants in the effort to show that there is a very substantial difference between the statutes of the two states, but the argument is not convincing. There is, of course, some difference in language, but it seems to us the effort to find any in principle is strained, and the distinction contended for exceedingly technical.

There is but one difference noted by the appellants which need be considered by the court. The difference to which we refer, and upon which alone it is possible to base an argument, is the concluding clause of § 20 of the Delaware act which does not appear in the New Jersey act, viz.: "Which said sum or proportion thereof may be recovered as provided for in § 49 of this act . . . after a writ of execution against the corporation has been returned unsatisfied, as provided for in § 51 of this act. . . ."

The courts of New Jersey have held that the remedies prescribed by § 92 of their act (2 Comp. Stat. 1910, p. 1655), which corresponds with § 49 of the Delaware act, cannot be employed to enforce the liability of stockholders under § 21 of their act, which corresponds with § 20 of our act without the concluding clause. And the reason for so holding appears to be that said remedies are made available in actions against officers and directors, as well as stockholders, and that the legislature in enacting § 92 had in mind liabilities other than those that might arise under their § 21.

We agree with the construction placed upon § 92 of the New Jersey act by the courts of that state, and, therefore, hold that the remedies prescribed by § 49 of the Delaware act could not be employed to enforce the stockholder's liability under § 20, if that section did not contain the clause which specifically makes such remedies available.

And we are more strongly confirmed in this opinion because, upon investigation, it is found that said § 49 was taken from the Incorporation Act of 1883 (17 Del. Laws, chap. 147), which did not contain the concluding clause of § 20 of the present act.

The concluding clause of § 20, unlike the New Jersey law, expressly makes said remedies applicable, so that the questions that arise, touching the matter of jurisdictions, are the two we have already mentioned.

But assuming that the procedure adopted in the court below was not authorized or contemplated by the statute, are the remedies mentioned in § 49 and made available to creditors by § 20 of our statute exclusive of the usual procedure employed in collecting the assets and paying the debts of an insolvent corporation, viz., a bill in chancery for the appointment of receivers on the ground of insolvency?

If the statute had not provided any remedy at all for enforcing the stockholder's liability under § 20, unquestionably the creditor would have a remedy in equity, and such has been the decision of the courts of New Jersey and other states in similar cases. Can it be that because the Delaware act provides that the creditor may enforce the stockholder's liability under § 20 by an action at law or by bill in chancery he is not permitted to enforce such liability by proceeding under the Insolvency Act? Are the remedies prescribed exclusive of or additional to the usual remedy in chancery?

It seems to the court that it was the purpose of the legislature, not to take away from the creditor a plain and effective remedy that already existed, but to provide other remedies that he might use if he preferred to do so, and that might be more available and effective in some cases. It is reasonable to believe that the legislature intended by the concluding part of § 20 to make the creditor independent of receivers appointed under the Insolvency Act, by providing remedies that he might employ directly against the stockholder. And it is also reasonable to believe that the legislature thought there might be cases where the corporation would not be in such a condition of insolvency as would justify the appointment of receivers under the statute, but nevertheless in such a condition that the creditor could not collect his claim by judgment and execution. This view is strengthened by the fact that the statute provides that the particular remedies prescribed may be employed only after judgment has been recovered against the corporation and execution thereon returned unsatisfied.

poration—

There can be no doubt that obtaining a judgment and unsatisfied execution against the corporation is a condition precedent to the employment of the remedies mentioned in § 49 by the creditor directly against the stockholders. And the reason is that the law does not permit a creditor to collect his claim from stockholders if he can recover it from the corporation, and the only way his inability to do this can be shown to the court is by a judgment and unsatisfied execution. But if he proceeds independently of the statute, by a bill asking for the appointment of receivers on the ground of in-solveny, a judgment and execution are not required, because the court is compelled to determine the very fact that the judgment and execution are designed to establish. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. Agnew, 194 N. Y. 165, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 628, 86 N. E. 1116, 16 Ann. Cas. 1150.

judgment.

It will be observed that § 41 of the Incorporation Act of 1883, while providing for the creditor an action at law directly against the stockholder did not give him a remedy by bill in chancery. The natural inference from this circumstance is that the legislature intended in the present act to provide for the creditor a direct remedy in chancery also, and in addition to the one he already had under the Insolvency Act.

The giving to the creditor a personal and direct remedy at law by the Act of 1883 did not take away from receivers the power to collect the assets and pay the debts of a corporation; neither did the giving of such a remedy in chancery by the present act take away such power.

It is the opinion of the court, therefore, that there are now two remedies in chancery for the enforcement of the stockholder's liability under § 20, viz.: (1) A proceeding under the Insolvency Act for collecting the assets and paying the debts of the corporation, which remedy existed prior to the passage of the statute and was the one employed in this case. (2) A proceeding by bill in chancery as prescribed by the statute; and this remedy was intended by the legislature to be used by the creditor directly against the stockholder, and must be initiated by a creditor's bill. In the one case a bill would be filed asking for the appointment of a receiver because of insolvency, and this would probably be the procedure chosen where undoubted insolvency could be shown. In the other case the creditor would file a bill against the stockholder if he is unable to collect his claim by legal process as evidened by a judgment and unsatisfactory execution.

The appellants argued strongly and with much confidence that receivers could not, under the law, enforce a stockholder's liability created by statute, as in this case, and cited many authorities which seemed to sustain such proposition. But upon examination the cases referred to do not seem to us to be applicable to the present case. The statute of this state is unlike those that impose a liability upon the stockholder beyond the amount of his unpaid stock, such as double liability statutes. Appellants' cases, for the most part, as well as their citation from 1 Cook on Corporations, 7th ed. § 212, involved what may be termed double or additional liability laws. At the beginning of the section mentioned, it is said: "The state legislatures, however, in many instances, desire to increase the liability of stockholders to corporate creditors. Accordingly statutes are passed expressly declaring that the stockholders shall be liable for a specified sum, in addition to their unpaid subscriptions."

It is this kind of liability that is meant when "statutory liability" is referred to, and Mr. Cook says: "This is called the statutory liability of stockholders."

The failure to note the distinction between the liability of stockholders to the extent of the par value of their stock, and the statutory liability in excess thereof, has resulted in some confusion in the cases and textbooks. The first mentioned, or ordinary liability, is an asset of the corporation, and the second or additional liability is not, it being a liability directly to the creditors, which a receiver, in the absence of statutory authority, has no power to enforce; and it is not resorted to if the assets of the corporation, including unpaid stock, are sufficient to pay the creditors.

Are the amounts unpaid by stockholders on their shares of capital stock assets within the meaning of the law? We think that much of the confusion in the law upon this subject is removed, and the solution of some of the questions in this case simplified when we recognize, as we must, that before the enactment of our incorporation law it had become a well-settled American doctrine that unpaid stock of a corporation constitutes in equity a trust fund for the benefit of creditors of the corporation. The doctrine was first announced by Mr. Justice Story in Wood v. Dummer (1824) 3 Mason, 308, Fed. Cas. No. 17,944. And in Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 56, 23 L. ed. 220, it was said: "The capital stock of an incorporated company is a fund set apart for the payment of its debts. It is a substitute for the personal liability which subsists in private copartnerships. When debts are incurred, a contract arises with the creditors that it shall not be withdrawn or applied, otherwise than upon their demands, until such demands are satisfied. The creditors have a lien upon it in equity. . . . It is publicly pledged to those who deal with the corporation, for their security. Unpaid stock is as much a part of this pledge, and as much a part of the assets of the company, as the cash which has been paid in upon it. Creditors have the same right to look to it as to anything else, and the same right to insist upon its payment as upon the payment of any other debt due to the company: As regards creditors, there is no distinction between such a demand and any other asset which may form a part of the property and effects of the corporation."

Corporation—unpaid stock—
trust fund.

One reason urged for the contention that unpaid stock is not liable for the debts of the corporation, as we understand the arguments, is because the company issued the stock as full-paid, and agreed that it should be nonassessable. There can be no question, in view of the authorities, that, in the absence of such an agreement, unpaid stock is liable for the debts of the corporation and constitutes assets for such purpose.

—unpaid stock

And clearly, according to the authorities, the agreement referred to —agreement that stock shall not be paid for—ultra vires.

was ultra vires and void, so that the situation is the same as though there was no such agreement. Stripped of the agreement, it is a plain case of an issuance of stock by the company and acceptance by the holder without being paid for. Under such circumstances there can be no doubt that the acceptor impliedly agreed, and is equitably bound, to pay for the stock. Then it follows that even if the corporation, because of its agreement, could not enforce payment, the receiver appointed under the Insolvency Statute would have a right, in a court of equity and under the direction of the chancellor, to collect it, there being no other assets out of which the debts of the corporation could be paid. Money or property paid for capital stock are assets liable for the debts of the company, and why should money due but unpaid for such stock not be equally liable? Unpaid subscriptions unquestionably are liable because they are legal assets, and in our opinion the acceptor of stock not paid for or subscribed for, is likewise bound to pay for it, and his liability constitutes an equitable asset which a statutory receiver can enforce. It is admitted that such a receiver has power to collect unpaid subscriptions to the corporation for capital stock because the relation between the stockholder and the company is contractual and the unpaid subscription an asset of the corporation. But a contract or promise to pay may be implied as well as express, and it clearly appears from the authorities that the acceptance of shares of stock under a law similar to ours, without subscription, raises an implied promise to pay for them. Some courts call such a liability an equitable asset, but whatever it may be called it is a liability that may be enforced to pay the debts of the corporation, and by no one more properly than a receiver appointed under the Insolvency Statute.

—promise to pay for stock.

In See v. Heppenheimer, 69 N. J. Eq. 36, 78, 61 Atl. 860, the court said: "In equity, and as against creditors, the acceptance of stock, without paying for it, places the acceptor in the position of a subscriber."

See also Odd Fellows Hall Co. v. Glazier, 5 Harr. (Del.) 172; Easton Nat. Bank v. American Brick & Tile Co. 70 N. J. Eq. 732, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 271, 64 Atl. 917, 10 Ann. Cas. 84; Holcombe v. Trenton White City Co. 80 N. J. Eq. 122, 82 Atl. 618.

The common stock having been issued without consideration, it is contended that such an issue was ultra vires and void, and being void, the holders thereof cannot be held liable to the creditors of the company.

This contention would be stronger if the issuance of the stock was ultra vires, and therefore void. But this is a different case from those referred to in which the stock issued was in excess of that authorized by the charter of the company. There the act was held to be ultra vires because the corporation had no power to issue the stock at all. It is not contended in this case that the corporation had no authority to issue the stock, but that it is void because it was issued without being paid for, and under an agreement that it should not be paid for.

It was said in the case of Rosoff v. Gilbert Transp. Co. (D. C.) 221 Fed. 986: "Any contract by the company to issue shares at less than par was consequently ultra vires. The defendant, by taking the shares in question, became, under his contract of membership, liable to pay $100 for each of them. The condition that less was to be accepted, being ultra vires, was void. . . . The company which the receiver represented could, therefore, have maintained this action, and the plaintiff has the same right."

The company in the present case having the right to issue the amount of stock that was issued, the only act that was ultra vires and void in the transaction was the issuance of the stock without its being paid for and the agreement that it was full-paid and nonassessable. In legal effect, therefore, it was the same as though it had been issued without any such agreement.

The law of this state contemplates that stock may be issued contrary to the statute, that is, without being paid for, and if it is so issued the acceptors are made liable to the creditors of the company to the extent of its par value. If the stock issued without consideration is void, and therefore nonassessable for the payment of creditors' claims, there was no reason for the law that provides for its assessment. The law means, and practically says: Corporate stock shall not be issued without valid consideration, but if it is so issued, contrary to law, the acceptor will be bound to pay its par value if the debts of the company cannot be paid otherwise.

The cases cited that were brought to enforce the stockholder's liability for unpaid stock would not have arisen if the issuance of the stock was void, because they were brought to enforce the stockholder's liability for stock that was issued contrary to law.

Although the Constitution of this state provides that "no corporation shall issue stock, except for money paid, labor done, or personal property," etc. (art. 9, § 3), it cannot be that directors who have issued bonus stock to themselves, or acquiesced in its issue, with full knowledge of all the circumstances, can escape the liability the law imposes by claiming that their stock was issued in violation of law. Persons who accept stock issued in violation of law, of which they had knowledge, cannot escape the liability incident to the relation of stockholders which they have with full knowledge assumed.

And even though stock issued without consideration could be held to be void under our constitutional provision, and could be canceled by the corporation or upon the application of bona fide stockholders, it does not follow that the acceptor of such stock could claim immunity from assessment. Certainly a stockholder cannot escape such assessment if he has held himself out, or permitted himself to be held out, as the owner of the stock; and much less could he escape if he participated in the unlawful issue or acquiesced therein.

It is insisted that the liability of common stockholders to pay the debts of the corporation cannot be enforced, if at all, until after subscriptions to the preferred stock have been collected; and the reason assigned is that subscriptions to the preferred stock are contracts made with the company, and constitute assets which the corporation might have collected, and which, therefore, its receiver can collect.

Such subscriptions being clearly property or legal assets of the company, it is argued that they must be collected and applied in payment of the debts of the corporation before the common stockholders, whose stock was not subscribed for and not paid for, can be assessed, because the liability of such stockholders is not an asset of the corporation.

But the statute that imposes the liability makes no distinction, and creates no priority, between stock subscribed for and that which is issued and accepted without being subscribed for. All stockholders to whom was issued stock not paid for are liable under the statute, and no distinction can be made between preferred and common holders without adding something to the statute. And, moreover, there is, as already said, a contractual relation in both cases, the promise to pay being express where the stock is subscribed for and implied where it is not.

Certainly no good reason can be given why one class of stock should be liable for the debts of the company before another, if neither has been paid for. The liability is the same, and the test, under the statute, is not the class or character of the stock, but whether it has been paid for.

It is contended by one of the appellants, a holder of shares of preferred stock, that "the issue of preferred stock of the company is wholly void and not subject to any assessment for the debts of the company," because the general corporation law of this state provides that "at no time shall the total amount of the preferred stock exceed two thirds of the actual capital paid in cash or property."

It is not denied that the company had authority, under its certificate of incorporation, to issue all the preferred stock that was issued; so that the contention is not based on the fact that the company issued more stock than its charter or certificate of incorporation authorized.

The question raised is simply this: Is the issue of preferred stock void, and nonassessable for the payment of creditors' claims, because the common stock had not been paid for in cash to the company? Creditors could know, and perhaps would be bound to know whether the company, under its certificate of incorporation, was authorized to issue as much preferred stock as was issued, but they could not be expected to know that the common stock had not been paid for. Indeed, they had a right to assume that the par value of the common stock had been paid to the corporation as required by law. It is reasonable, therefore, to hold that the words of the statute, "actual capital paid in cash or property," mean the par value of the common stock that is issued, and liable to be assessed for the debts of the corporation. So far as creditors are concerned stock not paid for may be treated as cash or property because it is liable for the payment of their claims. The position taken by the preferred stockholder is ingenious, but in the opinion of the court unsound in view of other provisions of the General Incorporation Law, and its manifest intent, when considered as a whole.

—exceeding proportion of stock paid in.

To hold differently would, in many cases, not only cripple but make nugatory the purpose of the law to protect creditors' claims to the extent of the par value of all stock, whether common or preferred. Moreover, the law does not contemplate that a person may subscribe for and accept preferred stock for his own benefit, hold himself out as the legal owner thereof, and escape liability to bona fide creditors on the ground that his stock was illegally issued and void. He will be estopped from making such defense.

Estoppel—to contest liability on stock.

It is further insisted by the appellants that holders of common stock not paid for are not liable to pay the debts of those creditors who extended credit to the company with knowledge of the facts and circumstances under which the common stock was issued.

It may be conceded that in the absence of a statute the decided weight of authority sustains such contention. But we think this is not the law in any jurisdiction where there is a statute making the holders of unpaid stock liable to the creditors of the company. New Jersey and Illinois have statutes very similar to ours, and in neither have the courts recognized Corporation—unpaid stock—effect of knowledge of creditors.

the rule contended for by the appellants. Our statute is very general in its language, and broad enough to comprehend all claims that are legally and equitably collectable. Under it the stockholder's liability is express and unqualified; it makes no exception and recognizes no disinction between creditors. As was said by the court in the Easton Nat. Bank Case, 70 N. J. Eq. 732, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 271, 64 Atl. 917, 10 Ann. Cas. 84: "In this state, however, the stockholder's liability to creditors no longer depends upon" the trust fund theory, but is held to be statutory. "It depends upon the stockholder's voluntary acceptance, for consideration touching his own interest, of a statutory scheme to which watered stock, under whatever device issued, is absolutely alien, and which requires stock subscriptions to be made good for the benefit of creditors of insolvent companies, without distinction between prior and subsequent creditors, or between creditors who had notice and those who had none."

But while our statute protects all creditors of the corporation, it comprehends only such claims as are just and valid under the well-settled principles of law. If the proceeding is brought in equity it must be governed by the principles of equity. And this leads us to inquire whether the claims of those creditors who gave credit to the company with full knowledge of all the facts attending the issuance of the stock, and who actively participated in the issuance of the stock, can enforce payment against the stockholders in a court of equity.

We are clearly of the opinion that mere knowledge that stock issued as full-paid and nonassessable was not in fact paid for should not preclude the creditor from enforcing the liability of the holder because the creditor may also know or have good reason to believe that the holders of such stock would be legally liable for the debts of the company to the extent of the par value of their stock. While the creditor with knowledge could not have given credit upon faith that the stock was paid for, he may very well have given credit upon the belief that the holder of the stock would be liable to the creditors under the statute, whether he had paid for it or not.

It was said in the Easton National Bank Case: "Why, if they knew the stock issued as full-paid was not full-paid in fact, may they not be justified in dealing with the very stockholder's liability thus arising as a part of the assets of the company for the purpose of satisfying creditors' claims?"

It did seem to the court for a while that the rule should be different if the creditor had actually participated in the issuance of unpaid stock as full-paid and nonassessable, or had consented thereto. The court were strongly inclined to believe that such a creditor should be estopped in a court of equity from enforcing his claim against other stockholders to whom stock was issued with his assistance or acquiescence. It seemed like permitting a party to take advantage of his own wrong, or to profit by an illegal transaction in which he was, in a sense, particeps criminis.

But after a most careful consideration of the question we were forced to the conclusion that such a position could not be sustained by reason or authority. In Illinois and Connecticut, the courts have held that knowledge was not a bar, and the reasoning is broad enough to cover participation as well. But the courts of New Jersey have dealt with cases in which participation was distinctly urged as a bar. The strong and leading case in which this question was involved is the Easton National Bank Case. The court in that case carefully considered the question whether a creditor who was a stockholder with full knowledge of all the facts and circumstances connected with the issuance of the stock not paid for, and who in fact managed or directed the issuance of such stock, could enforce the statutory liability of stockholders in his own behalf. The reasoning of the court seems to us to be sound and unanswerable.

Estoppel—to enforce stockholder's liability.

Justice Pitney, in delivering the opinion, considered the status of a creditor with knowledge only, and also one who had participated, saying: "As to the status of Frederick Green in the case before us, the evidence does not satisfy us that he participated in the arrangement for the issuance of this stock for the patents. . . . There is nothing, therefore, to bar his individual claim save that he had notice of the fact that the stock was issued as full-paid for property purchased. As already shown, such notice is not sufficient to debar him. As to the claim of Henry Green, he, of course, did participate actively in the transaction that resulted in the improper issuance of the stock in question, and he received a part of the stock himself. But there is nothing to show that he intended any actual fraud upon his fellow stockholders. . . . We do not believe that at that time it was at all contemplated that any creditor of the company would be permitted to remain unpaid. Judge Green was, by common consent, permitted to assume and exercise the entire management of the concerns of the company, all parties being at the time sanguine of its ultimate success. The moneys that he loaned to the company were advanced for the general benefit of the stockholders, including himself. They are a just and lawful claim as against the company, and not an inequitable claim as against the delinquent stockholders. His estate cannot be debarred on the ground of estoppel, for his associates, who are now disputing their individual liability to pay, were not at all misled by the circumstance that their stock certificates were marked 'full-paid,' and for 'property purchased,' since they knew the fact to be otherwise. Nor is the Green estate debarred by the operation of the maxim, 'in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis.' If it were seeking any advantage out of the unlawful agreement, this maxim would apply. But that agreement being absolutely void on grounds of public policy, his rights as a creditor for moneys actually advanced remain unimpaired. . . . As against the delinquent stockholders, therefore, . . . both the Green claims are entitled to payment. Payment of the Henry Green claim should, of course, be deferred until his estate contributes its proper portion of the amount necessary to satisfy the decree."

And so in the present case, Mr. Taft, one of the largest creditors, advanced a large amount of money for the general benefit of all the stockholders, and there was no thought at the time that he would be permitted to lose any part of the sum loaned to the company. He must, of course, suffer his part of the loss, but it would not be just or equitable that he should lose the entire amount he advanced for the benefit of all, and with their knowledge and consent. While all those who participated in the issuance of the stock were acting contrary to law, there is nothing to indicate that anyone was seeking to perpetrate a fraud upon the others, or gain an unfair advantage by the transaction. They were acting in good faith towards one another for the accomplishment of a common object, and it is just and equitable that one who gave credit to the company under such circumstances should be able to collect his claim under the statute.

If at the time the delinquent stockholders are given an opportunity to make defense, it is shown that any creditor is not equitably entitled to collect his claim, it will be the duty of the chancellor to so decide. All that this court determines now is that any person who advanced money, rendered services, or contributed other valuable thing to the company honestly, in good faith, and for the general benefit of all, is entitled to recover under the statute, from the delinquent stockholders, his just, reasonable, and equitable claim.

It is strongly insisted by the appellants that it is inequitable that the stockholders should be assessed and required to pay their assessments before their legal liability is definitely determined, because the amounts assessed may be very much in excess of what they are legally liable to pay. We think this is the correct procedure and should have been adopted by the chancellor, but our conclusion that knowledge or participation on the part of the creditor whose claim is just and equitable constitutes no defense for the stockholder covers every claim, with the possible exception of that of the company's counsel, which is strongly opposed by the appellants because it was upon his advice that the bonus stock was issued as full paid and nonassessable. We do not think this court would be justified, under the circumstances, in ordering the assessments already —setting aside

made set aside on account of this one claim, which the stockholders will be permitted to contest, if they desire to do so, at the time the distribution of the fund paid in is adjusted.

With respect to the payment or allowance of interest on creditors' claims the court are of the opinion that the general rule should prevail. While it seems to be the rule in courts of equity that claims against an insolvent corporation should not bear interest after the appointment of a receiver, the reason is based largely upon the fact of insolvency, and the consequent insufficiency of the assets to pay the entire indebtedness. In the case of Blair v. Clayton Enterprise Co. 9 Del. Ch. 95, 77 Atl. 740, cited by the appellants, the court, in holding that interest should be calculated on claims down to the date of the order of the appointment of a receiver, said: "This is the settled practice in the administration of estates of insolvent corporations in Delaware."

But the reason for such rule does not exist where the assets or property legally liable for the payment of creditors' claims is sufficient to pay all of them, including interest. If the creditor had brought an action at law, as he might have done under the statute, or had filed in chancery what is known as a creditor's bill, it would not be contended, we think, that interest could not be collected from the time suit is brought, if there are sufficient assets to pay it.

Interest—on claims against insolvent corporation.

This is the law in those jurisdictions where the statute provides that stockholders shall be liable for the debts of the company to the extent of the par value of their stocks, and when the proceeding is directly against the stockholders. Burr v. Wilcox, 22 N. Y. 551; Handy v. Draper, 89 N. Y. 334; Mason v. Alexander, 44 Ohio St. 318, 7 N. E. 435; Corning v. McCullough, 1 N. Y. 58, 49 Am. Dec. 287; Baker v. Atlas Bank, 9 Met. 182; Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628, 24 L. ed. 365. And under the National Banking Act (Act Cong. June 3, 1864, chap. 106, 13 Stat. at L. 99), it has been held that interest runs from the date of the comptroller's order to collect an amount equal to the full par value of the stock, the amount due from the stockholders being then liquidated and payable. Casey v. Galli, 94 U. S. 673, 24 L. ed. 168. In Burr v. Wilcox the court said: "This liability cannot, I think, be said to attach upon any particular stockholder until a suit is commenced against him to enforce it. The creditor has a right to select among the stockholders the individual against whom he will proceed; and until he has made this selection, no particular stockholder is liable, and hence no interest can be allowed for any previous time." But, from the time of the commencement of a suit for a debt exceeding the amount of the principal of the defendant's stock, I see no reason why interest should not be allowed. It has then become a fixed liability for a specific amount, and ought, upon general principles, to carry interest."

In the Ohio case the contentions of the parties were very clearly stated by the court as follows: "It was held by the district court that interest should be charged against the stockholders as of the date of the commencement of suit. The contention on part of plaintiffs in error is that in no case can the stockholder be liable for a sum beyond the amount of his stock, to be determined at the time the liability is finally fixed by judicial decree. In other words, that the liability is one created by statutory enactment under the Constitution, to be enforced by decree, and interest cannot be added except by virtue of the decree of the court declaring the liability, and no interest can accrue against the stockholder until the liability is thus declared. On the other hand, the claim is that, while the liability is created by the Constitution and the statute, yet the stockholder places himself under liability by contract when he subscribes for or acquires the stock; and, resting as well upon contract as upon statute, the interest follows the maturing of the obligation, which is at the time when the corporation becomes insolvent and refuses to pay."

The court said: "We agree with the counsel that the question is one which, upon principle, is of very considerable difficulty. . . . The district court, in holding the stockholders for interest after the commencement of the suit, evidently followed the law of that case [Hooker v. Kilgour, 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 350]; and, inasmuch as it has been generally acquiesced in as furnishing the true rule, we are not prepared to say it is not the law in this state."

In analogy to the cases mentioned we hold, in the present case, that interest should commence at the time the receivers asked the court to make an assessment upon the stockholders for the payment of creditors' claims, there being nothing before which indicated that they would be expected to pay such claims.

In respect to the expenses and compensation of receivers, and the fees of their counsel, the court are of the opinion that, inasmuch as the receivers are officers or instrumentalities appointed by the court to collect the creditors' claims and carry out the purpose of the statute, they are entitled to

compensation—

proper expenses and reasonable compensation to be paid by the stockholders. They are a part of the machinery employed by the court to accomplish the object sought under the statute, and their expenses and compensation are, therefore, legitimate court costs to be taxed against the respondents.

We think no good reason can be shown why the fees of receiver's counsel should be separately taxed as a part of the costs. Inasmuch, however, as such is the established practice in this state, the court are not disposed to change it. It is not certain in many cases that services of counsel will be required, and even if they should be, it is impossible to tell even approximately, in advance of the service, what counsel will be entitled to receive. The court are of the opinion that the sum estimated by the chancellor for receiver's compensation and expenses, and the fees of their counsel, as well as the estimate for interest on creditors' claims, is largely in excess of what they will be entitled to receive; that said sums should be substantially reduced, and the assessments modified accordingly.

In conclusion, we say that, while we have no doubt the court below had power to require a resident stockholder to pay the entire assessment, we think it inequitable under the facts of this case, and, therefore, hold that the receivers should have been ordered to collect every assessment they should find to be collectable, and that would justify the expense of collection. The entire burden of payment should not, in the first instance, have been imposed upon a single

resident stockholder.

stockholder, even though there be no other found in the jurisdiction. The course adopted may be the most convenient for the receivers and expeditious for the creditors, but, in our opinion, hardly fair to the resident stockholder.

And, moreover, it may very well be that statutory receivers appointed by the court would be more successful in collecting claims out of the state than a stockholder who might be subrogated to their rights by an order of said court. But whether that be so or not, it is manifestly unfair that the resident stockholder should, in this case, pay not only all the indebtedness, but also the costs of collecting from other stockholders their proportional parts of the assessment. Under the peculiar facts and circumstances of this case the fair and equitable proceeding would be for the receivers to collect all the assessments, so far as practicable, and by so doing the burden would fall on all stockholders alike according to their holdings.

The decree of the Chancellor will be affirmed, except as modified by this opinion.

Heisel, J., concurring:

I concur in the opinion of the court, excepting as to the claims of Mr. Taft and Mr. Chapin.

Briefly and without argument, I desire to state my conclusions as to those claims. Mr. Taft was a director and promoter of the company from its beginning, and was fully advised of all actions taken in issuing the common stock as bonus for the preferred stock, and participated therein. He knew that the preferred stock was being sold at par, and the common stock, which had been declared by him and the other directors of the company to be "full-paid and nonassessable," was being issued as a bonus to purchasers of said preferred stock who had nothing to do with the management of the company, to induce them to purchase the preferred stock. He could not, therefore, in good faith, have relied upon any assessment from such holders of common stock to repay advances made by him to the company in the event of the failure of the company to repay him such advances. Mr. Chapin was counsel for the company, and advised and directed the steps taken by Mr. Taft and the other directors in pursuing the course they did pursue. He directed them in the action they took to make the common stock, as he thought, "full-paid and nonassessable," and knew that, as such, it was being issued as a bonus to purchasers of the preferred stock, who had no part in the management of the company, as an inducement to purchase that stock. He now claims the right to have this same common stock assessed in order that he may be paid for his services.

Excepting in the state of New Jersey, where the proceeding was under a statute which the court there said put the creditor's right on a different basis from that under the general law, the overwhelming weight of authority is opposed to such proceeding.

Whether the proceeding in the case at bar for the purpose of assessing the stockholders is under the liability imposed by § 20 of the Incorporation Act, or is under the liability that existed prior to that section, can be of no importance, because § 20 imposed no new liability upon the stockholder, but simply stated or declared a liability that existed prior to its passage.

Therefore it seems to me that the law as generally applied by the courts outside New Jersey should be applied here.

In most jurisdictions, it is held that, where a creditor knows at the time he extends credit that shares of the capital stock of a corporation have not in fact been paid in full, he will be estopped from enforcing the stockholders' liability for the difference between the amount paid, or value delivered, and the par value of the stock.

The reason of the rule has been stated as follows: "Recovery of a creditor from a stockholder for unpaid subscription for stock, or, in event of payment in property, for the undervaluation, is allowed on the theory that a fraud has been practised on the creditor, who has the right, in dealing with the corporation, to assume that its stock is fully paid; and, of course, there can be no recovery where the creditor deals with full knowledge that payment therefor has not been made." Watt v. German Sav. Bank (Iowa) supra.

So, it was said in Courtney v. Youngs (1918) 202 Mich. 384, 168 N. W. 441, that "those creditors who participate in a transaction involving the transfer of corporate property at fraudulent valuation, who deal with the company with actual knowledge of what its assets are, and who extend credit knowing fully that the capital stock has been exchanged for property, and know for what property it was exchanged, cannot, when the venture proves disastrous, call upon stockholders upon the theory that they extended credit in reliance upon the capital stock and its being fully paid."

In First Nat. Bank v. Gustin Minerva Consol. Min. Co. (1890) 42 Minn. 327, 6 L.R.A. 676, 18 Am. St. Rep. 510, 44 N. W. 198, it was said: "The whole doctrine that the capital stock of corporations is a trust fund for the payment of creditors rests upon the equitable consideration that the distribution of the capital among stockholders, without making adequate provision for the payment of debts, or the issue of fictitiously paid-up stock, is a fraud upon creditors who contract with the corporation in reliance upon its capital remaining intact, or in reliance upon the professed capital having been in fact paid up in full. But when the reason for the rule does not exist the rule itself ceases to apply.

. . . If a party deals with a corporation with full knowledge of the fact that its nominal paid-up capital has not in fact been paid for in money or property to the full amount of its par value, he deals solely on the faith of what has been actually paid in, and has no equitable right to insist on the contribution of a greater amount of capital by the shareholders than the corporation itself could claim as part of its assets."

In Berry v. Rood (1901) 168 Mo. 316, 67 S. W. 644, it was said: "If a person, knowing that a corporation has accepted certain property in full payment of its stock, sees fit with that knowledge to lend money to the corporation, he has no more right to call the stockholder to further account for his debt than would the corporation itself."

And in Biggs v. Westen (1912) 248 Mo. 333, 154 S. W. 708, the court said: "The law is well settled in this state that no creditor of a corporation, who becomes such with knowledge that its stock, though purporting to have been paid in full, was in point of fact neither paid nor to be paid, but was issued merely as a bonus for the subscription and payment for other stock, can enforce his claim against the corporation by compelling its shareholders to pay to the corporation, its trustee, or other representative, any portion of the stock so donated."

And in Colonial Trust Co. v. McMillan (1905) 188 Mo. 547, 107 Am. St. Rep. 335, 87 S. W. 933, the court said: "It is good law that, underlying the trust-fund theory and the true-value theory, is the proposition that creditors have the right to assume that stock has been fully paid in money or money's worth . . . and to extend credit on the faith of such assumption; but because of this underlying proposition it follows that if a creditor of an insolvent corporation did not extend credit on the faith of shareholders having paid their stock subscriptions in money or money's worth, but, to the contrary, knew at the time of the creation of the corporate debt that such stock was paid for in simulated values, he is not entitled to the remedy here sought."

In Lea v. Iron Belt Mercantile Co. (1898) 119 Ala. 271, 24 So. 28, the court said: "A creditor of a corporation who became such with knowledge that the corporation had received from a stockholder, in full payment of his stock, property at a gross overvaluation, cannot require such subscribers to pay for its benefit the difference between the par value of the stock and the real value of the land."

It was said in Adamant Mfg. Co. v. Wallace (1897) 16 Wash. 614, 48 Pac. 415: "While the doctrine of trust fund is accepted in its broadest sense, it is well settled that a trust will not be impressed upon the stock of the corporation in the hands of the stockholders for the benefit of creditors who dealt with the corporation with knowledge of the fact that the stock had been paid for in property the value of which was less than the face value of the stock."

The Wyoming supreme court has said: "The great weight of authority appears to us to be that one dealing with a corporation with knowledge that stock has been issued as full-paid in exchange for property at an amount above its actual value cannot hold such stockholder for the difference between the actual value of the property and the par value of the stock, in the absence of fraud." Tuttle v. Rohrer (1915) 23 Wyo. 305, 149 Pac. 857, 153 Pac. 27.

In Davies v. Ball (1911) 64 Wash. 292, 116 Pac. 833, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 750, the court, discussing the defenses available to the stockholders in a creditor's action for the alleged unpaid balance on their shares, said: "They should be permitted to show, if they can, that the creditors in whose behalf this action was brought, or any of them, dealt with the corporation with knowledge of the fact that the stock was issued for property of less value than the par value of the stock. Any such creditor will be estopped to participate in the trust fund created by an enforcement of the liability of the stockholders."

In Coit v. North Carolina Gold Amalgamating Co. (1886) 119 U. S. 343, 30 L. ed. 420, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231, the creditor of an insolvent corporation sought to enforce the liability of its stockholders to the extent of the amount alleged to be unpaid on the shares of stock held by them. It appeared that the capital stock had been issued as fully paid, in consideration of property received at a large overvaluation. The plaintiff was aware, at the time he extended credit, that the stock was being issued for a fictitious value, and placed no reliance on the supposed paid-up capital of the corporation. The court held that in the absence of actual fraud a creditor must rely on his faith that the stock had been fully paid to justify a recovery of the alleged unpaid balance on the shares, and that the knowledge of the plaintiff that such was not the case barred the action.

In Bank of Ft. Madison v. Alden (1889) 129 U. S. 372, 32 L. ed. 725, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 382, the plaintiff, as creditor of an insolvent corporation, sought to hold a stockholder liable for the amount alleged unpaid on his stock, which, it seemed, had been purchased with lands not exceeding in cash value 40 per cent of the amount subscribed, and which lands had been later reconveyed. The defense was interposed that the plaintiff had become a creditor with full knowledge of the conditions under which the stock was issued, and the court held that, this being so, the stockholder was not liable.

In Rickerson Roller-Mill Co. v. Farrell Foundry & Mach. Co. (1896) 23 C. C. A. 302, 43 U. S. App. 452, 75 Fed. 554, it was held that one who became a creditor of a corporation with knowledge of an agreement by which the corporation contracted to receive less than the par value of its stock from a subscriber would be estopped, on the insolvency of the corporation, from requiring the stockholder to pay his stock in full.

In Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Cotton Exch. Real Estate Co. (1895) 70 Fed. 155, the plaintiff, seeking to recover the amount of a judgment against an insolvent corporation, alleged that the defendants, as stockholders of the corporation, had not fully paid the amount of their stock subscriptions. The defense was interposed that the plaintiff had been advised of the overvaluation of the property for which the stock was issued, and that he should be estopped, for this reason, from enforcing the liability of the stockholders for the excess of the valuation. It appeared that a conspicuous recital of the valuation placed on the property which was to sustain the issue of stock was printed on the back of the bonds which plaintiff had acquired, and the court held that he had sufficient notice to estop him from maintaining the action.

In Cunningham v. Holley, M. M. & Co. (1903) 58 C. C. A. 140, 121 Fed. 720, wherein it appeared that one who had participated in an incorporation in which stock was issued as full-paid, for property at an overvaluation, afterwards became a creditor of the corporation, it was held that his knowledge of the circumstances under which the stock was issued estopped him from proceeding against the stockholders as for the actual unpaid balance on their stock. The court added: "When stock is so paid for and property is so taken in payment, it is the general rule that the transaction cannot be impeached, even at the suit of a creditor of the corporation, except for fraud. . . . And this is especially true where the creditor has dealt with the corporation with full knowledge of the transaction whereby the shares were paid for, or was a party thereto."

In Anglo-American Land Mortg. & Agency Co. v. Lombard (1904) 68 C. C. A. 89, 132 Fed. 721, writ of certiorari denied in (1904) 196 U. S. 638, 49 L. ed. 630, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 793, the plaintiffs, as creditors of a corporation, sought to enforce the payment of claimed unpaid subscriptions to stock held by the defendants. It appeared that the corporation, without any legitimate basis therefor, had issued a stock dividend of 50 per cent on its capital stock, and the plaintiffs maintained that the law implied a promise on the part of those who received the additional stock to pay par value therefor when called on by creditors. The court upheld this contention as an abstract proposition, but since it appeared that the plaintiffs had, with full knowledge of all the facts, acquiesced in this transfer, it was held that they were estopped from recovering on the theory of unpaid balances on stock.

In the case of Re Charles Town Light & P. Co. (1912) 199 Fed. 846, the court stated that creditors who have extended credit to a corporation, with knowledge that stock has been issued for property received at an overvaluation, are estopped, in the absence of actual fraud, from thereafter recovering from the holders the unpaid balance of the shares.

Where a creditor sought to recover the unpaid balances on stock subscriptions, which balances existed by reason of a stockholders' agreement that shares should be deemed fully paid on the receipt of $50 therefor, in which agreement the creditor had joined, the court held that the creditor's knowledge of the transaction would estop him from enforcing the stockholders' liability. Richardson v. Chicago Packing & Provision Co. (1900) 6 Cal. Unrep. 606, 63 Pac. 74.

In SHERMAN v. HARLEY (reported herewith) ante, 950, the plaintiff, as assignee of a creditor of a corporation, sought to recover from the defendants the several amounts claimed to be due for the unpaid portion of their subscriptions as stockholders in the debtor corporation. The stock in question had been issued for property admittedly of value less than the par value of the stock. The defendants maintained that the plaintiff was not in a position to recover, since, at the time credit was extended to the corporation, he was fully aware of the transactions through which the issuance of the stock as full-paid was made. The court, holding with the defendants, said: "The law is well settled in this state that, when at the inception of its enterprise a corporation issues its stock for a consideration in money or property of admitted value less than the par value of such stock, the subscribers to such stock giving such consideration are liable to the corporation and to its creditors for the unpaid portion of the subscription. . . . The basis of this doctrine . . . is that credit is given in reliance on the presumption that full par value has been received by the corporation for the stock it has issued as fully paid. Where, however, it appears . . . that the particular creditor, at the time the credit was given, extended the credit with full knowledge of the difference between the par value of the stock and the value of the property received for it, an exception to the rule exists."

And in Hill v. Silvey (1888) 81 Ga. 513, 3 L.R.A. 150, 8 S. E. 808, it was held that the creditors of a corporation, by dealing with it after knowledge that its stock was not in fact full-paid, had impliedly waived their right to call on the stockholders for the unpaid balances on their shares. The court said: "If a person should contract with a corporation, or voluntarily give it credit, knowing that its capital had not been fully paid up, but was declared to be fully paid up for the purpose of discharging the shareholders from further liability, the evident intention of both parties would be to make the agreement subject to these conditions; and there would be no equity in charging the shareholders with any further liability on account of the obligation so incurred by the company."

Where creditors extended credit to a corporation with the knowledge that its stock was being issued as fully paid at 14 cents a share, and, on the subsequent insolvency of the corporation, action was brought to satisfy their claim by collecting a part of the difference between the price paid and the par value of the stock, the court said: "Such creditors, with knowledge of the agreement between the corporation and the shareholders, must have extended credit on the strength of the corporation, its business, prospects, and tangible property. They were not induced to give credit to the corporation by reason of a liability against the shareholders which they knew did not exist, and the shareholders were under no obligation to inform such creditors of the nature and terms of their agreement with the corporation when the facts were equally well known to all. Under such circumstances, creditors have no equitable right to collect a greater sum from the stockholders than the corporation itself could claim as a part of its assets." Reel v. Brammer (1918) 56 Ind. App. 180, 101 N. E. 1043.

In Bent v. Underdown (1901) 156 Ind. 516, 60 N. E. 307, the creditors of an insolvent corporation sought to collect the unpaid balances on shares held by stockholders of the corporation, it appearing that the shares, with a par value of $100, had been issued for $15. The court held that the unpaid balance on the stock could not be recovered, saying: "The articles of association which informed the public of the amount of the capital stock of the corporation also gave notice that the stockholders were under no obligation to pay more than $15 on each share of the stock subscribed, and that said restriction could only be modified, amended, or repealed by the unanimous consent of all the stockholders. The stockholders made this contract with the corporation, and the public were advised of the same by the articles of association, which were recorded, as required by law, in two public offices in this state. As the stockholders have paid all they agreed to pay, the corporation can claim no more. The creditors, being fully advised of said contract, . . . did not give the corporation credit on the faith of the capital stock being paid in full, but relied upon the part the stockholders agreed to pay. As this has been paid, the creditors can recover no more from the stockholders."

Where the original creditor was a party to an agreement by which the defendant stockholder had purchased stock for 50 cents a share, it was held that an assignee of the creditor could acquire no higher rights against the defendant than his assignor had, and that knowledge of the agreement would preclude the plaintiff from recovering from the stockholder the unpaid balance on his stock. Callanan v. Windsor (1889) 78 Iowa, 193, 42 N. W. 652.

In State Trust Co. v. Turner (1900)

111 Iowa, 664, 53 L.R.A. 186, 82 N. W. 1029, the assignee of a creditor of a corporation sought to recover the unpaid balance on shares held by the defendant, it appearing that such shares had been issued for property at an excessive overvaluation. The court stated that such payment for stock was payment only to the extent of the property received, but held against the plaintiff, since it appeared that his assignor had knowledge of the circumstances under which the stock was issued. The court quoted Bank of Ft. Madison v. Alden (1889) 129 U. S. 872, 32 L. ed. 725, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 332, as laying down the rule applicable to the case, as follows: "Where the creditor has full knowledge of the transaction between the corporation and its stockholder at the time he extends credit, he cannot be heard to complain, for the reason that no credit is given upon a representation of a different set of facts than those which actually existed."

And in Watt v. German Sav. Bank (1917) 188 Iowa, 346, 165 N. W. 897, the proposition was reaffirmed that where a creditor deals with a corporation with knowledge that its stock is not full-paid, or that shares have been issued as full-paid on receipt of property at an overvaluation, there can be no recovery from a stockholder for the unpaid balance on his shares.

Likewise, in Walburn v. Chenault (1890) 43 Kan. 352, 23 Pac. 657, wherein it appeared that a creditor had become such with knowledge that shares were being issued as full-paid, in consideration of property conveyed to the corporation, at an overvaluation, it was held that such knowledge would estop him from enforcing a liability against the stockholders as for unpaid stock.

In Young v. Erie Iron Co. (1887) 65 Mich. 111, 31 N. W. 814, the plaintiff sought to recover the amount of a judgment against the defendant mining corporation, by levying on the unpaid balances on shares held by the defendant stockholders. It appeared that the corporation had issued "full-paid" stock for property received at an overvaluation. There was no allegation in the creditor's bill that he did not know the circumstances under which the stock was issued as full-paid. The court said: "Although it is a well-established doctrine, founded upon just principles, that the capital stock of a corporation, and especially its unpaid capital in the hands of subscribers or purchasers from the corporation, is a trust fund for the satisfaction of the debts of an insolvent corporation, yet it is equally well settled that persons dealing with corporations may consent to existing arrangements, and by contracting with them, with notice or knowledge of arrangements which limit the liability of the subscribers to pay the full amount of the capital stock, may expressly or impliedly waive the right to compel the stockholders to contribute the full amount of their subscriptions in discharge of corporation obligations." And the court added that "persons . . . contracting with mining corporations, knowing that its capital was not fully paid up, but so declared for the purpose of discharging its stockholders from the unpaid portion thereof, should be considered and held as having done so subject to these conditions."

And in Ten Eyck v. Pontiac, O. & P. A. R. Co. (1897) 114 Mich. 494, 72 N. W. 862, it was held that a stockholder who later became a creditor could not enforce the liability of the other stockholders to the extent of the unpaid portion of their shares, where he had participated in the issue of the shares as full-paid, with knowledge that but a small part had been actually paid therefor.

In Utica Fire Alarm Teleg. Co. v. Waggoner Watchman Clock Co. (1911) 166 Mich. 618, 182 N. W. 502, it appeared that one of the stock purchasers of a corporation, who had subsequently become a creditor, sought to participate in the unpaid balance on the shares of stockholders who had subscribed thereto, in an agreement whereby 25 per cent was accepted as full payment for the stock issued. The creditor had been a party to the agreement to purchase stock for less than par, and the court said: "Under the circumstances, may he who became a creditor, after full knowledge of the terms of sale of this stock, participate in the fund created by requiring the stock to be paid in full? An ordinary creditor with such knowledge would have no such right, for the reason that the want of such knowledge is the basis of the right on the part of a creditor to require full payment for such stock. . . . The defendant, a stock purchaser, who was a party to the transaction of purchase for less than par, on becoming a creditor, can claim no greater equities than an ordinary creditor."

Where the administratrix of one who had been both a creditor and stockholder of a corporation sought to hold certain stockholders liable for the alleged unpaid balance on their stock, which had been issued for property at a large overvaluation, and it appeared that the deceased, when he extended credit, had knowledge of the basis on which the stock was issued as nominally full-paid, the court held that no recovery could be had, since the creditor had not been defrauded. Carp v. Chipley (1898) 78 Mo. App. 22.

Where, in an action to charge a stockholder to the amount of the alleged unpaid balance on his stock, it appeared that the plaintiff knew, when he extended credit, that the stock of the corporation had been issued as nominally full-paid, in consideration of property taken at an overvaluation, the court refused to allow a recovery, saying: "The great weight of authority in this country is to the effect that in such an action it is essential to establish fraud, and that the creditor must be one who in good faith gave credit in the belief that the stock was full-paid or the stockholders were bound for the unpaid balance." Woolfolk v. January (1895) 131 Mo. 620, 33 S. W. 432.

Where the plaintiff, as a corporation creditor, sought to recover an alleged unpaid balance on the shares held by certain stockholders, and it appeared that he was a party to the agreement by which the shares had been issued as full-paid, for property at a fictitious value, it was held that he could not be heard to say that the stock was unpaid. The court said: "The reason of this rule is that such a person has not given credit to the company upon the faith of the unpaid subscriptions being an asset of the company." Meyer v. Ruby Trust Min. & Mill. Co. (1905) 192 Mo. 162, 90 S. W. 821.

Where it appeared that the plaintiff had been a party to an agreement whereby stock was issued as nominally full-paid, in exchange for property at an overvaluation, he was estopped from later enforcing a creditor's right to the unpaid balance on the stock, the court saying: "A stranger dealing with a corporation has a right to presume that it has issued or agreed to issue its stock only for money or money's worth for its full face value, and if the corporation has issued its stock for less, such stranger . . . may have redress on the stockholders to the extent that the stock has not been paid for in full value. . . . But this plaintiff is not in the attitude of a stranger or a creditor without notice; he was a party to the plan of the corporate organization by which it was agreed that the defendant should have this stock for the consideration of the privilege he sold to the corporation, and therefore, as to the plaintiff, it must be adjudged that the defendant has paid for his stock." Euston v. Edgar (1907) 207 Mo. 287, 105 S. W. 773.

In Scott v. Luehrmann (1919) — Mo. —, 213 S. W. 855, the plaintiffs, as judgment creditors of an insolvent corporation, sought to recover the unpaid balance on shares of stock held by the defendants. It was alleged that the defendants had been allotted shares of stock amounting to $52,500, and had paid nothing thereon. The answer alleged knowledge on the part of the plaintiffs that the capital stock of the corporation was not paid in money, and it was maintained that this knowledge would estop the plaintiffs from recovering. The court said that there was no question as to the correctness of the equitable principle that knowledge on the part of the creditor, at the time credit was extended, that shares of stock were issued to the subscribers without payment therefor, would prevent him from enforcing his claim.

In Dickinson v. Kline (1914) 96 Neb. 435, 148 N. W. 141, the plaintiff as receiver for a corporation, and to satisfy the claims of outstanding creditors, brought action against the defendants as stockholders, to recover their unpaid subscriptions for stock. It appeared that the defendants had purchased stock at the rate of $280 for ten shares with a par value of $1,000, but it further appeared that the creditors had knowledge of the tenor of the agreements, and because of this latter fact the defendants claimed that no recovery should be allowed. The court held that, since the creditors had dealt with the corporation with notice of the facts, a decree against the defendants was reversible error. The principle of law involved was stated as follows: "By the great weight of authority, in the absence of express charter, statutory, or constitutional provisions establishing a different rule, an issue of watered or fictitiously paid-up stock by a corporation, whether the issue was at a discount of its par value, or for property, labor, or services taken at an intentional overvaluation, or gratuitous, is binding upon the corporation, and as against all other parties, except in so far as it may constitute a violation of the rights of . . . subsequent creditors of the corporation. . . . The agreement that payment in full at the par value shall not be required is a fraud upon subsequent creditors who deal with the corporation on the faith of its capital stock being full-paid in fact; and a court of equity, or, by statute in some jurisdictions, a court of law, will, at the instance of creditors, compel the holders of such stock, or their transferees with notice, to pay . . . the difference between the par value of the stock and what has been paid therefor. This does not apply, however, . . . in favor of subsequent creditors who participated therein, or who dealt with the corporation with knowledge of the facts."

In Farrell v. Davis (1916) 85 Or.

218, 161 Pac. 94, 708, an action by the assignee of a creditor of an insolvent corporation to recover from the defendants their alleged unpaid stock subscriptions, the court held that, since it appeared that the creditor had knowledge, at the time he acquired his claim, that the stock had been issued for property at an overvaluation, the plaintiff could not recover.

It was held in Mathis v. Pridham (1892) 1 Tex. Civ. App. 58, 20 S. W. 1015, that where creditors had knowledge, at the time their claims arose, that the corporation was issuing $2 in stock for $1 paid, they could not hold the subscribers liable for the unpaid balance on the par value of the stock issued.

In Cole v. Adams (1898) 19 Tex. Civ. App. 507, 49 S. W. 1052, on appeal from a judgment against the defendants for the alleged unpaid balance on shares held by them, which had been issued for property at an overvaluation, it was held that, "as to creditors without notice, property conveyed in payment of stock is not to be considered as a payment, except to the extent of its money or actual value." But the court added that "creditors who had notice, when they extended credit to the corporation, of the manner in which appellants acquired their stock, could not recover."

In Whitehill v. Jacobs (1890) 75 Wis. 474, 44 N. W. 630, which was a creditor's suit against the stockholders of an insolvent corporation, it appeared that stock with a par value of $100,000, had been issued for patent rights worth not more than $50,000, and the plaintiff sought to enforce the stockholder's liability for the unpaid portion of their stock. The defendants alleged that the plaintiff had knowledge of the transaction at the time he extended credit, and should, therefore, be estopped from recovering in this action. As to this contention, the court said: "If such findings are upheld, the plaintiff is not within the rule, for they demonstrate that he did not give the credit in the belief that the stock was fully paid for, and hence has no valid claim against the stockholders individually."

But the fact that creditors of an insolvent corporation have discovered, since extending credit, that stockholders have not paid in full for their stock, will not prejudice their right to recover the unpaid balances thereon. Thus, in Scott v. Luehrmann (1919) — Mo. —, 213 S. W. 855, the court applied the above proposition, since "such subsequent knowledge does not tend to negative their reliance upon the presumption that the corporation was legally organized and its shares of stock had been issued for money or money's worth at the time of its prior contract with them."

And in Gordon v. Cummings (1914) 78 Wash. 515, 189 Pac. 489, it was held that subsequent knowledge of the creditor of a corporation that stock which had been issued as full-paid was not so in fact would not deny him the right to enforce the shareholder's liability.

It has been held that a plaintiff need not allege that he became a creditor in ignorance of the fact that stock had not been paid up, knowledge of such facts being a matter of defense, to be set out in the answer. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Cotton Exch. Real Estate Co. (1891) 46 Fed. 22.

And in Gogebic Invest. Co. v. Iron Chief Min. Co. (1891) 78 Wis. 427, 23 Am. St. Rep. 417, 47 N. W. 726, it was held that the defense that the creditor had knowledge that shares were being issued for a consideration much less than the par value was in the nature of an estoppel on the plaintiff, and need not be negated in the complaint.

b. Rights of person claiming under creditor.

The assignee of one who has extended credit to a corporation with knowledge that the stock was not in fact full-paid has no greater rights than his assignor, in enforcing the liability of stockholders for unpaid subscriptions. SHERMAN v. HARLEY (reported herewith) ante, 950; Callanan v. Windsor (1889) 78 Iowa, 193, 42 N. W. 652; State Trust Co. v. Turner (1900) 111 Iowa, 664, 53 L.R.A. 186, 82 N. W. 1029; Walburn v. Chenault

(1890) 43 Kan. 352, 23 Pac. 657; Young v. Erie Iron Co. (1887) 65 Mich. 111, 31 N. W. 814; Carp v. Chipley (1898) 73 Mo. App. 22; Meyer v. Ruby Trust Min. & Mill. Co. (1905) 192 Mo. 162, 90 S. W. 821; Farrell v. Davis (1916) 85 Or. 213, 161 Pac. 94, 703.

In SHERMAN v. HARLEY (reported herewith) ante, 950, wherein it appeared that the assignor of the plaintiff had knowledge, at the time he extended credit to a corporation, that its stock had been issued for property admittedly of a value less than the par value of the stock, the court held that this knowledge on the part of the creditor would estop the plaintiff from enforcing the liability of the stockholders for their unpaid subscriptions.

And where the creditor of an insolvent corporation was a party to an agreement by which a defendant stockholder had purchased stock for 50 cents a share, it was held that an assignee of the creditor could acquire no higher rights against the stockholders than his assignor had, and such knowledge imputed to him created an estoppel in an action to recover the unpaid balance on the stock held by the defendant. Callanan v. Windsor (1889) 78 Iowa, 193, 42 N. W. 652.

In State Trust Co. v. Turner (1900) 111 Iowa, 664, 53 L.R.A. 186, 82 N. W. 1029, the assignee of a creditor, who had knowledge, at the time he extended credit, that the stock of the corporation was not actually full-paid, was held to be estopped from recovering the unpaid amount on the shares held by the defendant.

And similarly, in Walburn v. Chenault (1890) 43 Kan. 352, 23 Pac. 657, it was held that both a creditor and his assignee were estopped from enforcing a liability against stockholders for the amount unpaid on their stock, where the creditor knew, at the time he gave credit to the corporation, that such stock was being issued as full-paid, for property conveyed at an overvaluation.

In Young v. Erie Iron Co. (1887) 65 Mich. 111, 31 N. W. 814, the plaintiff sought to collect a judgment against a corporation by levying on the unpaid balances on its shares held by the defendants. It appeared that the plaintiff's assignors had knowledge, when they advanced credit, that such shares were issued as "full-paid," in consideration of property received at an overvaluation, and the court held that the plaintiff was estopped by his assignor's knowledge from recovering the unpaid subscriptions of the defendants.

Where the administratrix of one who had been both a creditor and stockholder of a corporation sought to enforce the stockholder's liability for alleged unpaid subscriptions, and it appeared that the deceased knew, when he extended credit, that the stock was only nominally full-paid, the court held that no liability could be enforced. Carp v. Chipley (1898) 73 Mo. App. 22.

In Meyer v. Ruby Trust Min. & Mill. Co. (1905) 192 Mo. 162, 90 S. W. 821, the court held that a creditor, who had knowledge of an agreement whereby stock was issued as full-paid for property of a fictitious value, would be estopped from saying the stock was unpaid, and added that an assignee of the creditor by operation of law would stand in no better position.

Likewise, in Farrell v. Davis (1916) 85 Or. 213, 161 Pac. 94, 703, it was held that knowledge by a creditor that stock was not in fact full-paid would be imputed to his assignee, and prevent a recovery from the stockholders of the unpaid balance on their shares.

1. Record of articles of incorporation.

It seems that the record of the articles of incorporation is not constructive notice to a creditor of the circumstances attending the issuance of stock, or that the stock was not in fact full-paid. Lea v. Iron Belt Mercantile Co. (1898) 119 Ala. 271, 24 So. 28; Stout v. Hubbell (1898) 104 Iowa, 499, 73 N. W. 1060; Rogers v. Stag Min. Co. (1915) 185 Mo. App. 659, 171 S. W. 676.

In Lea v. Iron Belt Mercantile Co. (1898) 119 Ala. 271, 24 So. 28, the court conceded that a creditor of a corporation, who became such with knowledge that the corporation had received property at a gross overvaluation, in full payment of stock, could not require such subscribers to pay the difference between the par value of the stock and the real value of the land. But as to the defendant's contention that the record of incorporation proceedings, amount of capital stock, and the privilege of stockholders to convey property in exchange for stock was notice to the creditor of the overvaluation of property conveyed therefor, the court said: "We are of the opinion that the record of these facts does not operate as constructive notice to subsequent creditors of the real value of the property received in payment of the subscriptions, or that it was grossly overvalued. On the contrary, the creditor would be justified in presuming, from the record, that the law requiring subscriptions to stock to be paid in money or in property, at its reasonable value, had been strictly complied with. The law presumes, when it is shown that the stock has been paid for in full by the conveyance of property, and there is no evidence of the value of the property, that the consideration was adequate."

And where it appeared that the articles of incorporation recited that land to be purchased should be paid for by issuing stock at par, equal to the agreed valuation, the court held that this would not constitute notice of the fraudulent valuation thereof so as to estop a creditor from recovering the unpaid balance on such stock held by the defendant. Stout v. Hubbell (1898) 104 Iowa, 499, 73 N. W. 1060.

In Rogers v. Stag Min. Co. (1915) 185 Mo. App. 659, 171 S. W. 676, the defendants, in a creditor's action for an alleged unpaid balance on stock held by them, contended that a statute (Rev. Stat. 1900, §§ 2975 & 3340) providing that "a copy of the articles of incorporation shall be filed with the secretary of state and recorded in the county where the corporation is located" was constructive notice to the creditors that stock was fully paid in property of the value given, and further maintained that this knowledge would estop a creditor from claiming that the stock was not fully paid up. The court said: "We do not see how such records could give notice that the value stated was sworn to is a fictitious one. Much actual investigation would have to be made to obtain that knowledge. . . . Persons dealing with corporations have a right to assume, in the absence of actual knowledge to the contrary, that the stock is fully paid for in money or money's worth. Estoppel is based on actual knowledge of the fact, or such lack of knowledge as comes from closed eyes, and is equivalent to actual knowledge, or constructive knowledge made so by law."

And a deed recording the transfer of certain property in consideration of stock is not constructive notice that the stock is fully paid. See Osgood v. King (1876) 42 Iowa, 478, wherein the plaintiffs, as corporation creditors, sought to recover from the defendant stockholders an alleged unpaid balance on the stock held by them. It appeared that the stock had been issued for certain coal lands, and, as the plaintiffs averred, at such an overvaluation that the actual cash value paid on each $100 share of stock was about $14. On demurrer, the defendants alleged that, since the deed of the property transferred to the corporation was on record, it was constructive notice to the creditors that the stock was fully paid, and of the manner of payment. But as to this contention the court held that "it could be no constructive notice to a person proposing to trust a corporation that the capital stock had been paid by the conveyance of a certain amount of land. No one would think of looking at the records for such a purpose, nor does the law require one to do so."

But see Bent v. Underdown (1901) 156 Ind. 516, 60 N. E. 307, wherein it was held that since the recorded articles of incorporation recited that the stock was being issued for $15 a share, with a par value of $100, the creditors were fully advised thereof, and did not give the corporation credit on the faith of its capital stock being paid in full. And this constructive notice was held sufficient to estop a recovery of the unpaid 85 per cent on each share.

In Minnesota, it has been provided by statute (Gen. Stat. 1878, § 149) that in the case of mining corporations an issue or sale of stock, purporting to be full-paid, shall not be subject to any further assessments without the consent of the holder. Under that act it has been held that "persons dealing with such a corporation must be held to do so with knowledge that its stock may have been sold at less than par, and purporting to have been full-paid; that, if so sold, it is not assessable; and, consequently, that the amount of its stock outstanding cannot be relied on as indicating the amount of actual assets realized from its stock, and in its hands. There is, therefore, if there be no fraud in fact, no equity in favor of creditors against the purchasers of such stock at such a sale." Ross v. Kelly (1887) 36 Minn. 38, 29 N. W. 591.

And under a Wyoming statute directly authorizing the issuance of stock for property, and providing for a declaration of such stock as full-paid in all statements and reports by the company, it has been held that a compliance therewith by a corporation charges its creditors with notice of its actual assets, and in the absence of fraud no individual liability as for unpaid stock attaches to the shareholders. Tuttle v. Rohrer (1915) 23 Wyo. 305, 149 Pac. 857, rehearing denied in (1915) 23 Wyo. 318, 153 Pac. 27.

2. Individual knowledge of agent of creditor.

The individual knowledge of an officer or member of a bank that stock of a debtor corporation is not in fact full-paid will not be imputed to the bank so as to prevent its enforcement of a stockholder's liability for his unpaid subscription. First Nat. Bank v. Northrup (1910) 82 Kan. 638, 136 Am. St. Rep. 119, 109 Pac. 672; Mathis v. Pridham (1892) 1 Tex. Civ. App. 58, 20 S. W. 1015; Martin v. South Salem Land Co. (1896) 94 Va. 28, 26 S. E. 591.

In First Nat. Bank v. Northrup

(1910) 82 Kan. 638, 136 Am. St. Rep. 119, 109 Pac. 672, it appeared that the cashier of the plaintiff bank which had loaned money to a corporation, the stock of which was nominally but not actually paid in full, was also the president of the debtor corporation, and had acted for both parties in negotiating the loan. It was maintained by way of defense that the knowledge of the cashier was the knowledge of the bank, but that personal knowledge by its cashier that the stock was not paid in full could not be imputed to the plaintiff, so as to defeat its right to recover the unpaid balances from the stockholders.

And it was held in Mathis v. Pridham (1892) 1 Tex. Civ. App. 58, 20 S. W. 1015, that the mere knowledge of the individual who was the president of a bank, which afterward became a creditor of a corporation, that stock was being issued by the corporation which was not in fact full-paid, was not sufficient notice to the bank of such fact.

Likewise, in Martin v. South Salem Land Co. (1896) 94 Va. 28, 26 S. E. 591, the court held that knowledge by two of the directors of a banking corporation that stock of a debtor corporation was being issued as full-paid for 30 per cent of its par value was not constructive notice to the banking corporation that the stock of its debtor was not in fact full-paid.

II. Minority rule.

In the construction of the statutes defining the liability of stockholders for unpaid subscriptions, it has been held in a few jurisdictions that knowledge or want of knowledge that the stock of a corporation is in part unpaid does not affect their liability. Rosoff v. Gilbert Transp. Co. (1915) 221 Fed. 972 (under Connecticut statute); DU PONT v. BALL (reported herewith) ante, 955; National Bank v. Pacific R. Co. (1896) 66 Ill. App. 320; Sprague v. National Bank (1898) 172 Ill. 149, 42 L.R.A. 606, 64 Am. St. Rep. 17, 50 N. E. 19; Gillett v. Chicago Title & T. Co. (1907) 230 Ill. 373, 82 N. E. 891; Nelson v. Chicago Title & T. Co. (1907) 230 Ill.

440, 82 N. E. 911; Kent v. Chicago Title & T. Co. (1907) 230 Ill. 495, 82 N. E. 911; Williams v. Chamberlain (1906) 123 Ky. 150, 94 S. W. 29; Stoecker v. Goodman (1919) 183 Ky. 380, 209 S. W. 874; Easton Nat. Bank v. American Brick & Tile Co. (1906) 70 N. J. Eq. 732, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 271, 64 Atl. 971, 10 Ann. Cas. 84.

In Rosoff v. Gilbert Transp. Co. (1915) 221 Fed. 972, it appeared that action had been brought in Connecticut by the receiver of an insolvent corporation against stockholders owning the largest amount of unpaid stock, to recover the amount due thereon for the benefit of creditors. Certain of the stockholders brought an intervening bill in equity, praying for a stay of the receiver's suit, and for a reference to determine the amount due. One of the findings of the master on reference was that the creditors were entitled to participate in the recovery, without reference to their knowledge, at the time of extending credit, that such stock was unpaid. Disposing of an exception to this ruling, the court said: "Counsel for the stockholders claim in substance that, where a creditor has notice or knowledge that stock is unpaid when he extends credit, he is not entitled to participate in an assessment against stockholders, and that the same result follows, both when the creditor is also a stockholder and when credit is extended before stock is issued. These claims are based on the erroneous theory that the liability of stockholders to respond to an assessment in Connecticut is by reason of the 'trust fund' or 'fraud' theory, resorted to by the courts of many states to protect creditors of fraudulent corporations. In Connecticut, however, resort has never been had to this theory, for under the Connecticut law, while a stockholder is not liable for the debts of the corporation, he is bound to pay the par value for his stock. . . . There is no suggestion that the 'trust fund' or 'fraud' theory is the basis of the liability in Connecticut, or that the creditors' right to participate is based on these theories. The creditors are held to have a legal rather than an equitable right. . . . The Connecticut Corporation Act provides: 'Sec. 16. Stockholders' Liability.—Every stockholder, whether an original subscriber or not, shall be liable for any balance due on the stock held by him. . . . If a creditor of a corporation shall obtain a judgment against it, and execution thereon shall be returned unsatisfied, such creditor may recover from any stockholder in such corporation the balance remaining due and unpaid on any stock held by him, so far as may be necessary to satisfy the debt. No subscriber for or holder of stock shall be liable as such for any payment of such stock, or for any debt of the corporation, after the par value of his stock has been paid.' This act seeks to secure the payment of the par value of stock, and to require stockholders to pay the par value, and exempts the stockholders from liability therefor when, and only when, the par value of his stock has been paid. There is no suggestion that certain creditors can enforce this liability, and that certain creditors cannot. The statute clearly contemplates that all creditors are entitled to be paid, and that stockholders are bound to pay them if the stock held by them has not been paid for in full."

In Delaware, in construing the provisions of the General Corporation Law relative to the liability of stockholders for the amount due and unpaid on their stock, the court holds that there is no distinction between creditors as to their knowledge or lack of knowledge of the conditions under which the stock was issued. See the reported case (Du Pont v. Ball ante, 955).

In National Bank v. Pacific R. Co. (1896) 66 Ill. App. 320, it was held under a statute (Corporation Act, chap. 32, § 25) that knowledge, at the time they gave credit, that stock of the debtor corporation was being issued as full-paid, in exchange for property of known less value, would not estop creditors from thereafter recovering the unpaid balance thereon from defaulting stockholders.

The decision in National Bank v. Pacific R. Co. (Ill.) supra, was affirmed in Sprague v. National Bank (1898) 172 Ill. 149, 42 L.R.A. 606, 64 Am. St. Rep. 17, 50 N. E. 19, on the authority of a statute (Rev. Stat. § 8, chap. 32) providing that "each stockholder shall be liable for the debts of the corporation to the extent of the amount that may be unpaid upon the stock held by him." In construing this section, the court said: "The legislative intent was that any amount unpaid upon subscription to the capital stock of a corporation should constitute a fund, to which a creditor of the corporation might resort to obtain satisfaction of his demand against the corporation. We hold, therefore, that under our statute the right of a creditor to enforce liability against one who has subscribed for stock in a corporation, and has not paid his subscription in full, is not dependent, in any degree, upon the knowledge possessed by the creditor that such subscription was or was not paid in full. If unpaid to the corporation it must be paid to the creditor."

And where certain stockholders maintained that creditors should be estopped from proceeding against them for unpaid balances on stock subscriptions because of the creditors' knowledge, at the time of extending credit, that stock was being issued as fully paid in consideration of the subscriber's rights in certain inventions, it was held that such knowledge would not create an estoppel. The court said: "In Sprague v. National Bank of America, supra, we said that the liability of the stockholder to the creditor for the unpaid portion of the subscription for stock is not 'in any wise affected by the fact that the creditor knew or did not know, when he extended credit to the corporation, that the stock was in part unpaid.' We are entirely satisfied with that view, and it is decisive of this question." Gillett v. Chicago Title & T. Co. (1907) 280 Ill. 373, 82 N. E. 891.

The decision in Gillett v. Chicago Title & T. Co. (Ill.) supra, was held controlling in Nelson v. Chicago Title & T. Co. (1907) 230 Ill. 440, 82 N. E. 911, which was an appeal by one of the defendants in the suit in circuit court which was reviewed in the case cited.

And a similar application of the decision in Gillett v. Chicago Title & T. Co. (Ill.) supra, was made in Kent v. Chicago Title & T. Co. (1907) 230 Ill. 495, 82 N. E. 911, on the appeal of another codefendant.

In Williams v. Chamberlain (1906) 128 Ky. 150, 94 S. W. 29, which arose under an Arizona statute, providing that "the stockholders of each corporation shall be liable to creditors for the full amount of the unpaid part of stock subscribed for by them," the court said: "It is not material whether creditors of the corporation know the amount of the stock actually subscribed, or the amount actually paid on stock subscribed by shareholders. They have a right to deal with the corporation in good faith and to assume that all shareholders who have subscribed for stock have either paid, or will pay, the amount of their subscription, and in the absence of any agreement or understanding between the creditors and the corporation, or shareholders, as to the amount of the liability of the latter, the question as to the creditors' knowledge or lack of knowledge of the amount the stockholder has paid, or subscribed to pay, is not material."

And in Stoecker v. Goodman (1919) 183 Ky. 330, 209 S. W. 874, the court, construing and applying a similar Kentucky statute (Ky. Stat. § 547), quoted Williams v. Chamberlain (Ky.) supra, as an illustrative precedent, and added: "It is clear from their provisions that the legislature intended to make stockholders absolutely liable to creditors for their unpaid stock subscriptions, without regard to the creditors' knowledge, or want of knowledge, of the fact that the stock was not paid for when the credit was extended."

Earlier decisions in Kentucky followed the majority rule heretofore set forth. See John R. Proctor Land Co. v. Cooke (1898) 103 Ky. 96, 44 S. W. 391, wherein the court said: "It appears from the testimony that the creditors of this corporation, who are seeking through the corporation itself to collect these assessments from appellee, for the purpose of reimbursing them for payments made by them for the company, were the original incorporators, have always been the chief officers of the company, and voluntarily assumed the obligations of the company, with a full knowledge of the conditions upon which the land was transferred to the company and the stock issued in payment therefor. There was no deception or misrepresentation of any kind to induce them to become the security of the company, and in our opinion this suit cannot be sustained by the assumption that by the conveyance of the land appellee had not paid up all he had contracted or was bound to pay by his subscription."

And see Miller v. Higginbotham (1906) 29 Ky. L. Rep. 547, 93 S. W. 655, wherein it appeared that the creditor had taken a part in the incorporation of a company, and knew the terms on which stock was issued, it was held that he could not thereafter recover from the other stockholders any part of their unpaid subscriptions. In stating the rule applicable, the court said: "The doctrine is very well settled that a shareholder in a corporation is liable to its creditors for the amount of his unpaid subscription, and that the capital stock of a corporation, including unpaid subscriptions, constitutes a trust fund for the benefit of its creditors. . . . But there is an equally well-recognized rule that a creditor of a corporation, who deals with it with actual knowledge of the fact that the shares of stock are to be regarded as paid up and nonassessable, and that the shareholders are only to be liable for a specified sum or for the amount actually paid in by them, cannot exact from the shareholders the amount of their unpaid subscription."

In Easton Nat. Bank v. American Brick & Tile Co. (1906) 70 N. J. Eq. 732, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 271, 64 Atl. 917, 10 Ann. Cas. 84, it was held that a creditor could recover the unpaid balance on shares held by stockholders of an insolvent corporation, although he knew at the time he extended credit that the stock issued as full-paid was not in fact full-paid. The court, discussing the Corporation Act of 1875 (1 Gen. Stat. p. 907), said: "Our Corporation Act places the stockholders' liability to creditors upon a firmer foundation than the 'trust fund doctrine,' . . . the statute absolutely prohibiting agreements for the issue of stock for a consideration less than its par value, and affording relief to all creditors without distinction." This decision reversed the holding in Easton Nat. Bank v. American Brick & Tile Co. (1905) 69 N. J. Eq. 326, 60 Atl. 54, that an extension of credit, with knowledge that stock was not in fact paid in full, would prevent the creditor of an insolvent corporation from enforcing the liability of the stockholders for the unpaid balance on their shares.

And see also Johnson v. Tennessee Oil, etc., Co. (1908) 74 N. J. Eq. 32, 69 Atl. 788, wherein the court, deciding the liability of stockholders in a corporation organized under the laws of Arizona, held that under the trust-fund theory they would not be liable for an alleged unpaid subscription, since the creditors knew, when they extended credit, that the stock was not actually full-paid. LINWOOD C. TYLER.

Maine Supreme Judicial Court — May 4, 1914.

(111 Me. 546, 90 Atl. 481.)

Partnership — failure to present claim against partner's estate — equalization out of partnership assets.

1. A creditor of a partnership, who, without fault on his part, fails to present his claim against the separate estate of a partner which was being administered in the probate court, is entitled to a sufficient amount from the receiver of the partnership funds to make his dividends from both estates equal to those of creditors who proved their claims against the individual estate before further dividends are made by him out of the partnership estate.

3. That, because of the insanity of a member of an insolvent partnership, his estate was administered in the probate court and had never gone into the hands of the partnership receiver, does not make the funds of the partnership and of his estate separate and distinct, so that partnership creditors cannot look to both for the settlement of their claims.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Penobscot County for the determination by the Law Court of a proceeding for the payment to petitioner of his claim out of partnership assets in the hands of a receiver.

Decree for petitioner.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. E. C. Ryder, for petitioner:

Petitioner is equitably entitled to the relief asked for.

1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 405; Grinnell v. Merchants' Ins. Co. 16 N. J. Eq. 283.

Mr. C. H. Bartlett in propria persona.

Philbrook, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an interlocutory proceeding arising from the above-entitled case in which C. J. Gilfillan is petitioner and is the plaintiff in interest. The proceedings are in equity and come to the law court on report, for determination upon the petition and upon the findings of facts and conclusions by the sitting justice.

The petition is as follows:

"(1) That the late copartnership of Tyler, Fogg, & Co. consisted of the above-named Linwood C. Tyler and Herbert A. Fogg, the said Herbert A. Fogg being a person of unsound mind whose estate is being settled in the probate court within and for said county, by Thomas R. Savage, his guardian.

"(2) That between April 11, 1907, and May 25, 1911, the petitioner made general deposits of money with the late copartnership of Tyler, Fogg, & Co., and that on said 25th day of May, 1911, there was due the petitioner from said copartnership a balance of twenty-one hundred sixty-one dollars fifty-nine cents ($2,161.59) as appears by the deposit book now in the possession of the petitioner, and also by the books of said late copartnership, which amount is still due the petitioner.

"(3) That the petitioner filed proof of his claim against the firm of Tyler, Fogg, & Co. with Charles H. Bartlett, receiver, and the special master appointed by the court, and received a dividend of 5 per cent of the amount of his claim from the funds in the hands of said receiver, but filed no proof of his claim with the commissioners appointed by the probate court to pass upon claims against the individual estate of Herbert A. Fogg, and therefore he has received no dividend from the estate of said Herbert A. Fogg.

"(4) That he employed Leon F. Higgins, of Brewer, in said county, as his agent to look after his interest and do whatever was necessary to secure his claim against said copartnership or any individual thereof; that later he was notified that a committee had been selected by the unsecured creditors, represented by competent local attorneys, to look after their interest and do whatever was necessary to secure their claims; that he signed a contract to pay his proportional part of the expenses of such committee, and that he relied upon said Higgins and said committee to protect his interest and do whatsoever was necessary to secure his claim.

"(5) That it was without fault or negligence on his part that he failed to prove his claim against the individual estate of Herbert A. Fogg, having no knowledge that there were funds belonging to the individual estate of Herbert A. Fogg, or that commissioners had been appointed to pass upon such claims.

"(6) That he has received no dividend on account of the individual estate of Herbert A. Fogg; that the only money he has so far received on account of his claim, either from the receiver of the late copartnership or from the guardian of Herbert A. Fogg, is a dividend of 5 per cent paid by the receiver of said late copartnership.

"(7) That all the assets belonging to the individual estate of Herbert A. Fogg have been distributed; that all other creditors of said late copartnership have received 66.4 per cent of their claims, while he has received but 5 per cent of his claim, and that the receiver of said late copartnership has in his possession funds not yet distributed.

"Wherefore, inasmuch as the omission to prove his claim with the commissioners appointed to pass upon the claims against the individual estate of Herbert A. Fogg was without fault or negligence on his part, and, inasmuch as sufficient funds remain in the hands of said receiver to pay the amount equitably due the petitioner, and the payment to him of 61.4 per cent of his claim will not work an injustice to other creditors, he respectfully petitions and prays that this court upon hearing will order and direct said Charles H. Bartlett, receiver as aforesaid, to pay to him the sum of 61.4 per cent of his claim, amounting to $1,327.22."

After proper notice to all parties in interest there was a hearing upon the petition before a single justice, who made the following findings:

"(1) The late copartnership of Tyler, Fogg, & Co., consisting of Linwood C. Tyler and Herbert A. Fogg, is insolvent, and its affairs are in the process of settlement by Charles H. Bartlett, Esq., receiver, appointed by this court.

"(2) Herbert A. Fogg has been adjudged of unsound mind, and his estate has been settled in the probate court as an insolvent estate by Thomas R. Savage, his guardian, under the provisions of chapter 68, Revised Statutes.

"(3) The copartnership of Tyler, Fogg, & Co., at the time it was adjudicated insolvent, was indebted to the petitioner in the sum of twenty-one hundred sixty-one dollars fifty-nine cents ($2,161.59).

"(4) The petitioner filed proof of his claim with the special master appointed by the court to receive and pass upon claims against the copartnership, who returned, as due the petitioner, including interest, twenty-one hundred sixty-six dollars ninety-nine cents ($2,166.99).

"(5) The petitioner filed no proof of his claim with the commissioners appointed by the probate court to pass upon claims against the insolvent estate of Herbert A. Fogg, but from evidence presented to me, I find that the omission of the petitioner to present his claim to the commissioners was without fault on his part, and that he had a reasonable excuse for omitting to do so.

"(6) All creditors of the copartnership of Tyler, Fogg, & Co. whose claims were seasonably proved, except the petitioner, have received or will receive, sixty-six and four-tenths (66.4) per cent of their claims, sixty-one and four-tenths (61.4) per cent from the guardian of Herbert A. Fogg, and five (5) per cent from the receiver, while the petitioner has received but five (5) per cent of his claim, paid by the receiver. He has received no dividend from the estate of Herbert A. Fogg.

"(7) All available assets of the estate of Herbert A. Fogg have been distributed. The claim of the petitioner is barred, not having been presented to the commissioners within the time allowed by statute.

"(8) All claims are of one class, and all are against the copartnership. There are no claims against the individual members of the firm, and there are not sufficient assets of the copartnership and of the individual members thereof to pay the claims in full.

"(9) There remain in the hands of the receiver, undistributed, sufficient assets to pay the petitioner the amount he would have received had he filed his claim with the commissioners appointed to pass upon claims against the individual estate of Herbert A. Fogg, in excess of any future charges and expenditures of the receiver, and such payment will not interfere with payments already made to other creditors. And the receiver will then have assets to be distributed to the creditors when hereafter ordered by the court."

To condense the prayer of the petitioner and the findings of the justice it may be said that the gist of the matter before us is this: The individual assets of Fogg having been administered by the probate court and all paid out to creditors who presented their claims before the commissioners appointed by that court, this petitioner having failed, through no fault of his own, to present his claim before those commissioners, shall we now order the receiver to pay to this petitioner the amount which he asks for out of funds in the hands of the receiver before making any further dividends to creditors?

Our attention has not been called to any case adjudicated in our courts or elsewhere which is on a parity with the one under consideration. No exact precedent is before us. We must, therefore, resort to fundamental principles and reason, as well as underlying principles of equity, in reaching our conclusion. It will be conceded without citation of the authorities that when a partnership is formed the property of the partnership, and, subject to individual debts, the property of the several partners, stands as an initial asset for the payment of all debts which the partnership may incur, and that after-acquired property of partnership or individual continues as such an asset. Ordinarily, therefore, the receiver of a partnership would be under the duty of taking into his custody all partnership assets and all assets of each individual partner which were not required to pay the individual debts of those partners respectively. Assets thus taken into custody would be reduced to cash, and, under proper orders of the court, used to pay the expenses of receivership and liquidating claims of creditors against the partnership.

assets—pay-

In the case at bar a seeming complication arises from the fact that one of the partners, Herbert A. Fogg, was an insane person under guardianship. Rev. Stat. chap. 68, § 23, provides that the insolvent estate of an insane person under guardianship is to be settled according to the general provisions of the statute for the settling of insolvent estates of deceased persons. Consequently commissioners were appointed by the probate court to hear claims against the estate of Herbert A. Fogg, but this petitioner, through no fault on his part, failed to present his claim before those commissioners. Other creditors of the partnership did so present their claims, and, the aggregate of them being greater than the amount of the individual Fogg estate, that estate was applied pro rata to the payment of claims presented to the commissioners, and the individual estate of Fogg was thereby exhausted. At this point, it should be observed that the individual estate of Fogg never came into the actual custody of the receiver, but was paid out by the guardian of Fogg under the decree of the probate court. It has been suggested that the partnership funds in the hands of the receiver and the funds of the estate of Herbert A. Fogg in the hands of his guardian constituted two separate and distinct funds. We cannot indorse this view because, as already stated, his personal estate, subject to payment of individual debts, — and there were none in this case,—formed part and parcel of an initial and continuing fund which, all through the partnership, stood as assets for the payment of partnership debts. It is true that under the peculiar circumstances arising in this case, and by virtue of the statute just referred to, it became necessary to have the individual estate of Fogg administered through statutory methods, but such administration, being a means of distribution, did not make his personal estate a separate fund which up to that time was, in law, part and parcel of the partnership assets for the payment of partnership debts.

It happened, therefore, that when other creditors presented their claims to the commissioners and this petitioner did not, those other creditors obtained a larger proportion of partnership assets for the payment of their claims than this petitioner did. But partnership assets applicable to debts of the same class should be distributed equally among creditors of the same class.

—separate administration of estate of insolvent partner—effect.

Still bearing in mind the unity of the partnership assets composed of partnership property and individual property, it follows by the rules of receivership, as well as by the rules of equity, that this petitioner should share with other creditors of the same class equally in all the assets applicable to the payment of debts in the class to which this petitioner's debt belonged. Such sharing can only be accomplished now by directing the receiver to pay to this petitioner the amount prayed for before making a further dividend among creditors of the same class to which the petitioner belongs. Thus we shall preserve the idea of the unity of the different component parts which make up the assets of a copartnership, and deal equitably and fairly with all creditors of the same class. So without violation of any principles of law or equity, but rather in harmony with all fundamental principles, we shall do substantial justice and equity by ordering the receiver, before making any further payments or dividends to creditors of the class to which this petitioner belongs, to pay to this petitioner the sum of $1,327.22.

—failure to present claim against partner's estate—equalization out of partnership assets.

Decree accordingly.

ANNOTATION.

Equalization as between firm creditors, some of whom have received dividends from estates of individual partners and others not.

No case other than the reported one (FOGG v. TYLER, ante, 986) seems to have passed upon the question presented therein, but the decision to the effect that, where the failure to present the claim against the individual partner was not due to the fault of the creditor, he is entitled to equalization, as against other firm creditors, out of firm funds, before further participation therein by them, seems to be good law, based as it is upon the fundamental principle that assets applicable to debts of the same class should be equally distributed among creditors of the same class. This reasoning would, of course, equally tend to a denial of equalization where the non-participation in the separate estate of the individual partner was through the fault of the creditor. G. J. C.

Lien — for recovery of payments in conditional sale contract.

1. A buyer on condition who rescinds his contract for defects in the article purchased, after making payments under the contract, has no common-law lien on the article for recovery of the payments made.

[See note on this question beginning on page 993.]

Sale — provision for retention of payments as rent — defective article.

2. A clause in a conditional sale contract that payments made on the contract shall be retained as rent for the use of the article sold, in case possession is retaken for failure to pay instalments of purchase money when due, does not apply in case the sale is rescinded by the purchaser for defects in the article purchased.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Warren County (Brien, J.) in its favor, on condition of payment of a certain sum to defendant, in an action brought to recover possession of a cash register sold by plaintiff to defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. C. Bryson, for appellant:

Since the contract does not give defendant a lien on the register to secure a return to him of any part of the purchase price he might pay before refusing to accept the machine, such lien cannot arise except by operation of law or by statute.

Ethridge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit by the National Cash

Register Company in replevin for a machine or cash register sold to appellee for use in his business in the city of Vicksburg. The contract provided for cash instalments in monthly payments, and provided, in default of any payment as provided in said note, it is agreed that all unpaid payments shall at once become due and payable, and that upon failure to make any payment provided herein at the time same is due and payable that the company shall take possession and remove said register without process, and in such case it was agreed that all payments theretofore made under the contract are considered as having been made for use of the register while in possession of the purchaser, and such payments shall be retained by the company as rental.

Prior to the institution of this suit the appellant had filed a suit against the appellee in the circuit court for the full amount of the purchase money because of a default in payment, and trial was had in the circuit court, in which the defendant defended upon the ground that the cash register sold him would not do the work it was purchased to do, and that the defects were not discoverable except by use, and on discovering the defects the defendant had notified the company of the defects and elected to rescind the sale, and had tendered the cash register to the appellant. The jury in that case found for the defendant, and no appeal appears to have been taken from that judgment. Thereafter this suit was instituted in replevin, and the defendant declined to surrender the cash register until the register company had repaid to the defendant the sum of $235 which he had made as payments on the cash register; a part being in cash at the time of the purchase and some payments after receipt of the cash register. The defendant in this suit also defended on the ground that he was entitled to a common-law lien on the cash register until the money paid on the cash register was repaid. The case was submitted to the circuit judge without a jury, and the judge entered a judgment reciting that, being fully advised in the premises, he finds that the plaintiff do have and recover the cash register No. 1,446,821 in suit upon tendering and paying to the defendant, John Hude, the sum of $235, with interest to accrue from this date, and all costs accrued therein, and in default of which then it is ordered by the court that said cash register be sold at public auction to the highest bidder for cash by the sheriff of this county in compliance with the statute on execution, and the proceeds thereof said sheriff shall distribute as follows: First, the cost of this proceeding; second, satisfy, if it can, the claim of John Hude, the defendant, amounting to $235; third, and the balance, if any, to be paid to the plaintiff. From this judgment the National Cash Register Company appeals here.

We think that the judgment in the first suit established the fact that there was no sale made, and that the defendant had rescinded and tendered back the cash register in question. We think that the clause in the contract set out above, reciting that the payments made should be retained as rent for the use of the

Sale—provision for retention of payments as rent—defective article. cash register, does not apply in a case where the cash register is defective and does not come up to representations. This clause would only become applicable in case the cash register was as represented, and was retained by the defendant under conditions where the plaintiff or seller had complied with his part of the contract. We think, however, that there was no common-law or other lien upon the cash register in favor of the buyer. To disaffirm or rescind the contract for misrepresentation, the buyer would have to tender the cash register back to the seller, and he could enter suit for any amount paid the seller under such contract. We know of no statute giving a lien in a case of this kind, and certainly none exists under the common law. The remedies of the buyer have been announced by this court in several cases. In the case of Hall Commission Co. v. Crook, 87 Miss. 445, 40 So. 20, 1006, this court announced the remedies of the buyer as follows: Where the seller of merchandise delivers goods of an inferior quality to that required by the contract, the buyer may: First, reject the goods and sue for damages; or, second, pay the contract price, take the goods, and recover the difference between their value and the value of the goods required by the contract. This rule is also announced in Westmoreland v. Walker, 25 Miss. 76, and Hambrick v. Wilkins, 65 Miss. 18, 7 Am. St. Rep. 631, 3 So. 67, and is recognized in Mobile Auto Co. v. Sturges, 107 Miss. 848, 66 So. 205.

The only method of acquiring a lien upon the property in cases of this kind that has been called to our attention, or that we have found upon careful investigation, is one created by attachment. There was, however, no attachment in the present suit, and no action by the defendant seeking or claiming any relief other than a lien under the common law. In the first suit the defendant in that suit, appellee here, did not file any offset or plea of recoupment, and his rights for money paid on the cash register were not adjudicated in that suit. We think it was error for the judge in his judgment to impose a condition of repayment on the right to recover, and it was error for him to direct the sale of the cash register in this proceeding. Accordingly the judgment in the court below is reversed.

Reversed, and judgment here for appellant.

ANNOTATION.

Right of buyer of chattels to lien upon the property where he rescinds the contract.

As indicated by the title, this note is limited to the rights of the buyer of personal property, and does not include the rights of the vendee of real estate on his rescission of the contract.

Rescission in actions at law.

It is a general rule of law applicable to contracts for the purchase of personal property that for the buyer to rescind the contract, assuming that he has valid grounds for the rescission, he must return or offer to return the property. It is also a general rule of law that, if a lien upon personal property exists at all, it only exists in favor of the person in possession of the property. From these premises, it logically follows that ordinarily the buyer who rescinds and returns or offers to return the property has no lien thereon, at least, none which he can assert as a ground for affirmative relief. The reported case (NATIONAL CASH REGISTER Co. v. HUDE, ante, 990) carries this doctrine to the extent of holding that where the buyer has been sued in an action at law for the purchase price of a chattel, and successfully defends the suit on the ground that he properly rescinded the contract of purchase and tendered to the seller a return of the property, he cannot subsequently defend an action of replevin by the seller to obtain possession of the property, on the ground that he has a common-law lien upon the property for the amount he has paid on the purchase price, which entitles him to possession thereof until such amount has been paid.

In Hackney Mfg. Co. v. Celum (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 189 S. W. 988, the buyer of machinery, who was sued upon notes given for the purchase price, defended on the ground that the seller had made false and fraudulent representations as to the machinery, and sought a rescission of the contract and a lien on the machinery for the amount he had paid on the purchase price, and the foreclosure of this lien. This relief was given him in the trial court. Upon appeal, the judgment was reversed to the extent that it established and foreclosed a lien in favor of the buyer. The court said that the counterclaim of the buyer for the amount paid, together with the freight and expenses incurred in testing the machinery, simply represented an unsecured demand against the seller, and the case presented no aspect justifying the establishment of an equitable lien on the machinery to secure the payment. It is suggested that if the seller were insolvent, that possibly would present a case where equity would intervene and establish a lien to secure the payment of the counterclaim, and upon this ground the court distinguished Hall v. Bank of Baldwin (1910) 143 Wis. 303, 127 N. W. 969, which will be hereafter more particularly referred to.

While not strictly within the scope of this note, attention is called to White Sewing Mach. Co. v. McBride (1887) 27 Mo. App. 470. In this case it appeared that a sewing machine was sold by an agent of the manufacturer under an agreement that another machine, taken in part payment, was to be returned to the buyer if the latter, after trying the new machine for the specified period, desired to rescind the contract of purchase. Within the time stated, the buyer gave notice of rescission and demanded a return of the old machine. The seller, without returning the old machine or offering to return it, brought replevin to recover the new one. It was held that the action could not be maintained without the seller first returning or offering to return the old machine. And see also Hamilton v. Singer Mfg. Co. (1870) 54 Ill. 370. In that case, the purchaser of a machine under a conditional sale refused to make the payments agreed upon, on the ground that the machine did not comply with the contract; the seller thereupon sued out a writ of replevin and retook the machine. It was held that the action could not be maintained without first tendering to the buyer the amount the latter had paid on the purchase price.

Armstrong v. Darbro (1899) 10 Ky. L. Rep. 984, has sometimes been cited as sustaining the right of a buyer to a lien upon the property for the amount he paid on the purchase price. The case, however, merely holds that a sale of personal property without a change of possession is void as to creditors, but the purchaser is nevertheless entitled to a lien thereon for the amount he has in good faith paid on the purchase price. It is to be noted in this connection that the note does not deal with cases involving the respective rights of the buyer and the creditors of the seller.

Rescission in equitable actions.

Where the buyer has the right to invoke equitable aid in the rescission of a contract for the purchase of personal property, the few decisions on the point are in harmony in holding that, as an incident to the granting of relief to the buyer, the court will create in his favor an equitable lien upon the property for the amount he has paid on the purchase price which the seller is required to pay as a condition of the return of the property.

For example, in Hall v. Bank of Baldwin (1810) 143 Wis. 303, 127 N. W. 969, the purchaser of certain securities sought in equity to rescind the contract of purchase, and predicated his right to relief upon the ground of the insolvency of the seller, as well as his fraud in falsely misrepresenting circumstances affecting the value of the securities; this relief was sought without tendering a return of the securities, the purchaser in this regard asking a lien on the securities for the amount he had paid. In sustaining the purchaser's right to rescind under the circumstances, and retain the securities until the seller had repaid the amount the buyer had paid upon the purchase price, the court pointed out that the rule as to a vendee of real estate, who had been induced by fraud of the vendor to purchase it, was that upon rescission the vendee has an equitable right to a lien upon the subject of the transaction, where that is necessary for his protection, and that a court of equity will extend its jurisdiction to determine the measure of the lien, fix it upon the property, and administer the assets as justice requires in the peculiar circumstances of the case as they may be presented. And it is said that the principle is laid down generally, not with reference to any particular species of property, but rather in harmony with a boundless field of equity where legal remedies for wrongs are inadequate or do not exist at all. The question is, "Must a person, necessarily, in a case of this sort, part with control of the property in advance of receiving back his money, or may he retain it,—if in the judgment of the court justice requires that to be done,—charged with a lien to the extent of money due him, contingent upon rescission? The latter would seem to be equitable. That equity has competency to afford such a remedy, we cannot doubt. Having such competency, the court should not refuse to open its doors merely for want of a precedent. . . . From the foregoing we deduce as a principle, not suggesting but that it might be even more broadly stated, if a person in possession of a subject of purchase is so circumstanced that he has the right to rescind on the ground of fraud, and it is essential for his protection that he should be permitted to retain the subject of the transaction, holding the same as the property of the fraudulent vendor, subject to such person's equitable right, till he shall have received satisfaction for the consideration he parted with to such vendor in the transaction, a court of equity will, without any offer to return, except conditioned upon a restoration, or protection to that end, of the consideration parted with, afford a remedy for rescission and, incidentally, for retention of such subject and treatment thereof, so as to protect such person in his right to a return of such consideration, shaping the decree so as to 'meet the very form and pressure of each particular case in all its complex habitudes.'"

In Mycok v. Beatson (1879) L. R. 17, 13 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 384, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 127, 28 Week. Rep. 319, a court of equity, in rescinding a contract for the purchase of an interest in a partnership on the ground of the fraud of the seller, decreed in favor of the buyer a lien for the amount he had paid on the purchase price to cover the surplus of the partnership assets after satisfying the partnership debts and liabilities. In giving a lien under the circumstances, the court relied upon a case involving a vendee's lien upon real estate. Referring to these cases, it is pointed out that the only distinction between such case and the one under consideration is that the one related to the sale of land and the other to a sale of a share of partnership profit, and it is said that this distinction appears to have no substance.

In Scott v. Clarkson (1808) 1 Bibb (Ky.) 277, it appeared that the purchaser of a slave sought in equity to rescind the contract of purchase on the ground of false and fraudulent representations as to the age and health of the slave. In granting this relief it was ordered that the purchaser should retain a lien upon the slave until the sum paid on the purchase price was refunded, and upon such payment the purchaser should deliver the slave to the seller. Parties — joinder — carrier and insurer.

2. One undertaking to indemnify a carrier against liability for loss through injuries negligently inflicted upon passengers cannot be joined in an action by a passenger against the carrier to recover damages for injuries so inflicted.

Insurance — indemnity — action by injured person against insurer.

3. One injured by a carrier's negligence cannot maintain an action directly against one who has undertaken to indemnify the carrier against liability for injuries negligently inflicted upon passengers, if the contract provides that no action shall be brought upon it until liability of the carrier has been established, although the contract permits proceedings immediately against the indemnitor upon recovery of a judgment against the carrier.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Gila County (Shute, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant stage company while its passenger. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Morris & Malott, for appellants:

The complaint sets forth in one count a cause of action in tort against the Smith Stage Company, and an entirely separate cause of action against the Western Indemnity Company on a contract of insurance, so that a misjoinder arises.

The admission of the policy was clearly inadmissible in evidence as against the Smith Stage Company, since the policy imposed no liability on that company.

The liability of a person operating an automobile as common carrier is the same as that of any other common carrier.

6 Cyc. 595; McFadden v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 161 Mo. App. 652, 143 S. W. 884.

Ross, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, who was the plaintiff below, brought his action against the appellant, the Smith Stage Company, a common carrier by automobile, to recover damages for injuries he claims were negligently inflicted or caused by the stage company while he was its passenger, and joined as codefendant the Western Indemnity Company, alleging that the Western Indemnity Company insured the Smith

Stage Company, and all passengers which the said Smith Stage Company might undertake to transport, during the life of the policy, in their said automobiles, and particularly insured the Smith Stage Company and said passengers against injury while said transportation was being made in a certain Hudson car (being the car upon which plaintiff was hurt); that the said policy contained the following provision: "In consideration of the premium at which this policy is written, and in further consideration of the acceptance by the Arizona Corporation Commission of this policy as a compliance with order No. —, it is understood and agreed that, regardless of any of the conditions of this policy, same shall inure to the benefit of any or all persons suffering loss or damage, and suit may be brought thereon in any court of competent jurisdiction within the state by any person, firm, association, or corporation suffering any loss or damage. If final judgment is rendered against the assured by reason of any loss or claim covered by this policy, the company shall pay said judgment up to the limits expressed in the policy, direct to the plaintiff securing said judgment, or the legal holder thereof, upon the demand of said plaintiff or holder thereof, whether the assured be or be not financially responsible in the amount of the said judgment, and that this policy may not be canceled by either party, except that written notice of the same shall have been previously given for at least ten days to said Corporation Commission, prior to the cancelation of such policy. In all other respects the terms, limits, and conditions of this policy remain unchanged."

No other provision of the policy of insurance or indemnity is set out in the complaint, except that the liability is limited to $5,000. The cause of action alleged against the Smith Stage Company is that on July 17, 1917, it, as a common carrier, agreed and undertook—for a consideration of 35 cents, to be paid at the end of the journey—to safely transport plaintiff in one of its automobiles from Midland City to Globe, Arizona; "that by its negligence the defendant failed to keep its said promise of safe transportation; that the said Smith Stage Company on said day so negligently drove said automobile at such an excessive rate of speed behind another automobile, and in the face of an approaching automobile, that it collided with the automobile in front of it, whereby the plaintiff was thrown from said automobile and his arm was permanently injured and its usefulness destroyed; that said the Smith Stage Company drove said automobile in excess of the statutory rate of speed allowed on said road at said place at said time; that said injuries to the plaintiff were the natural and readily foreseeable consequence of the negligence of the defendant, and the said negligence was the proximate and natural cause of said injuries; that said injury was received while the plaintiff was a passenger as aforesaid in the Hudson car while operated by the defendant the Smith Stage Company as a common carrier as aforesaid."

Following an allegation that the plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $10,000 is a prayer that he recover against the stage company the sum of $10,000, and the Western Indemnity Company the sum of $5,000.

The defendant corporations moved an order of the court requiring plaintiff to state separately and in separate counts the cause of action on policy and the cause of action for negligence or breach of contract to carry; to strike certain portions of the complaint, which, if granted, would have left but one cause of action and one defendant, or, in the event said motions were denied, that the complaint be made more definite and certain, by requiring plaintiff to set forth whether the contract of carriage was express or implied, and if express, where, when, and by whom made, and that the alleged policy of insurance be set forth either in terms or effect, so that it could be determined if it covered the alleged injury to plaintiff. The defendants filed separate demurrers to the complaint alleging: (1) Defect of parties; (2) that several causes of action are improperly united; (3) that complaint is multifarious, in that it sets forth separate and distinct causes of action on several contracts against different defendants; (4) insufficient facts to constitute a cause of action; and (5) misjoinder of parties defendant.

Both defendants pleaded the general issue. All motions and demurrers were overruled, and trial before a jury was had on general issue, which resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff against both defendants for the sum of $5,000. Both defendant companies appeal, and assign as errors the overruling of motions and demurrers, the admission in evidence, over objection, of insurance or indemnity policy, and the giving of certain instructions requested. The view taken of the demurrers will effectively dispose of the different motions, and we will therefore pass the assignments based upon the overruling of motions.

That the complaint states two causes of action, one against the stage company, and one against the indemnity company, is apparent. But it is said that both causes of action are upon contract; that against the stage company being for a breach of its agreement of safe carriage, and the one against the indemnity company upon its agreement of insurance or indemnity against loss or damage he might suffer while a passenger of the carrier company by its negligence. The indemnity company was not a party to the contract of carriage, and neither was the plaintiff a party to the contract of insurance or indemnity. The latter contract is between the stage company and the indemnity company, and to it we must look for the respective obligations and rights of the parties thereto, or any third party claiming rights thereunder. If any third person has any rights under the contract, whether it be indemnity against loss, or liability, or insurance, it is not because of any contract of his, but because of a contract of another for his benefit. Two of the terms of the insurance or indemnity policy are as follows: The Western Indemnity Company agrees: "(1) To indemnify the assured . . . against loss by reason of the liability imposed by law upon the assured for damages on account of bodily injuries, including death, resulting therefrom, accidentally suffered or alleged to have been suffered, while this policy is in force, by any person or persons (except employees) by reason of the ownership, maintenance, or use of any of the automobiles enumerated in item 5. . . . (c) No action shall lie against the company to recover under any of the agreements herein contained unless brought by the assured personally to recover money actually expended by him in satisfaction of claim or liability imposed by due process of law, resulting from injuries actually caused by reason of the ownership, maintenance, and use of said automobiles."

We quote these two provisions of the policy at this time to show what kind of loss or damage the indemnity company bound itself to pay. In the first place, the loss or damage must be accidentally suffered; second, the loss must be the result of bodily injuries or death; and, third, the accident and consequent injury must have been caused by the negligence of the stage company.

The law imposes no responsibility upon a common carrier for personal injuries unless the carrier is guilty of negligence. Under the common law, which controls in this jurisdiction, a common carrier is not an insurer of the safety of the passenger. So we see the liability of the indemnity company, under the terms of the policy, is limited to losses arising out of the torts of the assured stage company. It does not assume liability for losses that may be occasioned by the stage company's failure to keep or perform its contract of carriage. Therefore, if we construe the complaint as appellee would have us, as based upon a breach of contract of carriage, it is upon a cause of action without the terms and purview of the policy, and demurrable so far as the indemnity company is concerned. However, we are satisfied that the cause of action stated against the stage company is one sounding purely in tort, and that the loss or damage alleged falls within the terms of the obligation assumed by the indemnity company as expressed in the provision inserted in the policy at the request of the Corporation Commission; it being the provision set forth in the complaint.

But, accepting this view of the complaint that it states a cause of action against the stage company for negligence and one against the indemnity company on contract, the causes being unrelated to each other, except as indicated, are they properly united? We think not. The statute (Civil Code, ¶ 427) provides: "Actions ex contractu shall not be joined with actions ex delicto." This is the common-law rule (1 C. J. 1065, § 209), and stands unaffected by any other provisions of our statute law. In Continental Securities Co. v. Yuma Nat. Bank, 20 Ariz. —, 176 Pac. 572, we said: "Where the Code classifies causes of action that may not be joined, such classification is binding upon the court."

There is also a misjoinder of parties defendant. They are not jointly liable on the policy. The stage company's liability is one imposed by law for negligence. The indemnity company's liability is one arising out of contract. Their liabilities are separate and distinct. The stage company could not be sued on the policy, as it has assumed none of the obligations thereof; nor can the indemnity company be sued for the tort, as it was not a party to it. The two causes of action do not run against or affect both of the defendants, which we have held to be necessary before they can be joined as defendants. Richard v. Warnekros, 14 Ariz. 488, 131 Pac. 154; Continental Securities Co. v. Yuma Nat. Bank, supra.

It is manifest from an inspection of the complaint that the action was brought upon the theory that the contract of the indemnity company was one for insurance. It is alleged that the indemnity company "particularly insured the said Smith Stage Company and said passengers against injury." If so, it is insurance against accidental bodily injury or death negligently caused by the carrier stage company in the operation of one of its automobiles, and solely the contract of the indemnity company. It is too clear for argument that a person insured against accident, in instituting a suit on a policy to collect from insurer, need not join the owner of the vehicle in which or by which he was injured as a codefendant. Since the policy in this case names the particular kind of accident and the person by whom it must have been occasioned, the circumstances of the accident, as that it was negligent and committed by the stage company, would have to be set forth in the complaint, but only for the purpose of showing that the accident was one of the kind insured against. The stage company, however, is neither a necessary nor a proper party defendant in a suit upon the policy by the insured person, if it be an insurance policy.

After much thought and investigation, we have concluded that the indemnity company's contract is not one of insurance, but one of conditional liability; the condition being that the injured person must first obtain a judgment against the assured stage company before he has any remedy against the indemnity company on the policy. The policy, before the provision relied upon by plaintiff was made a part thereof at the instance of the Corporation Commission, was the usual policy of indemnity against loss by the assured. By its terms no one could sue or recover thereon, except the assured, and he only after he had settled with the injured person his claim or judgment. The latter was not a beneficiary of the policy. But, granting that the policy is one of indemnity against liability, the rule is unchanged, except that some courts, in such cases, have held the liability on the policy an asset of the estate of the assured, and as such subject, by garnishment or other proper proceeding, to the payment of the injured person's judgment. In neither case may the injured sue directly upon the policy. Allen v. Aetna L. Ins.

Co. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 958, and note (76 C. C. A. 265, 145 Fed. 881); Fuller's Acci. & Employers' Liability Ins. 451-468; 1 Joyce, Ins. §§ 27a, 27b. Mr. Fuller states, at page 464: "It must first of all be borne in mind that these policies of insurance are secured to reimburse employers for damages sustained by reason of injuries to others for which they may be legally responsible. The policies are written not for the sake of injured employees, but for the benefit of employers who have suffered loss by reason of their common-law or statutory liability. The premiums are paid by the employers, and the employers are the beneficiaries thereof. The policies now most commonly in force are contracts of indemnity against loss, and not of insurance against liability. They are not subscribed to for the benefit of injured employees, and there is no privity between them and the employers. Therefore no action will lie under such policies until a loss has actually been suffered by the assured through the liquidation of a judgment of an injured employee, and then action can be brought only for the benefit of the assured."

The rules of interpretation employed by the courts in construing employers' indemnity are observed in the consideration of common carrier's indemnity against loss; they are governed by the same principles. 1 Joyce, Ins. § 27e; Patterson v. Adan, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 184 and note (119 Minn. 308, 138 N. W. 281). It is seen, then, that under these forms of indemnity the injured employee or passenger and his rights receive very little consideration. It was only when the assured was financially able to respond in damages that he could be certain of collecting his judgment for injuries. If his judgment creditor were insolvent or a bankrupt, he could not sue on the policy, and, in some cases, has been denied the right to reach the proceeds of the policy by garnishment or otherwise. Allen v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. supra.

When the policy in question was offered or proposed by the stage company and the indemnity company as their contract, the Corporation Commission, knowing as it did the little or no protection therein secured to a person injured, required the indemnity company to consent to the terms of the provision relied upon by the plaintiff, and the same accordingly was indorsed on the policy and became a part of the contract of indemnity. In that provision the indemnity company agrees that the policy shall inure to the benefit of any person, or all persons, suffering loss or damage, and such person or persons may bring suit thereon, and further agrees to pay, upon demand, any judgment that an injured person might obtain against the assured stage company, not to exceed the limits expressed in the policy, "whether the assured be or be not financially responsible in the amount of said judgment." In other words, under this provision of the policy, if the party claiming that he was injured establish in a suit against the carrier that he sustained loss or damage, he is not compelled to seek satisfaction of his loss or damage out of the assured, but can call directly upon the indemnity company to liquidate his judgment, and in default "suit may be brought" upon the policy. As we have seen, the agreement in the policy, as originally drawn, was that the indemnity company would indemnify the stage company "against loss by reason of the liability imposed upon the assured for damages on account of bodily injuries, including death, resulting therefrom, accidentally suffered or alleged to have been suffered while this policy is in force."

It also appears from what we have said that the words "loss and damage" mean a real loss—one, at least so far as the indemnity company is concerned, that has been put into judgment against the assured. The injured person must not only prove loss or damage, but he must prove that the loss or damage was caused by the negligence of the stage company. If he be injured ever so seriously without fault of the assured, there would be no responsibility, no loss or damage, within the contemplation of law. It will be noted that the provision inserted in policy by direction of the Corporation Commission was not intended to supplant all the terms and conditions of the original contract. Therein it is said: "In all other respects the terms, limits, and conditions of this policy remain unchanged."

One of the terms of the policy is that the injured person must first establish his claim by suit against the assured. His damages must be liquidated before he can enforce their payment from the stage company. The policy provides for immediate notice from the assured to the indemnity company of any accident, of any claim made for damages, and of any suit brought against it. The assured agrees to assist in defending suits brought against it by securing evidence, information, and the attendance of witnesses. To require these obligations on the part of the assured, or the injured person, for that matter, to be carried out, would not conflict with the provisions of the inserted clause, if it be held that the injured person may sue the indemnity company on the policy to recover his judgment against the assured, if he obtain one, and at the same time it will protect the indemnity company from possible collusion between the assured and the injured person, or from indifference upon the part of the assured. If the position of appellee is maintained, to the effect that the undertaking in the policy runs directly to the injured person, and is the joint and several obligation of the insured and insurer, it would follow that the injured person could sue the indemnity company thereon alone and without previous notice of the accident, or any claim of damages therefor, leaving the insurer to make his defense as best he could, without the aid of any party to the wrong out of which the cause of action arose.

This unfair, not to say unreasonable, situation in which the indemnity company would be placed, we think, was not in contemplation of any of the parties to the contract. A more just and reasonable conclusion, it would seem, would be that it was within the contemplation of the contracting parties that the injured person must first establish his claim against the wrongdoer in his action for negligence and thereafter be assured of the fruits of his victory by being permitted to collect from the indemnity company. If it is held that the general expression in the inserted provision that the policy "shall inure to the benefit of any or all persons suffering loss or damage, and suit may be brought thereon . . . by any person, firm, association, or corporation suffering any such loss or damage," means that such suit may be brought on the policy only after such loss or damage has been established in an action against the assured, its terms are literally met, without in any way nullifying the other provisions of the contract that make it a condition precedent to the in-

policy—provision for suit by person injured. . .

demnity company's liability that the assured be first sued by the injured party and his loss or damage established. But if the injured person is permitted to sue the indemnity company on the policy before he has proved his loss or damage against the assured, one of the most important provisions of the contract is completely nullified. It is the duty of the court to adopt that construction of a contract that will harmonize all its parts. It is only by following the plaintiff's construction of the contract that the two provisions became inharmonious. We feel that we must follow the rule which states: "Where two clauses are inconsistent and conflicting, they must be construed so as to give effect to the intention of the parties as collected from the whole instrument, and apparently conflicting provisions must be reconciled, if possible, by any reasonable interpretation; it being necessary for this purpose to consider the entire instrument and the surrounding circumstances. If one clause is at variance with another, the one contributing most essentially to the contract will be entitled to more consideration than that which contributes less, or, as has been said, the clause which essentially requires something to be done to effect the general purpose of the contract itself is entitled to greater consideration than the other." 13 C. J. 535, § 497.

We are therefore of the opinion that the policy in question "inured to the benefit" of plaintiff, and that he "may bring suit thereon" if the indemnity company, on demand after final judgment against the stage company, refuses to pay the same. In this view of the case it follows that the cause of action against the stage company was improperly united with the cause of action against the indemnity company, because they are separate and distinct causes of action against different defendants, and because the facts stated do not constitute a cause of action against the indemnity company, and because it resulted in a misjoinder of parties defendant. Neither the policy nor the effect of it was properly pleaded, and it should not have been admitted in evidence against the indemnity company; and it was not competent evidence against the stage company, because the stage company was no party to it.

This leaves the instructions of which complaint is made, both those given and those refused, undisposed of. We have not examined them critically, and do not pass upon them, feeling that upon a retrial, if those given are not proper, they will not be asked, and, if asked, refused, and that those requested will receive the same treatment.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to sustain demurrers as indicated and grant a new trial to the defendant the Smith Stage Company, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his complaint to conform herewith, if he may be so advised, and that the action against the indemnity company be dismissed.

ANNOTATION.

Joinder of cause of action against party causing injury with cause of action against latter's insurer or indemnitor.

The present annotation treats not only the question of the right of an injured person to join a cause of action based on the wrongful injury with a cause of action based on the contract of insurance or indemnity, but also the closely analogous question of the right of the injured person to join as parties both the actual wrongdoer and his insurer or indemnitor.

In examining the following extracts of the cases, the reader should bear in mind that, except where noted, the contract of insurance does not expressly inure to the benefit of any person other than the insured. This point is of considerable importance, since the inclusion of such a provision in the contract of insurance or indemnity would seem to eliminate the objection to joinder sustained in some of the cases, based upon lack of privity of contract between the injured person and the insurer.

It seems to be clear that in the absence of permissive statutory provision a cause of action for personal injuries negligently inflicted cannot be joined with a cause of action against an indemnity company on a contract of insurance. This was the rule laid down in the reported case (SMITH STAGE CO. v. ECKERT, ante, 995), where a statute declaratory of the common law provided that "actions ex contractu shall not be joined with actions ex delicto," and the contract of insurance purported to indemnify the insured against losses arising out of torts committed by it. It was further held in this case that the fact that the indemnity contract provided that the policy was to inure to the benefit of any and all persons suffering loss or damage did not render the indemnitor jointly liable with the indemnitee.

So, in G. A. Duerler Mfg. Co. v. Dullnig (1904) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 83 S. W. 889, affirmed in (1905) — Tex. —, 87 S. W. 332, where a cause of action, based on the negligence of the plaintiff's employer, was joined with a cause of action against an insurance company, based on a contract of insurance against liability for accidents, it was held that it was "clearly a misjoinder of actions to join one involving a tort with another on a contract."

And in Bowers v. Gates (1918) 201 Mich. 146, 166 N. W. 880, where a declaration for personal injuries contained two counts, one charging the individual defendant with malpractice, and the other declaring on a contract of insurance indemnifying him against liability for acts done as a physician, in holding that there was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the insurer which would authorize its joinder in the suit, the court said: "The writing obligatory, by virtue of which plaintiff seeks to make the Fidelity & Casualty Company a party defendant in this action ex delicto, is an ordinary indemnity insurance contract, headed 'Physician's liability policy,' by which the insurance company contracts with defendant Gates to indemnify him against loss from the liability imposed upon him by law for damages on account of bodily injuries or death suffered by any person or persons in consequence of any malpractice, error, or mistake made by him in the practice of his profession, or of any assistant aiding him in the administration of medical or surgical treatment, during the term of the policy. It provides in customary form and ample verbiage what, as between the contending parties, shall or shall not be done in the matter to which it relates in a schedule of stated warranties, amongst which plaintiff points out, as material to the question of his right to make the insurance company a party defendant, that it requires assured to give timely notice to the company of any prospective claim or suit against him for malpractice, with any papers which may have been served on him in that connection; co-operate with and assist it in the defense of any such suit, which the company obligates itself to defend to the court of last resort, unless previously settled; that he will not voluntarily assume liability or incur any expense without its consent, except at his own cost; nor interfere in any negotiations or legal proceedings conducted by the company on account of any such claim; also that the insured shall not assign the policy without the written consent of the insurer, and that neither party shall compromise or settle any such claim or suit without the consent of the other. As to these and all other contractual obligations in the policy, the difficulty in seriously considering plaintiff's theory is that he was in no sense a party to the contract or to the consideration for it. He was a stranger to it and there was no privity of contract between him and the company issuing the policy. The insurer made no promises to him, did not know him in the transaction, and assumed no obligation for his benefit. Any right of action which might arise out of this engagement is vested in the person to whom and with whom the promise, or contract, was made. No statutory provision and nothing in the contract gives him any right of action in tort, or otherwise, against the insurer of the alleged tort-feasor." And in Owens v. Gulf & S. I. R. Co. (1918) 118 Miss. 437, 79 So. 348, where the personal representatives of an employee of defendant railroad, alleged to have died as the result of malpractice, sought in a single action to hold the company liable as for breach of a contract under which such employee contributed to the support of a company medical department and hospital, and to hold the company physician who attended his injuries, liable for malpractice, it was held that the causes of action could not be joined, since the declaration was in contract as to the railroad company, and in tort as to the defendant physician.

And where the liability of the insured is distinct from that of the insurer, as where one is imposed by law for negligence and the other arises out of a contract, they cannot be joined as parties, because neither cause of action runs against or affects both, the insured not being liable on the policy and the insurer not being a party to the tort of the insured. SMITH STAGE CO. v. ECKERT (reported herewith) ante, 995. And upon the ground that no privity of contract existed between an injured employee and a company indemnifying the employer, it was held in Clark v. Bonsal & Co. (1911) 157 N. C. 270, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 191, 72 S. E. 954, where a complaint for the death of plaintiff's intestate charged his employer with negligence, and joined as a defendant an indemnity company, setting out its contract with the employer which provided for the protection of the employer alone, that there was a misjoinder of parties as to the indemnity company. And see Bowers v. Gates (1918) 201 Mich. 146, 166 N. W. 880, as set out supra.

In a few instances, statutes which modify the common law have been held to permit the joining of causes of action of the character under consideration:

Thus under Wisconsin Stat. 1913, § 2647, which, as amended by Laws 1915, chap. 219, provides that a plaintiff may unite in one complaint several causes of action, provided they affect all the parties to the action and do not require different places of trial, it has been held that a cause of action based on the negligence of a common carrier of passengers by automobile for hire could be joined with a cause of action against the carrier's indemnitor, based on the carrier's statutory indemnity bond which rendered the indemnitor "directly liable for" all damages negligently caused by the carrier.

And under the more specific statutory provision found in California Civ. Code, § 2777, which provides that "one who indemnifies another against an act to be done by the latter is liable jointly with the person indemnified, and separately to every person injured by such act," it has been held that a policy of insurance against liability of an employer for personal injuries to his employees inures directly to the benefit of an injured employee, so that his employer and the insurer are jointly liable, and may, at his election, be so sued. Moore v. Los Angeles Iron & Steel Co. (1898) 89 Fed. 73. This was upon the theory that the statute was not limited to cases where the indemnitee is bound to do some act which may result in damage to another, or to cases in which the indemnitor is regarded as a joint tort-feasor with the indemnitee, but likewise includes all cases of indemnity against future contingencies. In reaching this conclusion, the court said: "There is nothing in the section which invites or allows a narrower construction than the one indicated. Defendants, however, in their brief, argue to the contrary, as follows: 'The use of the words "act to be done" must have been inserted in this section to distinguish the liability of the indemnitor in some cases from his liability in others; otherwise, why not have enacted that all indemnitors shall be jointly liable with the indemnitees? The plain reading of subd. 2 of the very next section (2778) makes a most solid support to our position,—that, as a general proposition, indemnitors are not jointly liable with indemnitees, but only in special cases, where the liability arises by reason of joint trespass, etc. It reads, "Upon an indemnity against claims or demands or damages," etc., "the person indemnified is not entitled to recover without payment thereof," which is tantamount to saying that indemnitor cannot be sued until the indemnitee has paid the claim, demand, or damages; that is, except in cases of joint tort-feasors, no one but the indemnitee can sue the indemnitor. It being evident that a distinction was intended, our position above taken is necessarily correct, as there are classes of cases where the indemnitor does not bind the indemnitee to do an act which may result in injury to another (the case at bar is one), and there are cases where the indemnitor is not jointly liable with the indemnitee. The words "act to be done" must be read "act required to be done,"—required in the case of a sheriff about to attach property, by his contract with the plaintiff under the law, which makes him and the plaintiff the two parties to it; the plaintiff to give the indemnity bond, in consideration of which the sheriff seizes the property, no matter who may be the owner of it. The sheriff is required to seize it, and does so because ordered to by the indemnitor.' This argument of defendants is based, it seems to me, upon an erroneous construction of the words 'act to be done.' These words are simply used to convey the opposite of the idea expressed in the words 'already done,' in § 2774 of the same Code, which provides that 'an agreement to indemnify a person against an act already done is valid,' etc. In other words, as § 2774, by using the words 'already done,' is confined to past transactions, so § 2777, by the use of the words 'act to be done,' is restricted to future contingencies. Subd. 2 of § 2778 does not, in my opinion, furnish to defendants' argument the support which they claim therefrom, because said subdivision, and subd. 1 of the same section, which is as follows: '(1) Upon an indemnity against liability expressly, or in other equivalent terms, the person indemnified is entitled to recover upon becoming liable,'—obviously concern only the relations of the indemnitor and the indemnitee as between themselves, and not their obligations to the injured person, these obligations being fixed by § 2777. It should be observed in this connection that, by the policy in the case at bar, said assurance corporation 'agreed to pay to the said Los Angeles Iron & Steel Company, or its legal representatives, all such sums for which the Los Angeles Iron & Steel Company shall become liable to its employees by virtue of the common law, or of any statute,' etc.; that is, the indemnity is against liability, not against claims or demands or damages or costs, . . . and therefore falls within subd. 1 of said § 2778. This subdivision, which gives to the indemnitee a right of action against the indemnitor the moment the former becomes liable to the person injured,—that is, when the injury occurs,—disposes of another argument of the defendant corporations against their joint liability, namely, that 'no action is maintainable against the indemnitor until the plaintiff's claim or debt against the indemnitee becomes legally enforceable against the indemnitee; i. e., until there has been a judicial ascertainment of the amount due for damages from indemnitee to plaintiff.' Besides, this last-mentioned argument finds a complete answer in § 2777 itself, which, by creating a joint and several liability on the part of the indemnitor and indemnitee in favor of the person injured, necessarily gives to the latter a right of action against the indemnitor as soon as the injury happens." But in connection with the Moore Case, see Northam v. Casualty Co. of America (1909) 177 Fed. 981, wherein it was held under a similar statute (Mont. Rev. Code, § 5653) that the statute was merely declaratory of the common-law rule that an indemnitor is a joint tort-feasor with the indemnitee, and in which the court adopted the theory that the phrase "to be done by" as used in the statute implied a request, demand, or agreement to do the act indemnified against, but that since the statute was invoked in the present case merely by virtue of another statute which created a right of action for wrongful death and imposed an imputed liability on employers only, the indemnitor consequently, being liable only for actual wrongdoing, could not be held originally liable under the statute, on the theory that by virtue of the statute he was a joint tort-feasor who, as such, could be sued directly at law. v.

JO JOHNSON.

Arkansas Supreme Court—October 13, 1919.

(— Ark. —, 215 S. W. 665.)

Infant — contract for attorney's fees — how far binding.

1. A contract between an attorney and an infant for whom he is to bring suit, for attorney's fees, is binding as one for the necessities of life if the infant was sufficiently intelligent to understand the nature and extent of the contract.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1011.]

—right to disaffirm contract.

2. Contracts for the necessities of life, made by infants during minority, cannot be disaffirmed by them after reaching their majority.

[See 14 R. C. L. 254.]

Attorney and client — settlement of suit by infant — effect on attorney's fees.

3. The settlement by a minor of a suit after reaching majority will not affect the right of his attorney to fees for which he had contracted during the infant's minority, at a time when the infant was sufficiently intelligent to understand the nature and effect of the contract.

—lien for expenses.

4. If the expenses of an attorney are a part of the fee for which he contracts, they are within the purview of a statute giving a lien for his fees.

[See 2 R. C. L. 1066.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sebastian County, Ft. Smith District (Little, J.), in favor of intervener in a suit brought to recover damages for personal injuries to the infant plaintiff while alighting from defendant's train. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Thomas B. Pryor for appellant.
Mr. Allyn Smith, for appellee:

The infant could not, but did not attempt to, disaffirm the contract of employment.

Humphreys, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was instituted on the 16th day of June, 1916, in the circuit court in the Greenwood district of Sebastian county, by Lizzie Murphy, as next friend for Nevada Murphy, against appellant, Midland Valley Railroad Company, to recover damages received by Nevada Murphy while alighting from a train of appellant at Tulsa, Oklahoma. Upon the filing of the complaint, a summons was issued and duly served upon appellant. On the 5th day of July following, appellant filed a demurrer to the complaint, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and, on the 7th day of July, thereafter, filed an answer denying each and every allegation in the complaint. On January 8, 1917, appellant filed stipulations of agreement between appellant, on the one side, and Nevada Murphy and her lawyer, D. G. Elliott, residing in Oklahoma, on the other, for settlement and dismissal of the suit for damages.

In a few days thereafter, to wit, January 12, 1917, the attorney of record, Jo Johnson, for Nevada Murphy in the damage suit, filed a petition by way of intervention, alleging a compromise and settlement without his consent or knowledge, and asking for judgment against and lien on the property of appellant railroad company for his fees, as per his contract with plaintiff in said damage suit, under which contract it was alleged said attorney was entitled to one half of the proceeds of recovery and one half of said attorney's expenses, amounting, in toto, to $110. By agreement of appellant and intervener, the issue on the intervention was transferred for trial to the Ft. Smith district of Sebastian county. On December 7, 1918, a response was filed by appellant to the petition to fix attorney's fees, in which it was denied that the settlement mentioned in the stipulations for the dismissal of the case was made without the knowledge or consent of said intervener, or that said intervening attorney had any right to a lien on the proceeds of the settlement for a fee and expenses under and by virtue of any agreement or contract with Nevada Murphy. The cause was heard by the court upon the pleadings and evidence adduced, from which the court found that the intervener was entitled to recover from appellant $122.70, including interest, and to a lien on appellant's railroad for said sum. A judgment was rendered in accordance with the finding of the court, from which an appeal has been properly prosecuted to this court.

The facts are, in substance, as follows: On the 22d day of May, 1916, Nevada Murphy's ankle was injured while alighting from the train of appellant at Tulsa, Oklahoma. She was seventeen years of age at the time. A few days thereafter, D. G. Elliott, an attorney residing at Tulsa, Oklahoma, wrote to the general attorney of appellant that he had been employed in the case of Nevada Murphy, who had been injured while stepping off of the train at Tulsa. Thereafter the intervener was employed by W. T. Murphy, father of Nevada Murphy, by and with the consent of her mother, Mrs. Lizzie Murphy, and herself, to institute a suit for damages against appellant in the Greenwood district, Sebastian county, for the injury received by Nevada Murphy at Tulsa, while alighting from appellant's train. The suit was filed on June 16th, to which appellant filed demurrer on July 5th, and answer on July 7th, following. The claim was settled by appellant with Nevada Murphy and her attorney not of record, without the consent of her attorney of record, and with knowledge that the suit was pending and that the intervener was the attorney of record.

The claim agent, Frank J. Wieman, testified that, four or five days after the injury, after investigating the claim, he attempted to make settlement with Nevada Murphy and G. D. Elliott for $100, and, although Mr. Elliott advised her to settle for $100, she contended for $200; that, after the suit had been brought at Greenwood, he agreed to pay Mr. Elliott on settlement $200, but that the settlement itself was made through the general attorney, O. E. Swan; that at that time he asked Mr. Elliott about the suit for damages pending at Greenwood, and that he talked with Nevada Murphy about it, who informed him that no one except Mr. Elliott was authorized to represent her; that when he went to Ft. Smith he telephoned to intervener that he was negotiating a settlement of the claim through G. D. Elliott of Tulsa, Oklahoma.

O. E. Swan, general attorney for appellant railroad company, testified that on January 4, 1917, he made settlement with Nevada Murphy for the injury she received on May 22, 1916, while alighting from appellant's train at Tulsa, for the sum of $200, took a receipt from her for the money, and obtained the stipulation for the dismissal of the suit pending in the Greenwood district of Sebastian county, wherein said Nevada Murphy, by her next friend, Lizzie Murphy, was plaintiff, and appellant was defendant; that at the time of settlement Nevada Murphy made an affidavit to the effect that she was then eighteen years of age, and that D. G. Elliott of Tulsa, Oklahoma, was at the time employed to represent her in her claim against appellant for said injury; and that he had been employed since the second or third day after she received the injury.

Lizzie Murphy, mother of Nevada Murphy, testified that, acting for her daughter, she employed intervener to institute the suit for damages against appellant in the Greenwood district of Sebastian county. Nevada Murphy testified that intervener was employed to represent her by her mother, Lizzie Murphy, with her consent, and that said intervener was still her attorney.

Intervener, Jo Johnson, testified that the first he heard of the case was by letter from W. T. Murphy, written to him from Cotter, Arkansas, and that the correspondence continued until he was authorized to file the suit; that the contract was in writing, and that he was to receive for his fee 50 per cent of the amount recovered and one half of his expenses; that one half of his expenses amount to about $10; that he never consented to a settlement and dismissal of the suit, and knew nothing of it until a few days before he filed a claim for attorney's fees.

Appellant does not seriously contend that Nevada Murphy did not make a contract in the state of Arkansas with the intervener to institute a suit against appellant in the Greenwood district of Sebastian county, to recover damages on account of the injury she received to her ankle at Tulsa, while stepping from appellant's train. If such contention were insisted upon, the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding of the court that such a contract was made in this state. Learned counsel content themselves with the statement that "the only question involved in this suit is the right of the plaintiff, after becoming of full age, to disaffirm her contract, if she had one with the intervener, and to repudiate the contract made by her mother with the intervener to institute suit on behalf of the plaintiff (referring to Nevada Murphy)."

The contention of appellant, as we understand it, is that intervener cannot claim a judgment and lien, by virtue of the Attorney's Lien Statute in this state, under the contract made with Nevada Murphy, for the reason that she was a minor when she made the contract, and that her act in settling the damage suit and signing the stipulation for dismissal thereof constituted a disaffirmance of the contract, after reaching her majority. Unless the act of settling the case and signing the stipulation for the dismissal thereof constituted a disaffirmance of her contract with her attorney, the intervener herein, the intervener was entitled, under Act 293, Acts of 1909, to a judgment against and a lien on appellant's railroad property and bed for the contractual fee. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Kirtley, 120 Ark. 389, 179 S. W. 648; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hays, 128 Ark. 471, 195 S. W. 28. This court said, in the case of St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Blaylock, 117 Ark. 504, 175 S. W. 1170, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 563, that "a client may dismiss his cause of action, or may settle with the opposite party without consulting his attorney; but where there are any proceeds resulting from the litigation, either through settlement or compromise, . . . the attorney has a lien on such proceeds, of which he cannot be deprived by the parties to the lawsuit by any settlement they may make."

The lien upon the subject-matter of the litigation, or the proceeds in case of a compromise and settlement, attaches when the suit is brought, and is not affected by a settlement and compromise and a dismissal of the suit. Of course, under the terms of the statute, the lien can only exist upon a valid express or implied contract between the attorney and client. If the contract in question became nugatory through a disaffirmance thereof by Nevada Murphy after reaching her majority, it might well be contended that there was no contract upon which to base a judgment and lien for attorney's fees in favor of the intervener. In this state it is well settled that contracts for the necessities of life, made by infants, during minority, cannot be disaffirmed by them after reaching their majority. At the time the contract in question was made, Nevada Murphy was seventeen years of age. It is true she had not reached her majority, but she had attained to the age where she was sufficiently intelligent to understand the nature and effect of a contract. We think a contract made for attorney's fees between an attorney and an infant, who is sufficiently intelligent to understand the nature and extent of the contract, is binding as one of the necessities of life. The property rights of a minor, as a rule, cannot be protected without the aid and assistance of an attorney. The right to be protected involves litigation of the courts. In recognition of this principle, it was said in the case of Vance v. Calhoun, 77 Ark. 35, 113 Am. St. Rep. 111, 90 S. W. 619, that (quoting syllabus), "where an infant employed an attorney to bring a suit in his behalf, and afterwards sold him the judgment therein, the infant may subsequently disaffirm such sale and recover the amount collected on the judgment, less the amount owing to the attorney for his services."

As this contract was approved by the minor after she attained to the age of intelligence, it is unnecessary for us to decide whether a contract made by the next friend of a minor with an attorney, for an attorney's fee, would bind the minor. It follows from the doctrine thus announced that it was not within the power of Nevada Murphy to disaffirm her contract of employment with the intervener herein. Not being a contract subject to disaffirmance by her after reaching her majority, her settlement and stipulation for dismissal of the suit could not affect the right of intervener to his judgment under his contract against appellant and lien on its railroad property, under the construction placed upon the Attorney's Lien Statute in this state in the case of St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Blaylock, supra.

It is also insisted that the court erred in allowing $10 expense money and including it in the lien. It is true the statute only allows a lien for attorney's fees based upon valid contracts of employment, express or implied; but, if the expenses contracted for are a part of the fee, they come within the purview of the statute. A contract for 50 per cent of the amount recovered and one half of an attorney's expenses, as in the instant case, must be regarded as a contract including expenses as a part of the fee.

No error appearing, the judgment is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of infant for attorney's services in personal-injury actions.

For power of guardian ad litem or next friend to bind infant by his contract with attorney fixing compensation, see the annotation to Plummer v. Northern P. R. Co. ante, 104.

The decisions on this subject are usually to the effect that where an infant's claim for personal injuries has resulted in a recovery by action or settlement, the attorneys of the infant will be entitled to a reasonable fee; and that if the infant or his next friend has contracted to pay a certain percentage of the recovery, such contract will be carried out if it is reasonable. Perhaps this is as far as the courts can be expected to go. It will be observed that in some of the cases the courts justify the recovery on the ground that the services were a necessary, but that in one of the cases the court states that services "beneficial to the minor" are classed as necessities. If a case arose where an infant who had lost his action for personal injuries was sued by his attorney for services therein, it is conceived that there could not be a recovery if the action for injuries was an improvident undertaking. But suppose that such action was not improvident,—were the services of the attorney therein a necessary? This seems to be an open question on the authorities.

Where an infant and his father entered into a contract with an attorney for a fee of one third of the recovery or settlement on a claim for personal injuries, and an action was brought accordingly, and thereafter the infant and his father settled the case in the absence of said attorney, it was held that the contract was valid and that the defendant was liable to the attorney for his fees, as the services were a necessary for which the infant or his next friend could contract. (The court was further of the opinion that if there was no power to make a contract as to the amount, the attorney was entitled to a reasonable fee, such as was specified.) Haj v. American Bottle Co. (1913) 182 Ill. App. 686. (This case was reversed in (1913) 261 Ill. 362, 103 N. E. 1000, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 220, on the ground that notice of the lien had not been given to the defendant, in compliance with the statute.)

So, in the briefly reported case of Burns v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1914) 190 Ill. App. 191, where a minor and his uncle had employed attorneys to prosecute a claim for personal injuries, but later employed other attorneys, who brought suit and recovered judgment on the claim, it seems to have been held that the services of the first attorneys were a necessary, and that the minor or his next friend might make a contract to pay a reasonable compensation therefor.

In Hanlon v. Wheeler (1898) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 45 S. W. 821, the court approved a charge to the effect that if the jury thought that the infant and his next friend made a contract with attorneys of 50 per cent of the amount that might be recovered in a suit for personal injuries, which resulted in a large recovery, and that this was a reasonable compensation, then the infant was bound thereby; but that, if the figure was more than a reasonable compensation, then the infant was not bound, and the attorneys would be entitled to a reasonable compensation; the court observing that the contract was one for necessities.

In Crafts v. Carr (1902) 24 R. I. 397, 60 L.R.A. 128, 96 Am. St. Rep. 721, 53 Atl. 275, it was held that the services of an attorney in conducting a successful suit by a girl seventeen years old for indecent assault were a necessary, and the court said, the attorney having been employed by the next friend: "The daughter knew of the bringing of the suit and profited by its successful prosecution. She must have conferred with counsel and appeared as a witness, and she certainly attempted to settle such action in a manner highly injurious to her own interests. An implied promise for necessities is sufficient (Gay v. Ballou (1830) 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 403, 21 Am. Dec. 158), and in the case at bar the circumstances, we think, are sufficient to imply a promise on the part of the infant defendant."

In Sutton v. Heinze (1911) 84 Kan. 756, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 238, 115 Pac. 560, on rehearing (1911) 85 Kan. 332, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 239, 116 Pac. 614, where the facts as to the contract of an attorney in an action for personal injuries are not reported, the court said: "The appellant's contention is that the plaintiff's contract with the minor, or with the next friend for the minor, was void. Whether or not an express contract as to the attorney's compensation was enforceable according to its terms, the services having been rendered and having been beneficial to the minor, a liability exists to pay for them, on the ground that they are classed as 'necessaries.'"

It will be seen that it is held in the reported case (MIDLAND VALLEY R. CO. v. JOHNSON, ante, 1007) that where an attorney, employed by the father of an infant seventeen years of age, with her consent and that of her mother, to bring an action for personal injuries to the infant, on a contract for one half of the recovery and one half of the attorney's expenses, had brought such action, and thereafter the infant had, through a different attorney, made a settlement with the defendant, that the attorney of record was entitled to recover his fees from the defendant by reason of his contract with the infant, on the ground that a contract for attorney's fees between an attorney and an infant who is sufficiently intelligent to understand the nature and extent of the contract is binding as one of the necessities of life.

But in Plummer v. Northern P. R. Co. (Wash.) ante, 104, it was held that an infant might disaffirm a contract made by him with attorneys in relation to the prosecution of a claim for personal injuries, whether the services were a necessary or not, the court stating that possibly the attorneys might be able to recover a reasonable compensation from the infant for their services. In this case the contract with the attorneys was signed both by the infant and his guardian ad litem, and the suit was afterwards settled through a different attorney, and the original attorneys sued the original defendant for their contract fee.

Where an attorney was employed by a mother to institute, in behalf of an infant, an action for personal injuries for a 50 per cent contingent fee, a charge of $470, which was $67.50 less than one half of the amount recovered, was in Sanders v. Woodbury (1912) 146 Ky. 153, 142 S. W. 207, approved by the court as very reasonable. The court said: "Our conclusion, then, is that the next friend of an infant may employ counsel to represent him and agree on the compensation to be paid, subject, however, to the limitation that the fee agreed upon shall be reasonable, and this is a question for the court. That being true, such a contract will be upheld if it appears that the compensation contracted for is reasonable."

Where, at the request of a father, attorneys, under a 50 per cent contingent fee contract, brought suit to recover for personal injuries suffered by an infant in a coal mine, such fee, being customary and reasonable in the community, was held valid in Elk Valley Coal Min. Co. v. Willis (1912) 149 Ky. 449, 149 S. W. 894; and the claim having been compromised without the attorneys' knowledge, on a money, property, and employment basis, it was held that they could recover from the defendant company not only 50 per cent of the value of the money and property received, but half of the value of the employment contract.

In Ryan v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. (1911) 189 Fed. 253, the court approved an agreement (made after settlement of the action for injuries) between the guardian ad litem and the attorney for the infant plaintiff, fixing the attorney's fees at 50 per cent of the settlement, stating that a guardian ad litem could not bind the ward by any such agreement unless with the court's approval.

In Hickman v. McDonald (1914) 164 Iowa, 50, 145 N. W. 322, a suit by attorneys to establish a lien on securities given in settlement of an action for the seduction of an infant, counsel for defendant conceded for the purpose of the case that legal service and advice in a seduction case are a necessity, but contended that that was not true of the services in procuring the settlement, upon the theory that in that matter the plaintiffs acted as agents, and not as attorneys. The court, however, accepting this concession,—which it observed was in accord with the decisions in other jurisdictions,—repudiated the contention, observing that the plaintiffs were not divested of their character as attorneys or their relationship as such by their attempt to accomplish the settlement. The settlement was ratified by the next friend and the infant, before the latter's majority, though upon attaining majority she attempted to repudiate both the contract of employment and the settlement. In reply to the argument that even though the minor was bound for the services of her attorneys as for necessities, she was bound only for their reasonable value, regardless of the contract amount, the court said that, as an abstract proposition, there was much to be said in support of that contention; but that, in the case at bar, the undisputed evidence showed the reasonable value of the service to be the same amount as that fixed by the contract; viz., one half of what might be collected by suit or otherwise.

In granting an application of a guardian ad litem for leave to change her attorney in a personal-injuries action, the court said: "The recovery herein, if there ever is any, will be absolutely under the control of the court, and no part of it can be paid to any attorney without the sanction and order of the court;" and the court recognized the right of the superseded attorney to have the value of his services fixed and paid out of the amount of any recovery that might be had. Bryant v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. (1901) 64 App. Div. 542, 72 N. Y. Supp. 308.

In Ex parte Smithson (1902) 108 Tenn. 442, 67 S. W. 864, where the nature of the action does not appear, the attorneys who represented the infant, and who obtained a substantial recovery, moved the court to allow them 30 per cent of the recovery as fees for their services. The court said: "These gentlemen have unquestionably rendered their client valuable services, and for such services they are as certainly entitled to a lien on his recovery for reasonable compensation. This they may now have declared on the minutes of this court, but the amount of their fees cannot be fixed and adjudged on this ex parte application. This is a matter to be determined in some suitable proceeding in which the minor will have an opportunity to be heard; or it might probably be determined by contract with his guardian, when one shall be appointed." APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Middlesex County (Case, J.) in their favor, against defendant Northrop and in favor of the other defendants in an action on a probate bond. Reversed in part.

Statement by Wheeler, J.:

One Northrop was on July 30, 1884, appointed, after several successive trusteeships, trustee of a trust created by the will of Charles Brewer in favor of sundry beneficiaries as life tenants, with provision that upon the death of the last life tenant the trustee should pay over, convey, and deliver the trust estate remaining to all of the children of the sons of Charles Brewer and their issue then surviving. Northrop gave a bond, the sureties upon which were Clarissa L. Northrop, Ettie M. Northrop, and Arthur B. Calef, deceased, under whose will defendant J. Francis Calef is the sole surviving executor; said J. Francis Calef was also a distributee of the estate of Arthur B. Calef, his brother.

On July 24, 1911, Northrop was removed by the court of probate for failure to file his account, and the Middletown Trust Company was appointed in his stead.

Those entitled to the principal of the fund upon the termination of the trust on February 26, 1913, were: The children of Henry, who was a son of Charles; the children of Frederic, a son of Charles; and William Brewer, a son, and Jennie W. Blinn, a daughter of Samuel, the son of Charles. Charles T. McClure, the executor of William Brewer, who died March 6, 1916, and Jennie W. Blinn, are the plaintiffs in this case.

The defendant Northrop failed and neglected to turn over the funds of this trust estate to his successor, or to pay any part thereof to either of the plaintiffs.

The entire trust fund of $8,800 had been misappropriated by Northrop by the close of the year 1897.

Arthur B. Calef, one of the sureties upon Northrop's bond, died August 17, 1900, leaving a will and a substantial estate which was duly distributed.

The court of probate allowed six months from August 27, 1900, within which claims should be presented. No claim for breach of this bond was presented against the estate of Arthur B. Calef within this period or subsequently.

Before this action there had been no judicial ascertainment that Northrop had misappropriated the funds, or that they had been wholly or partially lost, or to what extent, if any, Northrop was able to make good his default.

Jennie W. Blinn, one of the plaintiffs, and William Brewer, on or prior to July 30, 1911, knew that these funds had been misappropriated by Northrop and were wholly lost.

On March 4, 1914, Jennie W. Blinn and William Brewer entered into an agreement with Northrop to release him from all obligation to them by reason of his default as trustee, provided he would pay to them $2,000 before May 1, 1914, and accrued interest on their portion of the trust fund to that date.

Jennie W. Blinn, with full knowledge of the default of Northrop, and after his removal, and during the years 1914 and 1915, continued to accept payments from him equal in amount to what her portion of the income would have been had this fund remained intact, and, in consideration of these payments and promises, she refrained from taking action against Northrop or any of the sureties, and refrained from giving the sureties or their representatives any notice of the breach of trust of the trustee.

Neither the surety, Ettie M. Northrop, nor J. Francis Calef, executor and distributee of another surety, Arthur B. Calef, had any notice of the breach of trust of Northrop until the commencement of this action.

On December 31, 1908, Northrop, trustee, filed an account, and this was the only account filed by him as trustee. He concealed from the beneficiaries of this fund, up to the time of his removal as trustee in 1911, the fact that he had misappropriated the fund.

Messrs. Charles T. McClure and George W. Crawford, for appellants:

The liability on the trustee's bond is joint and several against the principal sureties, and therefore survives and may be enforced against their estates, and, by the aid of equity, against their distributees.

Mr. Gustaf B. Carlson for appellees other than D. Ward Northrop.

Wheeler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action seeks to hold the principal and one surety, Ettie M. Northrop, upon a probate bond, and J. Francis Calef, the executor of the will of another surety, Arthur B. Calef, who was also a distributee of such surety. All of these parties are properly in court, and all the steps requisite to be taken to hold the principal, the living surety, and the representative and the distributee of the estate of the deceased surety, have been taken. An adjudication of the entire matter may be had in a single action, each step can be kept distinct, and when this is done the distributee of the deceased surety may be compelled by an appropriate decree to reconstitute to the extent of the share received by him, and this sum is then available to meet the judgment against the estate of the deceased surety. Davis v. Vansands, 45 Conn. 604, Fed. Cas. No. 3,655; Mathewson v. Wakelee, 83 Conn. 79, 80, 75 Atl. 93.

From this it follows that the court was in error in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint of the defendant J. Francis Calef, in his personal capacity as distributee of Arthur B. Calef.

The superior court rendered judgment against the principal on the bond, and in favor of one surety and the representative and the distributee of a deceased surety upon this bond.

The appeal of the plaintiffs, aside from the correction of the finding, attacks the judgment in favor of the sureties. It is clear that the sureties upon this bond are equally liable with the principal, unless the sureties can avail themselves of one of the Statutes of Limitation, or the Statute of Nonclaim, or a general claim of laches.

Counsel for the sureties argue that the cause of action accrued against the trustee and the sureties on this bond in 1897, when the trustee had lost or misappropriated all of the funds of the estate in his hands; that the breach occurred when the trust fund was converted, and hence an action could have been brought at that time; and that this set in operation the general Statute of Limitation which provided that an action shall not be brought on contracts under seal but within seventeen years. Gen. Stat. § 6151.

We think the argument fails to take into account the distinction between the creation of a liability upon a bond and the accrual of a cause of action thereon.

It is undoubted that the Statute of Limitation begins to run as soon as the right of action has accrued. Limitation of actions—when runs. Eising v. Andrews, 66 Conn. 58, 65, 50 Am. St. Rep. 75, 33 Atl. 585. But the right of action will not accrue until there is a person or persons capable of suing and being sued. 25 Cyc. 1067.

The trustee Northrop was the only legal custodian of this fund. The beneficiaries of the life estate and of the remainder estate could institute proceedings to secure his removal; but, until a trustee was named in his stead, there was no one against whom the statute could run.

Further, until Northrop failed on demand to pay over the trust fund to his successor it could not be known that he would not meet this obligation.

The cestui que trust is entitled to have the entire trust fund paid over upon the settlement of the trust, and the Statute of Limitation cannot run against him and in favor of the principal upon the bond, the trustee of the trust fund, until his trusteeship is terminated and his breach of trust then established. McKim v. Glover, 161 Mass. 418, 421, 37 N. E. 443; Prindle v. Holcomb, 45 Conn. 121; State v. Howarth, 48 Conn. 212.

There is another conclusive reason why the Statute of Limitation has not run the requisite seventeen years. The trustee fraudulently concealed his breach until about the time of his removal, the court finding that Northrop had "concealed from the claimants of the fund, up to the time of his removal in 1911, the fact that he had misappropriated the fund."

The fraudulent concealment by the trustee of the cause of action arrested the running of the statute until the time "when the person entitled to sue thereon shall first discover its existence." Gen. Stat. 1918, § 6175.

The effect of this statute is that no cause of action came into existence by reason of Northrop's misappropriation until it was discovered in 1911, and the Middletown Trust Company was appointed trustee in his stead. Eising v. Andrews, 66 Conn. 58, 64, 50 Am. St. Rep. 75, 33 Atl. 585.

The sureties do not pursue in their brief the claim that this action is barred by the statute limiting actions against sureties on probate bonds to those brought within six years from the final settlement and acceptance of the account of the principal. Gen. Stat. 1918, § 6156.

The trustee Northrop has never rendered a final account, and hence this statute never began to run.

The defendants assert in their brief, but do not there argue, their defense of laches. Our reasons for not thinking this defense available to these defendants are these:

No obligation rested upon the distributees of this trust fund to protect the sureties on this bond against the act of the principal prior to the death of the last life tenant, Susan Brewer, on February 26, 1913. Until then the distributees could not be known. And in the absence of fraud on their part prejudicial to the sureties, they cannot be held in any degree responsible for the acts or omissions of this testamentary trustee. State v. Howarth, 48 Conn. 213. Nor can the distributees be held responsible for the acts or omissions of the life tenants. Remaindermen and life tenants are not in privity. There is thus no possible basis for a claim of laches on the part of these distributees who are the plaintiffs herein until after the decease of the life tenant, for their right to enforce a final distribution began then. Before that time a charge of laches on their part could not be sustained.

The finding does not disclose that these defendants or any of them have been prejudiced by the delay of the plaintiffs in asserting their claim between February 26, 1913, the date of decease of the last life tenant, and December 18, 1916, the date of the writ in this action.

"There is no merit

in the defense of laches. That exists only where there has been such a delay in the assertion of a claim as naturally to prejudice him against whom the claim is set up." Hartford v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank, 79 Conn. 38, 41, 63 Atl. 659; Waterman v. A. & W. Sprague Mfg. Co. 55 Conn. 554, 574, 12 Atl. 240.

We cannot hold as matter of law that the delay for this period has "naturally prejudiced" these defendants; that is, that this delay was for such a period and under such circumstances as to lead to the natural conclusion that it must have prejudiced these defendants. Nothing short of a specific finding would warrant such a conclusion.

Appeal—absence of findings—
laches.

Our consideration of the case has led us to examine one question not raised by counsel; viz., whether the agreement to release Northrop discharged the sureties on the bond.

The finding recites that Mrs. Blinn and William Brewer entered into an agreement with Northrop, the principal upon the bond, to release him from all obligation to them by reason of his default as trustee, provided he would pay to them $2,000 before May 1, 1914, and accrued interest on their portion of the trust fund to that date.

Two additional facts are of significance:

(1) The amount of the trust fund which was the share of Mrs. Blinn and Mr. Brewer at the time of this agreement exceeded the sum of $2,000 and the accrued interest due on their share.

(2) There was no consideration for this agreement. An unqualified release of a principal debtor will discharge the surety. Rockville Nat. Bank v. Holt, 58 Conn. 526, 531, 18 Am. St. Rep. 293, 20 Atl. 669.

To effect the discharge the release must be unconditional and upon good consideration.

In Boardman v. Larrabee, 51 Conn. 39, 43, the purchaser of land which was subject to a mortgage assumed the mortgage note. After it became due the creditor gave the purchaser time for payment.

It was held that the purchaser became in his relation to the mortgage debtor the principal debtor, and the original debtor in his relation to him a surety, but that this relation existed only between themselves and did not affect the mortgage creditor. And where, after the mortgage note has become due, time is given the purchaser for payment, it does not discharge the original debtor on the ground that he has become a surety.

In the course of its discussion the court, by Pardee, J., said: "Moreover, if we should concede to Larrabee the rights of a surety, he would be met by the well-settled rule that the surety is only released when there is a positive contract by the holder to give time to the principal—a contract upon good consideration susceptible of enforcement." Ibid. See also Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Holloway, 51 Conn. 310, 50 Am. Rep. 21.

These decisions are authoritative that the agreement to release Northrop from his default did not discharge the surety, since there was no consideration for the agreement, and since the release was not unqualified but was conditional upon the payment of the sum agreed upon.

An agreement without consideration is a mere indulgence and unenforceable. It does not prevent the creditor from pressing his claim, hence it cannot operate to discharge the surety.

In this case the amount to be paid was less than the amount due, and the interest promised to be paid was the interest accrued.

Northrop did not agree to pay anything which he was not already bound to pay.

In Wilson v. Powers, 130 Mass. 127, the court says: "The indorser or the surety upon a note is discharged by an agreement made, without his consent, between the holder and the maker, to give time to the maker. But, to have this effect, it must be a valid agreement founded upon a good consideration, such as can be enforced either at law or in equity. . . . Walsh did not promise to do anything which he was not already bound by his note to do. . . . There is no advantage to Wilson nor disadvantage to Walsh . . . which can constitute a consideration. . . . It was therefore not binding upon him. Notwithstanding the agreement, he could at any time have sued Walsh upon the note, and the sureties could at any time have paid the note and have prosecuted their remedy against Walsh." Ibid. See also Olmstead v. Latimer, 158 N. Y. 313, 48 L.R.A. 685, 53 N. E. 5; Miller v. Hatch, 72 Me. 481, 484, 39 Am. Rep. 346; M'Lemore v. Powell, 12 Wheat. 554, 6 L. ed. 726; Clark v. Gerstley, 204 U. S. 504, 51 L. ed. 589, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 337.

One other reason takes this case out of the general rule. The agreement to release Northrop was conditioned upon his payment of a part of the sums owed.

So long as this condition was unperformed, the agreement was executory and the obligation upon the original debt existed. The agreement of discharge must be absolute and unqualified. It must contain words of present discharge.

Judge Wells states the principle as well as we have seen it stated, in his opinion in Blake v. Blake, 110

Principal and surety—release of principal—effect on surety.

—necessity of consideration.

—conditional release.

—absence of consideration.

—words of present discharge.

Mass. 202: "The agreement to accept a part in satisfaction of the whole, so long as it remains executory, will not operate either as payment, satisfaction, or discharge. . . . The instrument, being under seal, may operate as a discharge if its terms so provide; but not otherwise. It contains no words of present discharge. The only provision for a future discharge is that upon payment in full of the lesser sum, stipulated to be paid in lieu of the whole, 'the said note shall then be canceled and surrendered.' Until that condition is complied with, the original debt remains unaffected by the executory agreement for a discharge." Ibid. See also United States v. Nicholl, 12 Wheat. 505, 6 L. ed. 709; Stroud v. Thomas, 139 Cal. 274, 96 Am. St. Rep. 111, 72 Pac. 1008; Regan v. Williams, 185 Mo. 620, 105 Am. St. Rep. 600, 84 S. W. 959; Thorn v. Pinkham, 84 Me. 101, 30 Am. St. Rep. 335, 24 Atl. 718.

The agreement of release did not discharge the sureties. The defendant J. Francis Calef, as executor of Arthur B. Calef, one of the sureties, further defends upon the ground that this action is barred against him for the reason that the claim on which it is based was not presented to the estate of Arthur B. Calef within the time allowed by the court of probate for the presentation of claims. The time thus allowed was six months from the 27th day of August, 1900.

The order of the court of probate in terms applied to existing claims. It did not contemplate contingent or after-accruing claims which had no present existence. A liability upon a bond which may or may not thereafter accrue is not affected by an order such as this when it accrues after the period limited in the order.

The liability against Northrop accrued when demand was made upon him by his successor in the trust in 1911 for the funds which had been misappropriated by him in 1897.

His failure to turn these over fixed his liability and its extent.

There was nothing in the probate order which required these plaintiffs to then or thereafter present their claim against the estate of Arthur B. Calef.

But General Statutes 1902, § 326, provide that "when a right of action shall accrue after the death of the deceased, it shall be exhibited within four months after such right of action shall accrue;" and the question recurs whether the claim of the plaintiffs, as against the estate of Arthur B. Calef or J. Francis Calef, executor, is not barred by their failure to present it within four months from the time it accrued. This statute, except as to the period of limitation, has remained substantially as first enacted in 1821. Prior to that time there was no specific limitation as to the presentation of claims that accrued subsequent to the death of the deceased, but a claim was barred by unreasonable delay. Griswold v. Bigelow, 6 Conn. 258, 265. This statute has been held to mean that if a right of action accrued after the death of a decedent it is barred unless presented within four months after its accrual. Pease v. Phelps, 10 Conn. 62, 67; Bacon v. Thorp, 27 Conn. 251, 260. Unless the character of the claim excludes it from the bar of the statute, it cannot now be an enforceable claim against the estate of Arthur B. Calef or J. Francis Calef, executor. The claim against the sureties is an ordinary money claim for breach of a bond. If the estate were still in process of settlement, the executor could unquestionably have pleaded the bar of the statute. The action against the estate would have been a legal one for a money demand, just as if the surety had been alive. Neither action would have called for equitable relief. Had the claim been duly presented, an action would have lain against the estate and a judgment for damages could have been obtained. The estate having been distributed, equity provides a means of enforcing the judgment by compelling the distributees to refund to the estate such portion thereof as they had received and which would be required to satisfy the judgment. The action against the distributees is an equitable remedy. But it must be founded upon the adjudication of a legal claim against the estate; and the statute operates against such a claim. If the claimant establishes his claim, then there is no bar to the equitable remedy against the distributees, except that of laches. We pursue in one action the legal remedy against the estate and the equitable remedy against the distributees, but they remain in reality two independent actions. "Two successive steps," as they were called in Mathewson v. Wakelee, 83 Conn. 75, 79, 75 Atl. 93, the first to judicially establish that the plaintiff has a valid claim enforceable against the estate; the second, an equitable action to reclaim the assets of the estate so that they may satisfy the claim. The first step is a legal action and within the bar of the statute; the second is an equitable action and without the bar of the statute.

—proceeding to compel return of assets to estate.

The sustaining of the demurrer in favor of J. Francis Calef requires a rescript reversing the judgment in his favor, although the conclusion reached will ultimately require a judgment in his favor.

There is error, the judgment in favor of the defendants Ettie M. Northrop and J. Francis Calef in his personal capacity is reversed, and the judgment in favor of J. Francis Calef, executor, is sustained, and the cause is remanded with direction to the Superior Court to assess the damages against Ettie M. Northrop and render judgment in accordance with the foregoing opinion, and that the cause against J. Francis Calef in his personal capacity be proceeded with according to law.

In this opinion the other Judges concur.

ANNOTATION.

Remainderman of trust fund as chargeable with laches regarding trustee's misconduct during life of life tenant.

There are but few cases in which the courts have passed on the effect of the equitable defense of laches in an action by the remaindermen of a trust fund, for the misconduct of the trustee, where the lapse of time on which the claim of laches was predicated occurred during the life of the life tenant. But the decisions seem in accord in holding that a claim of laches cannot be based on mere acquiescence on the part of the remaindermen of an express trust during the life of the life tenant, since he had then no right to enforce his claim to the fund. Sedgwick v. Taylor (1888) 84 Va. 820, 6 S. E. 226; Stewart v. Conrad (1902) 100 Va. 128, 40 S. E. 624; Inglis v. Beaty (1878) 2 Ont. App. Rep. 453. And see the reported case

(STATE EX REL. MCCLURE v. NORTHPROP, ante, 1014).

In Sedgwick v. Taylor (Va.) supra, wherein the remainderman of a trust fund sought to recover the corpus of the property from the estate of the trustee who had illegally disposed of the fund, the court held that a defense that the claim was stale would not avail the defendant where the lapse of time during which the remainderman had taken no action occurred during the life of the life tenant, since the right of the remainderman to demand payment of the fund did not accrue until the death of the life tenant.

In Stewart v. Conrad (1902) 100 Va. 128, 40 S. E. 624, an action by the remaindermen of a trust fund for an accounting thereof, it appeared that for a long period of years following the alleged misconduct of the trustee, and during the life of the life tenant, no action had been taken by the remaindermen to prevent or remedy the violation of the trust and preserve the fund. The defendant maintained that this omission amounted to laches, and was a complete defense to the action, but the court held that the remainderman could not be charged with laches during the life of the life tenant, saying: "The remaindermen, under the terms of the will creating the trust, are not entitled to the possession of any part of it until the death of the life tenant, who was a party to the suit, and who, so far as this record shows, is still living. Until her death the appellants would have no standing in court except to ask a court of equity to prevent or remedy a violation of the trust, and to preserve the trust fund. They had the right to invoke the aid of a court of equity for those purposes, but they were under no legal obligation to do so, and the objection of laches or acquiescence will not lie for their failure to assert rights which have not yet accrued."

In Inglis v. Beaty (Ont.) supra, the remainderman of a trust fund objected to the amount of the fund returned on the accounting, it appearing that a considerable sum had been retained by the trustee after his settlement of the trust. The trustee maintained that the remainderman was estopped from objecting thereto, since her inaction for a long period amounted to an acquiescence in the settlement. It appeared that the lapse of time with which the defendant sought to charge the remainderman had occurred while the latter's interest was only a reversionary one, and the court held that a failure to act previously to the descent of the estate would not be sufficient to charge the remainderman with acquiescence.

And see Kennedy v. Winn (1885) 80 Ala. 165, wherein the life tenants and cestuis que trust of a trust fund which had been lost through the misconduct of the trustee filed a bill in equity for a settlement of the trust. It appeared that the alleged misconduct had occurred nine years previously to action brought, and on this ground the defendant sought to charge the plaintiffs with laches. The court held that the life tenants could not be estopped by laches from collecting the interest on the fund, and added that the remaindermen could not be charged with laches predicated on this delay during the life of the life tenant.

But it has been held that the defense of laches may arise during the life of the life tenant where the trust is one arising by implication of law, as distinguished from an express trust. McLaffin v. Jones (1895) 155 Ill. 539, 40 N. E. 330, wherein it appeared that a trust arose by implication of law, and the remaindermen delayed for thirteen years after knowledge of a misappropriation by the trustee, before following up the fund. The court held that they were chargeable with laches, and precluded thereby from a recovery, although the life tenant was still living and joined with them in the action. The appellate court (1894) 55 Ill. App. 518, in disposing of the plaintiff's contention that laches could not be interposed as a bar in an action on a trust fund, said: "It is not an express trust, but if a trust, it is so merely by implication of law, and in such cases we understand the rule to be that laches will bar relief." Affirming the decision, the supreme court quoted and adopted the foregoing language.

v.

GEORGE I. DANKS, Exr., etc., of William Gillmore, Deceased, et al.,
Appts.

Illinois Supreme Court — October 27, 1919.

(289 Ill. 542, 124 N. E. 625.)

Tax — gift in contemplation of death.

1. A gift will be deemed to have been made in contemplation of death within the meaning of the tax law if it is apparent that the donor's condition was such that he might reasonably have expected death at any time, and the disposition of his property is such as he had contemplated making in that event, or such as he might reasonably be supposed to have desired in the event of his death, and no other motive is apparent for making the transfer at the time it was made.

Evidence — gift in contemplation of death.

2. Upon the question whether or not a gift was made in contemplation of death, evidence may be considered as to the donor's age, his physical condition, and any action contemplated to be taken by him with respect to his health, as well as the length of time he survived the making of the transfer.

Tax — concrete case — gift in contemplation of death.

3. A gift by a man eighty-eight years old, to his daughter, will be held to have been in contemplation of death within the meaning of the tax law, although he lived two years after making it, if he knew that he was afflicted with an incurable disease, and the gift was part of a disposition of the bulk of his property, while his will, made contemporaneously, sought to confirm the disposition made, and the gift to the daughter was not to take effect until after his death.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Effingham County Court (Overbeck, J.) in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to assess and collect an inheritance tax alleged to be due from the estate of William Gillmore, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. George I. Danks and Paul Taylor, for appellants:

The object of the Inheritance Tax Act is not to prevent a parent from giving the whole or any portion of his property to his children during his lifetime, if he so desires, but only to subject such property to an inheritance tax if the gift is made in contemplation of death.

People v. Kelley, 218 Ill. 509, 75 N. E. 1038.

Where transfers and gifts of property take effect in possession and enjoyment during the lifetime of the grantor, they are not subject to an inheritance tax unless the grantor's contemplation of death was the impelling motive which caused him to make them.

People v. Burkhalter, 247 Ill. 600, 139 Am. St. Rep. 351, 93 N. E. 379.

The words "in contemplation of death," used in the Inheritance Tax Statute, mean an apprehension of death, arising from some existing infirmity or impending peril.

People v. Carpenter, 264 Ill. 400, 106 N. E. 302; Rosenthal v. People, 211 Ill. 306, 71 N. E. 1121; State v. Pabst, 139 Wis. 561, 121 N. W. 351.

The Inheritance Tax Law imposed a special tax, and in case of doubt the language must be construed strictly against the government and in favor of the taxpayer.

Where the grantor reserves the income from a part of the property conveyed before his death, and gives the balance to his heirs absolutely, in fixing the inheritance tax upon his estate, the court may fix the tax as to such part as an interest was reserved in, and should not assess it against the part given absolutely, unless it affirmatively appears from the evidence that such conveyance was made in contemplation of death.

An irrevocable absolute gift inter vivos, if in contemplation of death, is taxable, though not causa mortis.

A gift is made in contemplation of an event when it is made in expectation of that event and having it in view; and a gift made when the donor is looking forward to his death as impending, and in view of that event, is within the language of the statute.

Rosenthal v. People, supra.

In determining whether a gift has been made in contemplation of death it should be considered what the impelling motive was that caused the gift to be made; and where there is no other moving cause than the expectation of death, the gifts are in contemplation of death.

In the eye of the law, transfers of real estate may be absolute and vest the fee in the grantee, and yet be in contemplation of death, and liable to an inheritance tax.

Merrifield v. People, 212 Ill. 405, 72 N. E. 446.

"In contemplation of death" means an apprehension of death arising from existing infirmity or impending peril.

People v. Carpenter, 264 Ill. 400, 106 N. E. 302.

Advanced age is a circumstance to be taken into consideration in determining whether a gift is in contemplation of death, and may even raise a presumption that it was made in contemplation of death.

Re Dunne, N. Y. L. J. May 25, 1914; Gleason & O. Inheritance Taxn. p. 82.

Thompson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the county court of Effingham county fixing a tax of $3,213 under the Inheritance Tax Law (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1917, chap. 120, §§ 366-388h) against Maude B. Danks on account of property transferred to her by her father, William Gillmore. No question is raised as to the regularity of the proceedings by which the tax was assessed, so the only question in controversy is the liability for such tax of certain real estate conveyed to Maude B. Danks by deeds made by William Gillmore, deceased, two years prior to his death. The county court held the transfers were taxable as gifts made "in contemplation of death," and accordingly entered an order assessing the tax. From this decision George I. Danks, as executor, and Maude B. Danks, have prosecuted their appeal to this court.

The facts were stipulated in the trial court, and so far as they are material to be considered here may be stated as follows: William Gillmore, a resident of Edgewood, Effingham county, this state, departed this life testate on May 9, 1917, leaving him surviving Maude B. Danks and James L. Gillmore, his children and only heirs at law. He left an original will, dated November 13, 1907, to which were attached two codicils, one dated December 3, 1912, shortly after the death of his wife, and the other November 13, 1915, a week after the execution of the last deed here in question. The will and codicils were duly admitted to probate and letters testamentary issued. The appraised value of his estate, other than the land on which the tax in controversy was assessed, was $89,421.30. Maude B. Danks, as residuary legatee under such will, received notes and personal property aggregating $67,567.16. She also received from her father, by assignment made on November 6, 1915, notes and mortgages aggregating $44,000, on which he reserved the interest or income during his life. It is admitted this property was subject to an inheritance tax. In addition to the above property, deceased in his lifetime conveyed to his daughter, Maude, real estate valued at $69,083. March 26, 1915, he executed three deeds, conveying to her a tract of 1,355.41 acres, valued at $31,834, and November 6, 1915, he executed four deeds, conveying to her 1,024.23 acres, valued at $37,249. All of this land is situated in Effingham county, this state. The deeds were intended as absolute conveyances of the property described therein, and were duly executed, acknowledged, and delivered at the time made. The consideration stated in each deed is "love and affection and $1." At the time the deeds were made the land was under lease to George I. Danks, son-in-law of the deceased, at an annual rental of $1. The lease was made January 1, 1914, and runs for the period of the natural life of the lessor, William Gillmore. At the time the deeds were made Gillmore was affected with heart trouble and arteriosclerosis of some two or three years' standing, and was continually under treatment and care of a physician. He had consulted a specialist, and was fully advised as to the nature of his trouble. He was taking medicine daily for his heart. During the last two or three years of his life he was constantly attended by a maid. He was not, however, confined to his bed, but was up and around the house, and nearly every day went to his store, a short distance from his home. At the time the deeds were made his condition of health was fairly good, considering his age and the nature of the disease with which he was afflicted, and it is not claimed his condition was then any different from what it had been for some months before. No serious attacks of heart trouble are shown to have occurred until a few days before his death. Some years before he died he gave to his son, James L. Gillmore, a tract of 160 acres of land in Clay county, in this state, and $1,000 in cash. This deed is dated May 1, 1905. At the same time he took from his son a receipt, in which it was recited that the father had previously given the son money and other property, and that in consideration of such gifts and conveyances made it was agreed that the son had received his full share in the estate, and that in the event his father preceded him in death he would not be entitled to any share in the estate, nor would he have any claim or demands of any kind or nature whatever, against it. The value of the property previously given to the son is not shown. On September 6, 1912, he also made a gift of a tract of 62 acres of land in Effingham county to a nephew, Erastus S. Gillmore, by executing a deed to the same, which was placed in a sealed envelop and left with a bank at Edgewood, to be delivered to the grantee at the grantor's death. No gifts or transfers of property of any kind are shown to have been made to Maude B. Danks prior to the conveyances in question, unless the lease of this land to her husband on January 1, 1914, can be so considered. About ten years before his death the deceased induced his daughter and her husband, George I. Danks, to give up their home in the West and come and reside with him. At the time this was done George I. Danks took upon himself the management of the business of deceased, and in return received a grocery store located at Edgewood and $1,000 worth of stock in the First National Bank of Effingham, and later a lease to the land subsequently conveyed to the daughter, and a gift of the horses, cattle, and farm tools which the deceased then owned. It is also stipulated that deceased on several occasions told the officer who took the acknowledgment to the deeds that he was going to give his land to his daughter, and that on the day the last deed was executed he told the officer he was giving all his land to Maude. By his original will, executed November 13, 1907, he gave the bulk of the property he then owned, including the property against which the tax in question was assessed, to his daughter, and by the codicil executed December 3, 1912, shortly after the death of his wife, he gave to his daughter the property he had previously devised to his wife, and by the second codicil, made November 13, 1915, he directed that his daughter pay to her brother, James L. Gillmore, $30 a month so long as he lived, with the further provision that should the son attempt in any way to contest the will or any disposition made by him of his property, the son should forfeit his right to such monthly payment.

The sole question presented by this record is whether or not, under the facts as stipulated, with all legitimate inferences to be drawn therefrom, the conveyances in question are to be deemed to have been made "in contemplation of death" as those words are used in the statute. The Inheritance Tax Law was not intended to prevent a person from disposing of his property in any legitimate way he sees fit (People v. Burkhalter, 247 Ill. 600, 139 Am. St. Rep. 351, 93 N. E. 379), nor to prevent a parent, in his lifetime, from giving to his children the whole or any part of his estate, so long as the gift was not intended as a testamentary disposition of his property, or made in contemplation of the donor's death (People v.

Kelley, 218 Ill. 509, 75 N. E. 1038). The law merely imposes a tax upon the right of succession to the ownership of property through the operation of the laws relating to descent and devise. Kochersperger v. Drake, 167 Ill. 122, 41 L.R.A. 446, 47 N. E. 321; Re Benton, 234 Ill. 366, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 458, 84 N. E. 1026, 14 Ann. Cas. 107. The purpose of the provisions imposing a tax upon gifts and transfers intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the donor, or made in contemplation of his death, was to prevent an evasion of such laws by a distribution of property just before or in anticipation of the owner's death. Its manifested purpose was to include all gifts or transfers made prior to the donor's death which were similar in their nature and effect to a testamentary disposition of property, or accomplished the same object, under circumstances which imparted to it the characteristics of a devolution of property made in anticipation of the donor's death. Rosenthal v. People, 211 Ill. 306, 71 N. E. 1121.

A gift is made "in contemplation of death" when it is made in expectation of that event, or with that event in view. Ibid. The term does not mean that general expectation which all rational persons have that they must die some time, but refers more particularly to that apprehension of death which arises from some existing infirmity of such a character as would prompt an ordinarily prudent person to make a disposition of his property and bestow it upon those whom he regarded as most entitled to be the recipients of his bounty. People v. Carpenter, 264 Ill. 400, 106 N. E. 302. What prompts the making of such a conveyance rests upon the facts and circumstances surrounding each particular case. No general rule can be formulated which will fit all cases, but each case must be examined and determined on its own facts and circumstances, in the light of the experience which the courts have gained in dealing with such matters. For this purpose the donor's age, physical condition, and any action contemplated to be taken by him with respect to his health, as well as the length of time he survives the making of the transfers, are all proper matters to be considered in determining whether or not the act was done in contemplation of death. If, upon a consideration of all the surrounding facts and circumstances, it is apparent the donor's condition was such that he might reasonably have expected death at any time, and the disposition made of his property is such as he had contemplated making in that event, or such as he might reasonably be supposed to have desired to be made at his death, and no other moving cause is apparent for making the transfer at the time it was made, the gift will be deemed to have been made in contemplation of death, even though the transfer is absolute in form, and such as would invest the donee with the absolute right to the property during the lifetime of the donor. Rosenthal v. People, supra; Merrifield's Estate v. People, 212 Ill. 400, 72 N. E. 446; People v. Porter, 287 Ill. 401, post, 1041, 123 N. E. 59.

In the instant case the donor was past eighty-eight years of age, in poor health, under a specialist's care, and constantly in charge of an attendant or maid. He was affected with an incurable disease, was fully advised of that fact, and was no longer taking any active interest in his business affairs. His whole environment was that of a man who realized that he had not long to live, and his thoughts seemed centered upon making provision for those who were to enjoy his property after his death. This is shown by the transfer of his store and farm property to his son-in-law; the execution of a lease of the land in question, at a nominal rental, for the period of his natural life; the gift of certain of his property to his son; the taking from the son of an acknowledgment that he had received his share of his father's estate; the execution of the deed for certain lands to his nephew, to be delivered at his death; the execution of the deeds in question; the assignment of the notes and securities to his daughter, in which he reserved the interest or income during his life; and the almost simultaneous execution of the codicil to his will, by which he endeavored to make the prior gifts to his daughter doubly secure to her. All of these are the acts of a man who realizes that his death is apt to occur in the near future and is making preparation for that event. In this respect the case at bar is clearly distinguishable from People v. Kelley, supra, the case mainly relied upon by appellants. In that case the trust deed was executed because the donor felt his sons were not making as much money in their business as their stations in life required, and the object of the trust deed was to place them in the present enjoyment of the income of the property and supply them with ample means for their stations in life. No such object prompted the making of the transfers in question here. By the deeds in question no estate in present enjoyment was created in the daughter, and she was not presently enriched by the conveyances. The land conveyed was still subject to a lease to her husband at a nominal rental, and she would not come into the enjoyment of it until after her father's death. The conveyances by deed merely confirmed in her what her father had already provided she should take under the will.

templation of death.

The judgment of the County Court of Effingham County was right, and it is affirmed.

I. In general.

When there is a gift or transfer in contemplation of death within the meaning of the succession or inheritance taxing statutes is a question that cannot be answered in any general way, for the answer to the question depends upon the facts in the individual case. Whether there is a gift in contemplation of death is almost uniformly treated as a question of fact. Spreckels v. State (1916) 30 Cal. App. 363, 158 Pac. 549; McDougald v. Wulzen (1917) 34 Cal. App. 21, 166 Pac. 1033; People v. Kelley (1905) 218 Ill. 509, 75 N. E. 1038; Re Crary (1900) 31 Misc. 72, 64 N. Y. Supp. 560. In Nickel v. State (1918) — Cal. —, 175 Pac. 641, an action by the transferee of property, against the state, to quiet title against the claim for inheritance taxes by the state, alleging that the transfer was made in contemplation of death, and was therefore taxable, it was claimed that the complaint by inference and presumption affirmatively showed that the transfer was made in contemplation of death. The court states that it was conceded by both parties that ordinarily the question of whether or not a gift is made in contemplation of death, and for that reason is liable to tax, is one of fact, to be determined by the trial court from the nature and character of the instrument of conveyance, and from all the circumstances surrounding its execution.

In State v. Pabst (1909) 139 Wis. 561, 121 N. W. 351, the question whether there has been a transfer in contemplation of death seems to be treated as one of law; at least the court states that, as a conclusion of law, the trial court found that there had been a transfer in contemplation of death.

In some cases in New York the words, "in contemplation of death," have been limited by a rule of law to gifts causa mortis; and a question of law is presented as to whether the placing of property in a particular form of ownership, such as a joint tenancy, results in a gift in contemplation of death because of the succession to the entire property by the survivor upon the death of one of the tenants. There is apparently a rule of law announced also in some of the cases dealing with antenuptial contracts. But generally, as above stated, a determination of whether there is a transfer in contemplation of death presents a question of fact.

Whether a transfer is in contemplation of death, being a question of fact, no general rule can be formulated that will determine when there has been such a transfer. There are, however, some general rules that assist in determining the question.

Under the ordinary form of statute taxing transfers by deed, grant, bargain, sale, or gift in contemplation of the death of the transferrer, it is well settled that not every transfer of property by way of gift is intended to be subjected to a tax. Spreckels v. State (1916) 30 Cal. App. 363, 158 Pac. 549; Rosenthal v. People (1904) 211 Ill. 306, 71 N. E. 1121; People v. Kelley (1905) 218 Ill. 509, 75 N. E. 1038; People v. Burkhalter (1910) 247 Ill. 600, 139 Am. St. Rep. 351, 93 N. E. 379. "It is not the object of the statute," says the court in People v. Kelley (1905) 218 Ill. 509, 75 N. E. 1038, "to prevent a parent from giving the whole or any portion of his property to his children during his lifetime, if he so desire. The only effect of the statute as a revenue measure is to subject said property to an inheritance tax if the gift is made in contemplation of the death of the donor." "An owner may give away or otherwise dispose of his property or any part of it, in any manner he sees fit, and if such disposition takes effect in possession and enjoyment during his lifetime it will not be subject to an inheritance tax unless made in contemplation of his death." People v. Burkhalter (1910) 247 Ill. 600, 139 Am. St. Rep. 351, 93 N. E. 379.

It is only when such a transfer is in contemplation of the death of the transferrer, as clearly expressed in the statute, that the taxing law operates thereon. The question thus narrows down to what constitutes a transfer in contemplation of death. The phrase, "contemplation of death," does not refer to the general expectation of death that is entertained by all persons (Spreckels v. State (1916) 30 Cal. App. 363, 158 Pac. 549; PEOPLE v. DANKS (reported herewith) ante, 1023; Conway's Estate v. State (1918) — Ind. App. —, 120 N. E. 717; State v. Pabst (1909) 139 Wis. 561, 121 N. W. 351; see Re Baker (1903) 83 App. Div. 530, 82 N. Y. Supp. 390, affirmed in (1904) 178 N. Y. 575, 70 N. E. 1094, infra);—death must be impending. The language used by the courts defines the term better than any composite statement can do. See the reported case (PEOPLE v. DANKS). It has been stated that a gift is made in contemplation of death if made when the donor is looking forward to his death as impending, and in view of that event. Rosenthal v. People (1904) 211 Ill. 306, 71 N. E. 1121. The court in Re Roach (1905) 10 Ont. L. Rep. 208, states that the words "in contemplation of death," as used in the Inheritance Tax Statute, "must be held to refer to an actual impending death, and not to a case in which death was an event which was not expected to take place immediately or within a measured time." The contemplation of death must be the impelling motive without which the conveyance would not be made, in order to subject a transfer of property to the tax. People v. Burkhalter (Ill.) supra. "Contemplation of death" means an apprehension of death which arises from some existing infirmity or impending peril. People v. Carpenter (1914) 264 Ill. 400, 106 N. E. 302. It has been stated that "the meaning of the words 'in contemplation of death,' as used in the statute, must be inferred and ascertained from the context of the act and the object sought to be accomplished by the law. It is manifest that they were intended to cover transfers of parties who were prompted to make them by reason of the expectation of death, and which, in view of that event, accomplish transfers of the property of decedents in the nature of testamentary dispositions. It is therefore obvious that they are not used as referring to that expectation of death generally entertained by every person. The words are evidently intended to refer to an expectation of death which arises from such a bodily or mental condition as prompts persons to dispose of their property and bestow it on those whom they regard as entitled to their bounty." State v. Pabst (1909) 139 Wis. 561, 121 N. W. 351. The words "in contemplation of death," as used in Inheritance Tax Statutes, refer "to that expectation of death which arises from such bodily or mental conditions, irrespective of the cause in any particular case, which prompts persons to dispose of their property to those they deem entitled to their bounty." Conway's Estate v. State (1918) — Ind. App. —, 120 N. E. 717. It is only when the transfer is immediately and directly prompted by the expectation of death,—in other words, when contemplation of death is the motive without which the transfer would not have been made; the expectation of death must be the direct, specific, and immediate animating cause of the transfer, which is in the nature of a testamentary disposition. Spreckels v. State (1916) 30 Cal. App. 363, 158 Pac. 549.

Advanced age of itself is not sufficient to prove that a gift was made in contemplation of death. State v. Thompson (Re Dessert) (1913) 154 Wis. 320, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 790, 142 N. W. 647, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1084. The court here states that "an act is not done in contemplation of death when the feeling that dissolution is approaching is absent, and is not the cause which impels or prompts the doing of the act. An aged person in good health, who has acquired a competency, and who desires to retire from active life, may desire to distribute a portion of his accumulations among his children without any thought of impending death. He may derive genuine enjoyment from seeing them enjoy the fruits of his accumulations if they put them to good use, and may take pleasure in giving his advice or counsel as to how the business or property turned over should be managed or handled. The question of whether such a person may have a few years or many years to live is not a consideration that has entered into or affected the transaction. He does not give because he is anticipating death, but because it affords him a pleasure in life. . . . We do not think the court can fix any particular age limit and say that after it is reached a party can give his property away only in contemplation of death."

The words "contemplation of death" are defined in some statutes to include that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person on the execution of his will, and not to be limited to that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person in making a gift causa mortis. Re Reynolds (1915) 169 Cal. 600, 147 Pac. 268; Re Minor (1919) — Cal. —, 4 A.L.R. 456, 180 Pac. 813; Cole v. Nickel (1919) — Nev. —, 177 Pac. 409, affirmed on rehearing in (1919) — Nev. —, 185 Pac. 565 (no question under this provision of the statute arose in this case). It was held in Re Reynolds (Cal.) supra, that this statutory definition merely serves the purpose of elucidating without changing the law by giving fuller expression to the legislative intent and meaning.

Other statutes make a gift or transfer within a stated period prior to death a transfer in contemplation of death. See note to Re Ebeling, 4 A.L.R. 1523, as to the constitutionality, construction, and effect of such a legislative definition.

The character of a transfer is not wholly determined by the terms of the written instrument employed to accomplish it. Parol evidence of the real agreement is permitted with a latitude similar to that indulged to show a resulting trust, or to transform a deed absolute on its face into a mortgage. Kelly v. Woolsey (1918) 177 Cal. 325, 170 Pac. 837. The state may attack the consideration expressed in the transfer. Abstract & Title Guaranty Co. v. State (1916) 173 Cal. 691, 161 Pac. 264, sustaining the finding of the trial court that a transfer expressed to be in consideration of the care and support of the transferer, and of a small cash payment, was not a transfer upon a valuable consideration.

If the transfer is in contemplation of death, it is subject to the tax though no evidence of that motive appears in the instrument effecting the transfer. People v. Porter (Ill.) post, 1041. The burden of showing that a transfer is subject to a collateral inheritance tax is upon the state. Re Wadsworth (1917) 100 Misc. 439, 166 N. Y. Supp. 716, affirmed without opinion in (1918) 185 App. Div. 944, 172 N. Y. Supp. 924.

II. Theory limiting meaning to gifts causa mortis.

A theory advanced by some of the New York courts is to the effect that the phrase "contemplation of death" includes only gifts causa mortis, and excludes gifts inter vivos. Accordingly only gifts causa mortis are held taxable; a gift inter vivos is not taxable unless made and received with the intent and for the purpose of evading the tax. Re Seaman (1895) 147 N. Y. 69, 41 N. E. 401 (dictum); Re Edgerton (1898) 35 App. Div. 125, 54 N. Y. Supp. 700, affirmed without opinion in (1899) 158 N. Y. 671, 52 N. E. 1124; Re Spaulding (1900) 49 App. Div. 541, 63 N. Y. Supp. 694, affirmed without opinion in (1900) 163 N. Y. 607, 57 N. E. 1124; Re Cornell (1901) 66 App. Div. 162, 73 N. Y. Supp. 32, modified in (1902) 170 N. Y. 423, 63 N. E. 445, see infra; Re Bullard (1902) 76 App. Div. 207, 78 N. Y. Supp. 491; Re Hendricks (1914) 163 App. Div. 413, 148 N. Y. Supp. 511; Re Graves (1907) 52 Misc. 433, 103 N. Y. Supp. 571; Re Stebbins (1907) 52 Misc. 438, 103 N. Y. Supp. 563. In some of the New York cases, the phrase "contemplation of death" is not expressly confined to gifts causa mortis, but it is stated in cases involving gifts inter vivos that the transfer is not taxable unless it was made in contemplation of death, and for the purpose of defrauding the state of the transfer tax. Re Mahlstedt (1901) 67 App. Div. 176, 73 N. Y. Supp. 818, affirmed without opinion in (1902) 171 N. Y. 652, 63 N. E. 1119.

In Re Cornell (1902) 66 App. Div. 162, 73 N. Y. Supp. 32, transfers of securities by an elderly bachelor, one transfer taking place at about two years before his death, another about six months before, to his medical adviser, when the donor apprehended no immediate danger of death, although suffering from a serious disease, was held not to be a transfer in contemplation of death, since the absolute property was vested in the donee, and there was nothing to show that the gift was made to avoid the payment of the transfer tax. The donor reserved the income from the securities for his life, and the court of appeals in (1902) 170 N. Y. 423, 63 N. E. 445, held the transfers subject to the tax because of this fact, but there is no discussion in the opinion of the court of appeals as to transfers in contemplation of death, and it seems more likely that the theory of the court of appeals is that it was a transfer to take effect in possession or enjoyment at death, and for this reason was taxable, although nothing is stated as to the theory. The decision of the surrogate, taxing the transfers, was affirmed by the court of appeals.

A transfer of property under conditions which made it clear that "if the transaction was not a mere pretext to evade the payment of the transfer tax, at least the gift was one not intended to become complete in either enjoyment or possession until after the death of the donor," was held subject to the tax in Re Ball (1914) 161 App. Div. 79, 146 N. Y. Supp. 499, apparently on the theory that if it was a transfer intended to evade the payment of the transfer tax, it was taxable as a transfer in contemplation of death.

But the view confirming the meaning of the words to gifts causa mortis has not been uniformly followed in New York. Some of the New York decisions define the words in the terms of the general rule above stated, although relying on the above New York cases, which confine the meaning to a gift causa mortis. For example, in Re Baker (1903) 83 App. Div. 530, 82 N. Y. Supp. 390, affirmed without opinion in (1904) 178 N. Y. 575, 70 N. E. 1094, it is said that "this court has held that the words 'in contemplation of the death' do not refer to that general expectation which every mortal entertains, but rather the apprehension which arises from some existing condition of body, or some impending peril (Re Spaulding (1900) 49 App. Div. 541, 63 N. Y. Supp. 694, affirmed in (1900) 163 N. Y. 607, 57 N. E. 1124); and this we believe is now the generally accepted definition of the phrase." In Re Hess (1906) 110 App. Div. 476, 96 N. Y. Supp. 990, affirmed in (1907) 187 N. Y. 554, 80 N. E. 1111, where there was a conveyance of a farm to one in consideration of his agreement to support the grantor and his wife, it is stated that there was no suggestion that the conveyance was in contemplation of death; that "the apprehension of the impending dissolution which this clause signifies did not exist."

In other New York cases the New York statute is held not to be confined to gifts causa mortis, but to be applicable to gifts inter vivos if made in contemplation of death. Re Birdsall (1897) 22 Misc. 180, 49 N. Y. Supp. 450, affirmed without opinion in (1899) 43 App. Div. 624, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1133; Re Price (1909) 62 Misc. 149, 116 N. Y. Supp. 283; Re Klein (1915) 92 Misc. 318, 156 N. Y. Supp. 585; Re Dee (1913) 148 N. Y. Supp. 423, affirmed without opinion in (1914) 210 N. Y. 625, 104 N. E. 1128. In Re Palmer (1907) 117 App. Div. 360, 102 N. Y. Supp. 236, Chase, J., denies that only gifts causa mortis
